to the credit of Mr Menzies as representing the syndicate. The result is that, apart from this last transaction, Falkner, Bell, & Company have received seven hundred partly paid-up shares as their portion of the price of the mines. There is no question that this arrangement was made for them by their partner Mr Walker; and it is equally certain that at the time it was made and carried out Mr Walker stood in a fiduciary relation towards the company, both as a promoter and a director. His name appears, with a statement of his position as a partner of Falkner, Bell, & Company of San Francisco, in the published prospectus as one of the provisional directors; his name is in the list of original directors in the articles of association; and although it appears to have been dropped out from the list published in 1882, it reappears in the following year; and he continued in fact to be a director in 1884. He put himself, therefore, in a fiduciary position towards the company. As a provisional director he held himself out to intending shareholders as one of the persons who had undertaken the duty of considering the expediency of the purchase on behalf of the company; and as an acting director when the company was formed he undertook the duty of carrying out the contract of purchase and sale in their interest, while at the same time he was truly in the position of a vendor, because he was receiving a considerable portion of the purchase-money, and contributing nothing to the purchase-money as a buyer. There can be no doubt whatever, if that were all, that a transaction made by him in these circumstances for the benefit of his firm could not be sustained as against the company. But that is not all, because the intending shareholders were not only entitled to rely upon his services as a director bound to consider their interest alone in making the purchase, but they were specially invited to rely on his special knowledge and experience, and on the material interest which he and his firm were to have in the company as considerable contributors, because it is set forth in the published prospectus that 'it is proposed that if the company be incorporated Mr James D. Walker, of the well-known firm of Falkner, Bell, & Company of San Francisco, should be the managing director, and that his firm and other parties in San Francisco will subscribe £10,000.' And therefore the public are invited to have confidence in the adventure, because Mr Walker is to be a director, and his firm, with others, is to subscribe £10,000, although at the time when this prospectus is published there is a concealed agreement between him and certain promoters that he and his firm are to subscribe nothing but the company's money, which is to be paid to them as a commission on the sale. He represents himself to be acting for the buyers, and to be one of their number, and he invites the public to have confidence in the purchase upon that account; while at the same time he is really identified with the vendors, contributing nothing of his own to the purchase-money, and taking for himself and his firm a share of the price. It is said that he was not in a fiduciary position when the provisional agreement was made. That would be of no consequence if he was a party to a wrongful agreement after he became a director. But he did more than that, because he made himself a party to the representations in the prospectus upon which the public were invited to take shares. I think it right to say, however, because questions of this kind involve character, that I do not suppose Mr Walker intended to wrong the shareholders. I do not doubt, upon consideration of the evidence, and of a very voluminous correspondence which I have read, that he believed the adventure to be a promising one, and his part in the transaction to be perfectly legitimate. His error was that he mistook his position. But acquitting him of any wrongful intention, the fact remains that while he was charged as a director of the company with the duty of protecting their interests, he made a contract on their behalf for the purchase of a property, having, at the time when he made it, an agreement with the vendors to receive a portion—amounting to 35,000 dollars—of the price. The case appears to me to be a very clear one for the application of the rule which is established by many decisions, and which is thus stated by Lord Young in one of the most recent: 'Whenever it can be

No. 56.

Jan. 13, 1888.
Scottish Pacific Coast Mining Co. Limited, v. Falkner, Bell, & Co.

money depended upon the question whether the person alleged to have taken promotion-money filled the double capacity of buyer and seller.

---

shown that the trustee has so arranged matters as to obtain an advantage, whether in money or money's worth, to himself personally through the execution of his trust, he will not be permitted to retain it, but will be compelled to make it over to his constituent.'—Huntington Copper Company v. Henderson, 4 R. 299.

"It is said that the whole transaction was made known to all the directors. This would be of no consequence if it were not made known to the company,—that is to the shareholders, and to the public who are invited to take shares. But I see no reason to distrust the testimony of those directors who have been examined, and who depone that they knew nothing of the matter. The active conduct of the company's affairs seems to have been left almost entirely to Mr Menzies; and there can be no doubt that the arrangement between Sutherland and Falkner, Bell, & Company was perfectly well known to him, or that, failing to advert to Mr Walker's fiduciary position, he supposed it to be a legitimate arrangement, and accordingly consented to it, and carried it into effect. But he is unable to say that he explained the matter to the other directors, and they, in the witness-box, have distinctly denied all knowledge of it. There is a conflict between their evidence and that of Messrs Walker and Sutherland. But it is quite impossible that they should be mistaken on such a point; and, on the other hand, it is by no means improbable either that Messrs Walker and Sutherland, in speaking at this distance of time to what took place in conversation, may not have a perfectly accurate recollection of the part taken by particular gentlemen, or that they may have supposed without sufficient ground that what was known to Mr Menzies was known to his co-directors also. It may be, also, that things may have been said in the presence of the other directors which, if they had had the key to them, might have shewn that there was some arrangement with Mr Walker, or Falkner, Bell, & Company. But however the discrepancy is to be accounted for, I prefer the evidence of the directors who were examined, both because they are perfectly clear and positive in all their statements on the subject, and because, while there is a possibility of honest error on the other side, I think there is no such possibility on theirs. The question, however, is not material to the present action, because if all of the directors had known of the transaction their knowledge would not have bound the company.

"The remaining question is whether, assuming the illegality of the transaction by which Falkner, Bell, & Company have been benefited, the liquidator is entitled to the remedy which he maintains against them. It is said that he cannot retain the money due to the firm against the liabilities of one of its partners; that the firm cannot be made liable in damages for the wrong done by a partner, so as to bring the case within the rule of M'Kay's case, 2 Ch. Div. 1, and Pearson's case, 5 Ch. Div. 336; and that, although they might be bound to account for any benefit which had been communicated to them by their partner, they have in fact received no benefit except in the shape of a transfer of shares, and their liability will therefore be satisfied if the shares are retransferred. I cannot assent to this argument. I do not think it doubtful that the firm must refund whatever benefit they have taken, just as Mr Walker must have done so had he been acting for himself alone; and I do not think their liability will be satisfied by a transfer of the shares.

"It is clear upon the evidence and the correspondence that they were acquainted with the whole transaction from first to last. The two bargains which Mr Walker made for them, first for a portion of the price, and secondly for a certain number of shares, were made with their authority; and they accepted and ratified both by directing the shares to be registered in the name of their nominee, Mr Harrison. But they were aware at the same time of Mr Walker's fiduciary position, because they were the agents of the company, and knew that he was a managing director. In these circumstances the doctrine laid down by the House of Lords in the Imperial Mercantile Association v.

No. 56.
—
Jan. 13, 1888.
Scottish Pacific Coast Mining Co. Limited, v. Falkner, Bell, & Co.

In the present case there never had been any duty upon Walker to advise or decide as to whether the property should be bought or not. It was true he was a provisional director, but the responsibility for the purchase rested solely with the provisional committee, of whom Walker was not one. That committee had an absolute discretion even after they got the engineer's report. The principle of liability must be carried further than it had yet been carried if Walker were to be held liable. For example, he was not a promoter like the defender in the case of the Huntington Copper Company.[1] There was no legal duty here upon Walker to advise as to the purchase of the mines, and this being so, on the authorities there was no case against him.[2] He had acted neither as agent nor as trustee for the company in the matter, and the fact that he was a provisional director did not necessarily place him in any fiduciary relation to it.[3]

II. But even if Walker was liable, Falkner, Bell, & Company ought not to suffer for his wrongdoing. It was not within the scope of their business that Walker should have become a director of the company, and accordingly they should not be debarred because of his actings, which were outwith his mandate, from recovering their commission in terms of the agreement between Sutherland and them, which was made in California. The Imperial Mercantile Association case[4] was very different. In that case the promotion-money had been paid over in hard cash. Here Falkner, Bell, & Company had never got anything from the company. There, too, the whole transaction from beginning to end was known to both partners. Here Falkner, Bell, & Company saw only the provisional

---

Coleman, 6 E. and I. App. 203, appears to me to be applicable. The other partners, as the Lord Chancellor says in that case, are 'parties to and implicated in the breach of trust'; with the knowledge they had, their 'liability cannot be separated from that of' Mr Walker, and they are liable to refund to the liquidator whatever he could have been compelled to refund if he had been the sole partner of his firm.

"But if that be so, I think they are liable, on the authority of Hay's case, L. R., 10 Ch. App. 593, for the whole amount which was put to their credit in the books of the company, and applied in the purchase of the shares which stand registered in the name of Mr Harrison. They have contracted to become shareholders in respect of these shares; and ex facie of the transaction they have paid for them by applying a sum of money which did not belong to them but to the company, and which they would undoubtedly have been compelled to refund in full, if it had been applied for their benefit in any other way. On the authority of the case cited, I think the liquidator is entitled to say that the transaction must be treated in one or other of two ways. The shares held for Falkner, Bell, & Company stand in the books as paid up to the extent of £8, 10s. They must either be treated as already paid for, but paid for with the money of the company; and in that case Falkner, Bell, & Company will be liable to refund the money which has wrongly been applied for their benefit. Or they have not been paid for; and then the shareholders will be liable as contributories for the unpaid calls.

"In either view the liquidator is, in my opinion, entitled to retain as against the claims made in these actions. . . . ."

[1] Huntington Copper Co. v. Henderson, Jan. 12, 1877, 4 R. 294.

[2] Buckley on the Companies Acts, 363; Erlanger v. The New Sombrero Phosphate Co., July 31, 1878, L. R., 3 App. Ca. 1218 (Lord Penzance, p. 1229); Bagnall v. Carlton, 1877, L. R., 6 Chanc. Div. 371 (L.-J. Cotton, p. 407).

[3] Arkwright v. Newbold, 1881, L. R., 17 Chanc. Div. 301 (L.-J. James, 319).

[4] Liquidators of the Imperial Mercantile Credit Association v. Coleman & Knight, 1873, L. R., 6 E. and I. Apps. 189.

No. 56.

Jan. 13, 1888.
Scottish Pacific Coast Mining Co. Limited, v. Falkner, Bell, & Co.

agreement and the prospectus,—from which they were entitled to gather that Walker was excluded from any fiduciary position in regard to the company,—and they had reason to believe further that there had been a complete disclosure about the commission. The action accordingly resolved itself into one of misfeasance or breach of trust by a partner unknown to his firm, whom it was afterwards sought to render liable.[1] But that was not enough to infer liability against them, and the sum in question could not be set off in a question with Falkner, Bell, & Company. The Cape Breton Company case applied here. It shewed that the point of time to be looked at was the date of the agreement as to the purchase-money, and that being so, it could not be held here that Falkner, Bell, & Company were in a fiduciary position towards the company at that time.

III. In any view, Falkner, Bell, & Company could not be treated as contributories. Their agreement was in no sense an agreement to take shares as ordinary shareholders. They were to take fully paid-up shares. Their names ought not therefore to be placed on the list of contributories. Hay's case[2] did not apply. It might be that the company had a remedy under the 165th section of the Companies Act, 1862, but that had not been pleaded.[3] As to the 8775 dollars, or £1809, it had not been paid to anyone. It was still in bonis of the company, and yet they asked to get credit for it just as if it had been paid away.

Argued for the respondents;—I. Their case was rested on the principle of the Huntington Copper Company's[4] and Sir John Hay's[5] cases. It was proved that Walker occupied a fiduciary position towards the company, and the fact that he was not one of the committee appointed to consider as to the purchase of the mine did not affect his relation to the public as one of the ultimate directors of the company.[6] The law went further now than it did in the Huntington case. It was not now considered necessary that the person taking the benefit should be a director of the company, or even have figured towards the public in a position of trust, so long as he was a promoter in the sense of bringing the company into existence, and having an interest adverse to the company.[7] If he was in that position, he became liable as a trustee to refund his promotion-money. Walker put himself forward as occupying a fiduciary position towards the company from the earliest period of the company's history. At the first meetings that were held he represented himself as a buyer, and acted as such, and he also introduced the seller. He was a party to the incorporation, because he signed both the memorandum of association and the articles. It was said,—relying on the Cape Breton Company case,[8] that the time to be looked at was the date of the agree-

---

[1] Lydney and Wigpool Iron Ore Co. v. Bird, 1886, L. R., 33 Chanc. Div. 85; In re Canadian Oil Works Corporation (Hay's Case), 1875, L. R., 10 Chanc. Apps. 593; In re Cape Breton Co. 1885, L. R., 29 Chan. Div. 795; Ladywell Mining Co. v. Brookes, &c., 1886, L. R., 34 Chanc. Div. 398, affd. 35 Chanc. Div. 400.

[2] L. R., 10 Chanc. Apps. 593; cf. Carling, Hespeler, and Walsh's cases, 1875, L. R., 1 Chanc. Div. 115.

[3] Coventry v. Dixon, 1880, L. R., 14 Chanc. Div. 660; Du Ruvigne's case, 1877, L. R., 5 Chanc. Div. 306; Gover's case, 1875, L. R., 1 Chanc. Div. 182.

[4] 4 R. 294.

[5] L. R., 10 Chanc. Apps. 593.

[6] Ex parte Bennet, 1805, 10 Vesey's Reps. 380 (Lord Chancellor Eldon, p. 393).

[7] Lydney and Wigpool Iron Co. v. Bird, 1886, L. R., 33 Chanc. Div. 85.

[8] L. R., 29 Chanc. Div. 795.

No. 56.
—
Jan. 13, 1888.
Scottish Pacific Coast Mining Co. Limited, v. Falkner, Bell, & Co.

ment as to the purchase-money. But that case established the rule that if a person—with a certain property in his hands for sale—became a director of a limited company with the view of buying that property which he sells to the company in the name of someone else, while he concealed his own interest, the transaction is reducible. Accordingly, that case applied here.

II. It was said that although Walker created the company or assisted to do so, his firm were not in that position. But a firm could not retain a benefit got by the fraud of one of its partners.[1] It was enough to shew Falkner, Bell, & Company's knowledge to refer to the two letters from them of July and August 1881 (quoted above). They therefore adopted what had been done by Walker, and the shares were registered in the name of one of the partners of the firm. In answer to the dilemma put by the Lord Ordinary on this question in his note, the case of Carling[2] had been referred to. But there the vendor got certain shares allotted to him as paid up, some of which he transferred as paid up to persons becoming directors. These persons having no contract with the company to acquire the shares, could not be made liable as holders of unpaid shares. The respondents were therefore entitled to retain the shares,—Falkner, Bell, & Company having undertaken to take them,—and that contract falling to be fulfilled by a payment in money. If there was no such contract, then the other alternative put by the Lord Ordinary applied. As to the £1809, it had been put to the credit of Falkner, Bell, & Company at their own request. The case of the Imperial Mercantile Credit Association was altogether in point.[3]

At advising,—

Lord Mure.—It does not, as it appears to me, admit of doubt, upon the evidence adduced in the conjoined actions—(1) That before the formation of the complainers' company, the respondents Falkner, Bell, & Company had entered into an agreement, under which they were to receive a very considerable sum of money, from the vendor of the mines afterwards acquired by the complainers, in the event of a company being formed for the purchase of those mines through the influence and co-operation of the respondents and their partner Mr Walker; (2) that the mines in question were acquired and the complainers' company formed for their acquisition in a great measure through the introduction and exertions of the respondents, and of their partner Mr Walker in particular; and (3) that the stipulated promotion-money was paid to the respondents, after the complainers' company was formed, in the shape of paid-up shares of the company, which were duly issued to the respondents, and which they deliberately agreed to take in payment of the monies due to them under their agreement.

So standing these facts it cannot, I apprehend, well be disputed that, under the rules of law applicable to such transactions, as the law has for some time been administered both in this country and in England, the respondents are liable to refund money so paid, if it is proved that, at the time the complainers' company was incorporated, the respondents' partner Mr Walker, who took an active part in promoting the sale of the mines, stood towards that company in a fiduciary position, more particularly if the fact that he was in that position was

---

[1] Blaikie Brothers v. Aberdeen Railway Co., July 20, 1854, 1 Macq. (H. L.) 461; M'Kay's case, 1875, L. R., 1 Chanc. Div. 1; Pearson's case, 1877, L. R., 5 Chanc. Div. 336.

[2] L. R., 1 Chanc. Div. 115.

[3] 1873, L. R., 6 E. and I. Apps. 189.

No. 56.

Jan. 13, 1886.
Scottish Pacific Coast Mining Co. Limited, v. Falkner, Bell, & Co.

well known to the respondents. The discussion, accordingly, which took place under the reclaiming note was, in a great measure, confined to this important point; and the main question to which, as it appears to me, your Lordships have now to direct your attention with a view to the disposal of the present case, is as to whether there has been evidence adduced sufficient to instruct that Mr Walker must be held to have stood in a fiduciary relation to the complainers' company at the time when that company was incorporated.

Now, the solution of this question appears to me in this case to depend upon what is proved to have taken place relative to the formation of the complainers' company between the date of the agreement entered into between the vendor and Falkner, Bell, & Company in San Francisco in December 1880 and the 8th of March 1881, being the date of the company's incorporation; and the evidence as to this, which is, I think, chiefly documentary, is substantially to the following effect.

Upon the agreement between Mr Sutherland and Falkner, Bell, & Company being concluded, Mr Sutherland appears to have proceeded to London to put himself in communication with Mr Walker as provided for in the agreement. For the correspondence which took place between Mr Walker and Mr Menzies of Edinburgh in the beginning of January 1881 shews that Mr Sutherland had then arrived in London and had met with Mr Walker, Mr Menzies, and some other gentlemen from Edinburgh, and that a meeting had been arranged to be held in Edinburgh for the further consideration of the proposed purchase. This meeting, at which Mr Walker and Mr Sutherland were present, was held on the 13th of January, and a provisional agreement appears to have been then entered into for the purchase of the mines, subject to some further inquiries. That document is produced, and bears to have been entered into between Mr Sutherland on the first part and the parties whose names are subscribed thereto on the second part, and among the parties so subscribing on the second part I find the name of Mr Walker. In this agreement the price to be paid for the property is fixed subject to inquiries as to title, &c., and subject to the report of an engineer to be named by the second parties as to the position and condition of the mines; and by the fourth head of the agreement five gentlemen are named, of whom Mr Walker is not one, who are to "have the sole right to determine whether in terms of this agreement, the investigation made by the second parties has so resulted that the company ought to be incorporated; and if they so determine, to adjust the terms of the articles of association and incorporate the company; and the company in that case shall pay the price above stipulated."

The next step taken by the promoters, after selecting an engineer to report upon the mines, appears to have been the preparation of a prospectus of the proposed company, which was issued to the public about the 21st of January 1881. This document is an important one, for it gives among other things the names of the provisional directors, and among them is the name of Mr Walker "of the firm of Falkner, Bell, & Company, San Francisco." It contains the usual information supposed to be necessary to enable parties intending to take shares to judge of the advantages or disadvantages of such a proposal; and it also contains the following clauses:—"It is proposed that, if the company be incorporated, Mr James D. Walker, of the well-known firm of Falkner, Bell, & Company, San Francisco, should be managing director in California. His firm and other parties in San Francisco will subscribe £10,000. The company will not be incorporated until the above statements, which are made on the authority of the vendors, are confirmed by Mr Price," and it concludes by stating that "a copy of the articles of association may be seen at the office of the company."

No. 56.

Jan. 13, 1888.
Scottish Pacific Coast Mining Co. Limited, v. Falkner, Bell, & Co.

This prospectus appears from the correspondence to have been largely circulated. Copies were admittedly sent out to Falkner, Bell, & Company at San Francisco, and to Mr Walker, who had returned to London, for circulation there; and it appears from the evidence that those sent to London were duly distributed by Mr Walker among parties likely to apply for shares. The result of all this was, that by the beginning of March 1881 the promoters considered themselves in a position to have the company incorporated. The articles of association, which are mentioned in the prospectus as lying for inspection at the office of the company in Edinburgh, were by that time adjusted; and in those articles, which were admittedly signed by Mr Walker, his name is entered as one of the first directors of the company.

It thus appears from the prospectus of the company, and from the articles of association, that Mr Walker was announced as a provisional director and as one of the first directors of the incorporated company; and that he acted in both capacities is, I think, shewn by the minutes of the meeting of the 25th of February 1881, in which his name is entered as one of the parties present when the report of the engineer's inspection of the mines was received from San Francisco, and by the minutes of the meetings of directors on 14th May, and of shareholders on the 22d of May 1883, at which he was present; and the minute of the latter of these meetings bears that "Mr Lawrie and Mr Walker, the retiring directors, were re-elected."

The accuracy of the statement in these documents, as to Mr Walker being appointed a director, is challenged in the record by the respondents, who allege that Mr Walker was not qualified to act as a provisional director, and that it was never intended to do more than make him managing director in California, as stated in the prospectus. It is also denied on record that he ever was a director of the company, or ever acted as such; and it is alleged that his name erroneously, and without his consent, was inserted in the articles of association. With reference to the last of these averments, it appears to me that the respondents cannot now be allowed to raise any such objection, because Mr Walker deliberately signed the articles of association, in one of which he is named as one of the first directors, and he afterwards attended meetings of the directors when he happened to be in this country.

As regards the prospectus, on the other hand, it is plain from Mr Walker's own evidence, that although he may not have been originally aware that he was to be appointed a provisional director, he raised no objection to his name being included as one of them when he saw it in the prospectus, but assumed and acted upon the duties of the office with considerable zeal.

Upon this his evidence is very frank and explicit. When asked as to the prospectus he says, "I was present when Mr Menzies was preparing the prospectus that was to be issued to the public. I had no means of giving him any information except what I had got from Mr Sutherland. I had no hand in framing the prospectus. I had never drawn a prospectus in my life. After I went to London, which I think was towards the end of January, a completed copy of the prospectus was sent to me there; I saw then that my name was in the list of directors. That was a new idea to me. I did not know before that it was intended to make me a director. The suggestion had never been made to me. I then proceeded to bestir myself to get friends to take shares in the company. About the 8th of February I returned to Edinburgh, and again paid visits to Mr Menzies' office. I was to be managing director of the company in California, and Mr Menzies was to be managing director in this country. When intending shareholders communicated with me I gave them any information I could, in fact I went a little further than that, because there was a small meeting of shareholders called one day in Mr Menzies' office, and the map was spread out, and I told those present what I knew about the Empire property, and about the property generally, explaining at the same time that personally I had no knowledge of it. I was never asked as to whether Mr Price's report was satisfactory or not. His cable report had come to hand before I left this country, but not the detailed one. I sailed for New York on the 5th of March. I never was a member of the provisional committee."

In saying that he never was a member of the provisional committee, Mr Walker must have meant that he was not one of the committee of five who were nominated to decide whether the company should be incorporated after receiving the report of the engineer Mr Price, because he was undoubtedly one of the provisional directors, for he signed the provisional agreement as one of the second parties to it, and appears to have attended a meeting of that committee when they were considering the report on the 25th of February 1881, after he was fully aware that he had been named a provisional director in the prospectus, and had, as he himself explained in the passage I have just read, acted in that capacity. In a subsequent part of his evidence, when again questioned as to the prospectus, and as to whether, after explanation, he was satisfied the prospectus was substantially correct, he says, "I suppose so. I was not surprised to find in the prospectus that I was to be managing director in California, because that had been arranged. I was surprised to find my name appear as a director, because I did not see what use I could be to the company here, and I had never been asked to be a director. I got copies of the prospectus sent to me immediately on its issue, and I sent copies to various of my friends. I did not take any objection when I saw my name included as a director. I did not mention to the friends to whom I sent copies of the prospectus that that was a mistake, because when I got the prospectus and saw my name in it, I took no objection to it, and I thereby gave consent. I afterwards signed the articles of association, in which I was named as one of the first directors of the company. I cannot say whether I attended any of the meetings of directors in Edinburgh after the company was formed, but if the minutes shew that I did I will accept that."

Upon considering this evidence I have been unable to see my way to any other conclusion than that of holding that the case must be dealt with on the footing that Mr Walker was appointed and acted as one of the provisional directors for the formation of the complainers' company, and that he was also appointed and acted as one of the first directors of the incorporated company. And if I am right in this the case is, I think, clear, and distinctly ruled, in so far as Mr Walker is concerned, by the decision of this Court in the case of the Huntington Copper Company, referred to by the Lord Ordinary in his opinion. Here, as in the Huntington case, the interest of Mr Walker, as a partner of Falkner, Bell, & Company, was in direct conflict with his duty as a director or trustee for the complainers' company. His duty as a director was to acquire the property at as low a price as possible for the company. His interest as a partner of the complainers' company was to get as large a sum as possible for it for the vendor, because the larger the price obtained by the vendor the larger, under the terms of the agreement, would be the profit divisible between the vendor and Falkner, Bell, & Company; and wherever such a conflict between duty and interest exists, the party who has the duty to discharge cannot, I conceive, as the law now stands, be allowed to retain money paid to him under any such agreement as that here in question.

No. 56.

Jan. 13, 1888.
Scottish Pacific Coast Mining Co. Limited, v. Falkner, Bell, & Co.

I therefore concur in the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived on the main question raised, and generally in the able exposition he has given of the law and of the evidence applicable to the various branches of the case.

The circumstance that the question is here raised with the firm of Falkner, Bell, & Company and not directly with Mr Walker, which is the main distinction I see between this and the case of Huntington, cannot, in my opinion, be held to make any difference in the application of the general rule, more particularly in a case where, as here, the firm were throughout quite well aware that their leading partner was acting as a director of the company. The firm, in a question of this description cannot, in the view I take of it, be in any better position than the partner himself who assumed the fiduciary character, and the general rule has been applied by this Court in the case of a firm of law-agents, in which the whole Court was consulted. I refer to the case of Paterson's Trustees, 12th November 1856 (19 D. p. 1), where one of a firm which acted as agents for a trust-estate was himself one of the trustees for whom the firm acted, and an objection was on that ground taken to the accounts of the firm. It was not disputed that the objection must have been sustained had the trustee been sole agent for the trust; but it was contended that the objection was obviated by the circumstance that it was not the firm but only one of the partners who had acted as trustee. There was some difference of opinion on the bench, but the great majority of the Court were agreed that the objection was well founded, and disallowed the claim of the firm. That was decided relative to the claim of a firm of law-agents. But in principle I am unable to see any good reason why the same rule should not be applied in the case of a mercantile firm; and upon the whole matter I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD ADAM.—The leading question in this case is whether Mr Walker, at the date when the sale of the mines was completed by their purchase by the Scottish Pacific Coast Mining Company, occupied a fiduciary position towards that company, by which sale Messrs Falkner, Bell, & Company are alleged to have made a profit of 35,000 dollars.

I think with Lord Mure and the Lord Ordinary that at that time there can be no doubt that Mr Walker was both a promoter and a provisional director, and that he subsequently became a director of the company. He is the person who introduced Mr Sutherland, the vendor, to the company. His name appears as a provisional director in the prospectus which was issued for the purpose of inducing parties to become shareholders in the company. Then, again, he signs the memorandum of association, and in the articles of association his name again appears as a director of the company, and Lord Mure has pointed out from the evidence of Mr Walker, that although Mr Walker did not at first know he was to be a provisional director, he saw his name printed in the prospectus, and after seeing it he adopted it, and allowed it to be circulated. That is just

No. 56.

Jan. 13, 1888.
Scottish Pacific Coast Mining Co. Limited, v. Falkner, Bell, & Co.

the same as if he had originally been a consenting party. It appears to me in the face of all that to be quite impossible to say that he did not occupy a fiduciary position towards the future company. Again, it appears to be pretty clear from the evidence which Lord Mure has read, that he was not only a provisional director, but he took an active part, as he himself says, in communicating with intending shareholders with the view of getting them to join the company, and if that is not conduct which one would expect from no one but an interested and active promoter, I do not know what is. I have therefore no hesitation in holding that Mr Walker acted as a provisional director and as an active promoter of the company.

The next important document is the provisional agreement between Mr Sutherland and the second parties, because that provisional agreement afterwards became the substantive agreement under which the purchase of this mine took place. It is an agreement between Charles Sutherland on the first part and certain parties on the second part (one of whom I find was Mr Walker), the purchasers of this mine. It appears therefore on the face of this document, which was afterwards carried out, that Mr Walker was beyond all question a purchaser of the mine from Sutherland, and then, that being so, what is his position with reference to the vendors?

At that time, and about that time there was no dispute at all; there was a subsisting agreement between Falkner, Bell, & Company, of which Mr Walker was a partner, and Mr Sutherland, that Falkner, Bell, & Company should have half the profit of the sale of the mine; and if that be so, it is clear upon the face of this document that he was both vendor and purchaser. He occupied these two totally inconsistent positions, and that being his position, it humbly appears to me that this case falls perfectly clearly under the principle of the case of the Huntington Copper Company, to which Lord Mure has referred. That being so, and his duty being to protect the purchasers against the vendors to the utmost extent of his ability, he was, from his pecuniary interest as vendor, not in a position in which he could properly fulfil his duties to his constituents, the purchasers. Upon that part of the case I confess I am clearly of opinion that there can be no doubt.

Now, it was argued to us with great force that although Walker was in a fiduciary position so far, he was relieved from that position by the fact that there was a clause in this provisional agreement by which it was remitted to five gentlemen, of whom he was not one, to determine whether or not the company should be incorporated and registered and the matter gone on with. But I confess I have been unable to see how that fact can relieve Mr Walker of his fiduciary position. It did not make him any the less a promoter or any the less a director. I cannot hold that the fact that a particular piece of business was not committed to him made him any the less a director. He was a director and remained a director of the company up to the date of its incorporation, and therefore I do not think that makes any difference in this case.

It is quite true, as Lord Mure has pointed out, that although he was not a member of that committee of directors charged with an official judgment of that kind, he, nevertheless, attended the meetings of the committee. I do not know how far he took part in the deliberations of the committee, or in regard to their official resolution to incorporate the company, but that is immaterial, and makes no difference in his fiduciary position.

There is a great deal of parole and other evidence upon this point, as to whether or not it is proved that Mr Walker communicated his position with reference to the vendor to his co-directors. The Lord Ordinary thinks it is not proved that he did so to any of the directors except Mr Menzies. Now, my view of the evidence on this point is, that it is entirely immaterial whether he did or did not communicate his position to his co-directors. What I think is material is, that he concealed his position,—that he was to make a profit out of the transaction,—from the company. Whether he concealed that, not from his co-directors, but from the company, is the question. In my opinion no amount of disclosure to his co-directors would relieve him from liability in respect of concealment from the company. It might have raised a very unpleasant question for the other directors, as to whether they also concealed their knowledge of Mr Walker's position from the company, and as to what the consequence of that might be to them, but I cannot see how the fact of his communicating his position to his co-directors can relieve him of liability. The question is whether this agreement between Falkner, Bell, & Company and Mr Sutherland was concealed from the company.

Now, I have no doubt that if this had been a question solely with Walker whether he was bound to repay the money—the profit which he thus made—there could only have been one answer. The only remaining question is whether, if Walker was in that position, his firm of Falkner, Bell, & Company are bound to repay it? Upon that question I think we are perfectly within the authority of the case of the Imperial Mercantile Association v. Coleman. That case decided, and I think quite rightly decided, that where parties in the position of a company are implicated in a breach of trust by one of its partners, and take the benefit of that breach of trust, they are just as much bound to repay any sum they may have got in that way as the individual partner whose active agency procured this money.

As for the knowledge of the firm of Falkner, Bell, & Company of the proceedings of Mr Walker from first to last, there can be no doubt. He was sent by the firm of Falkner, Bell, & Company to arrange this matter, and from first to last he kept them advised of these proceedings, and they knew of the breach of trust that was being committed, and therefore I think, as I have already said, that the case is entirely ruled by the Imperial Mercantile Association case.

The next question is whether it has been proved that this money was paid to the firm of Falkner, Bell, & Company, and that they got the benefit of it. The undertaking which was set forth in the prospectus was that Falkner, Bell, & Company, and their friends, should subscribe £10,000. It was not in accordance with the undertaking that they were to get paid-up shares or anything of that sort, but they were to subscribe £10,000. That was their undertaking. Now the money was paid in this way. The price of the mine was 400,000 dollars. Of that, 350,000 dollars was paid in cash or bills sent to Falkner, Bell, & Company; and of that 350,000 dollars, 330,000 were paid to the prior holders of the mine,—not to Mr Sutherland the vendor, but to the mortgagees of the mine,—and 20,000 dollars went in cash to Sutherland himself. Now, that left a sum of 50,000 dollars, equivalent to £10,309. That sum was expended in this way: 35,000 dollars was Falkner, Bell, & Company's share of the money, and the 15,000 which remained was Sutherland's. On 30th June 1881, the Pacific Company took up and paid for 1000 shares, of which £8, 10s. had been paid up. These 1000 shares cost 41,225 dollars, equal to £8500. Of these, by the direct orders of Falkner, Bell, & Company, 700 were afterwards registered in the name of Mr Harrison, one of their partners, for them, and at the request and order of Falkner, Bell, & Company. Now, these 700 shares so registered in Harrison's name cost £5950. There was thus left a balance of 8775 dollars or £1809; and what became of that was this,—by the order of Mr Walker on 31st May 1882 that £1809 was transferred from the books of the company where it stood at the credit of Falkner, Bell, & Company, to that of Mr Menzies, acting on behalf of a syndicate, to take up and pay for unsubscribed shares in the company.

It humbly appears to me that the 700 shares were paid for by the cash of the company by the order of Falkner, Bell, & Company, just as much as if they had ordered the Pacific Company to purchase shares in any other company for them and pay for them with the company's funds. These shares were purchased and stood at the credit of Falkner, Bell, & Company, being registered in the name of one of the partners of that firm. The £1809 was exactly in the same position, standing at the credit of Falkner, Bell, & Company in the books of the company, just as if it had been paid to Falkner, Bell, & Company, because it was paid to their order. That being so, I think it is impossible to dispute that this firm of Falkner, Bell, & Company had the benefit of or got this money, and the question therefore is, are they bound to repay it?

Now, if this had been a direct action by the Pacific Company against Falkner, Bell, & Company, I see no reason to doubt that they would have been bound to repay this money, which was profit obtained by them for the promotion of the company. And if they would have been bound to repay it, are not the company entitled to set it off against Falkner, Bell, & Company's claim on the bills? I confess that I entertain no doubt that the company are entitled to set it off.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and your Lordships have completely exhausted the grounds of judgment which are satisfactory to my mind.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—HENRY & SCOTT, S.S.C.—Agents.

MRS MARION CARLAW OR WALLACE, Pursuer.—J. C. Thomson—Hay. WEST CALDER CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETY, LIMITED, Defenders.—Lord-Adv. Macdonald—Rhind.

No. 57.

Jan. 18, 1888.
Wallace v. West Calder Co-operative Society, Limited.

Reparation—Damages for personal injury—Excessive damages.—A widow brought an action of damages for the death of her husband, resulting from personal injuries caused by the defenders. He was a builder by trade, and his whole income from that and other sources amounted to £150. The widow was left unprovided for. The jury awarded her £900. On a motion for a new trial the Court held the award excessive, and reduced it to £500.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Lee.
B.

JOHN WALLACE died on 29th June 1887 from injuries received by his being thrown out of a car which collided with a bread van belonging to the West Calder Co-operative Society on 20th April previously. His widow subsequently brought an action of damages against the company, which was tried before Lord Lee and a jury, in November 1887, when a

No. 57.

Jan. 13, 1888.
Wallace v.
West Calder
Co-operative Society, Limited.

verdict was returned for the pursuer,—the damages being assessed at £900,—"being £800 as damages, and £100 as solatium."

The defenders afterwards obtained a rule on the ground of excessive damages.

It was proved at the trial that Wallace was a builder in West Calder, and that he also held the offices of inspector of poor and collector of poor-rates for Livingstone parish. His income was admitted to be £150 per annum from all sources. His widow, who was forty years of age, was left without means.

The pursuer in shewing cause argued that the amount of damages must be clearly exorbitant before the Court would interfere.[1] There had been cases where the Court had reduced such damages,[2] either where they had been on the face of them unreasonable, or where no substantial injury had been sustained, but the present was not one of these. In a recent case the Court had refused to set aside a verdict, where a father was awarded £400 for the death of his son—a lad of sixteen.[3]

The defenders argued that the deceased had not been engaged in any prosperous and increasing business,—particularly looking to the fact that £80 of his admitted income of £150 came from the public offices which he held. The £100 given as solatium was not objected to, but otherwise the amount given was practically double what it ought to have been.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Court are of opinion that this is a very excessive award of damages, and of course if we were to give effect to this view in the ordinary way we should have to allow a new trial. But the parties are willing to leave the matter in our hands. The amount which the jury have given as solatium is not challenged, and therefore the sum we have to deal with is the £800. The Court are of opinion that this should be reduced to £400.

LORD MURE, LORD ADAM, and LORD LEE concurred.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect that the pursuer consents that the amount of damages found by the verdict of the jury shall be reduced to £500, discharge the rule for a new trial, and find the defenders entitled to expenses in connection with the application for and discussion upon the rule," &c.

BY a subsequent interlocutor on the same day the Court applied the verdict, and decerned for £500; and found the pursuer entitled to expenses in so far as not already disposed of.

W. & W. SAUNDERS, S.S.C.—ROBERT MENZIES, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 58.

Jan. 19, 1888.
Strachan v.
Binnie.

WILLIAM STRACHAN, Objector (Appellant).—Armour—Blackburn.
DAVID BINNIE, Claimant (Respondent).—Shaw.

Election Law—Service Franchise—Inhabitant-occupier—Miner out on strike—Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. cap. 3), sec. 3.—A miner who occupied a dwelling-house by virtue of his contract of employment having gone out on strike, his employer, on 24th August 1887, obtained decree of ejection. The decree had not been extracted, and he still occupied the house on 6th October 1887, when the Sheriff proceeded to consider his claim to be put upon the roll of voters. Held that having left the employment and suffered decree of ejection to go out against him, he was not in occupation by virtue of any right, and was therefore not entitled to be put upon the roll.

---

[1] Landell v. Landell, March 6, 1841, 3 D. 819; Shields v. North British Railway Co., Nov. 24, 1874, 2 R. 126; Young v. Glasgow Tramway Co., Nov. 29, 1882, 10 R. 242.

[2] Johnston v. Dilke, June 16, 1875, 2 R. 836.

[3] M'Master v. Caledonian Railway Co., Nov. 27, 1885, 13 R. 252.

No. 58.

Jan. 19, 1888.
Strachan v. Binnie.

Registration Appeal Court.
Lord Mure.
Ld. Craighill.
Lord Kinnear.
Sheriff of Linlithgowshire.

At a Registration Court for the county of Linlithgow, held on 6th October 1887, William Strachan objected to the name of David Binnie, who stood on the assessor's list of persons entitled to vote in the county, as "miner, tenant of house 80 Holygate," being placed on the roll of voters.

The Sheriff-substitute (Melville) repelled the objection, and the objector took a case.

The case bore,—"In the Valuation-rolls for the years 1886-7, and 1887-8, the said David Binnie is entered as 'inhabitant-occupier, not rated (48 Victoria, caput 3, sections 3 and 9),' of the house No. 80 Holygate, Broxburn, of which house the Broxburn Oil Company, Limited, are the proprietors.

"The said David Binnie was a miner in the employment of the said Oil Company, and occupied said house in virtue of said employment, on the condition that the rent thereof should be retained by the said company from his wages, and that he should remove therefrom on leaving the employment of the said company. A strike of the miners in the employment of the said Oil Company took place, and a summons was issued against him at the instance of the said Oil Company, upon which the Sheriff, on 24th August 1887, granted a warrant for removing and ejecting him from the said house—such ejection not being sooner than 1st September 1887. This warrant has not been enforced, and the said David Binnie still retains possession of said dwelling-house.

"The objection was that the said David Binnie, having left the employment or service of the said Oil Company, was not an inhabitant-occupier of the said house, in virtue of service or employment with the company; that having received notice to leave the said house, and a warrant of ejectment therefrom having been obtained against him, he was in illegal possession, and that he was not entitled to be on the roll.

"The Sheriff-substitute repelled the objection, on the ground that Binnie was an inhabitant-occupier of the house until a decree of ejection was carried out. . . .

"The question of law for the decision of the Court of Appeal is, Whether, in the circumstances stated, the said David Binnie is an inhabitant-occupier of the said house as a tenant within the meaning of the 3d section of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1884,* and as such entitled to be enrolled as a voter for said county for the current year?"

Argued for the appellant;—The Act of 1884 did not by its 2d and 3d sections create a new franchise. It extended the inhabitant-occupier franchise to a person who had his house as part of his wages under a contract of employment. The man must be tenant as well as occupier. Where, therefore, the employment ceased, and, with it, the right to the

---

* The Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. c. 3), sec. 3, enacts,—"Where a man himself inhabits any dwelling-house by virtue of any office, service, or employment, and the dwelling-house is not inhabited by any person under whom such man serves in such office, service, or employment, he shall be deemed . . . to be an inhabitant-occupier of such dwelling-house as a tenant."

No. 58.

Jan. 19, 1888.
Strachan v.
Binnie.

house, the right to the franchise, which was founded on these two facts, ceased also.[1] The mistake of the Sheriff-substitute was in holding that mere occupancy, irrespective of right, founded on the contract of service, was sufficient. The respondent's right to occupy had clearly ceased. He had gone out on strike, and his employer had desired him to leave and had obtained decree of ejection against him.

Argued for the respondent;—The respondent had occupied for twelve months prior to 31st July in virtue of his contract. He was still in occupation when the Sheriff came to consider his claim. If it were thought competent to go farther and look at the proceedings in the action of ejection, the case should be remitted for farther statement, as it would be shewn thereby that when the Registration Court was held the employer and the respondent, and others in a like position, were in treaty for a resumption of work.

The Court, on 23d November 1887, pronounced this interlocutor:— "Remit to the Sheriff to amend the case by stating first, whether he had found that the said David Binnie was an inhabitant-occupier of the house in question in respect of any right of tenancy vested in him at the date of the Registration Court, and if so, upon what title? secondly, the grounds in facts and law upon which the decree of removal was obtained; and thirdly, whether it was maintained before him that a contract of employment between the Broxburn Oil Company and the said David Binnie was still in subsistence at the date of the Registration Court, and if so, upon what ground."

The Sheriff-substitute, on 9th December 1887, stated,—"(1) That he found Binnie was an inhabitant-occupier of the house in question, and in possession of the house in respect of a contract with the Broxburn Oil Company that he should occupy the house, pay rent, and work for the company. Both parties were anxious that the contract should be carried out, and as soon as the strike was at an end Binnie would resume work. (2) The decree of removal was granted in a summary ejection case, which formed one of 121 that came up for decision. The facts varied in different cases. No note of the facts was made at the time, and therefore it is scarcely possible now to state accurately what took place in reference to this particular case. A copy of the record in the Court books is annexed. The recollection of the Sheriff-substitute is that the pursuer's procurator urged that Binnie had left the company's employment prior to 19th August last, and that in law the company were entitled, on that ground alone, to have him evicted. At the same time he said the company were anxious the defenders should return to their employment and remain in possession of their houses. In these circumstances the Sheriff-substitute, on 24th August 1887, gave decree of ejection, but superseded execution of the decree till 1st September 1887. (3) The Sheriff-substitute held that the contract still subsisted, and that there was no intention to eject Binnie, as the decree had not been extracted at the time the Court was held. Binnie might have brought a suspension of the decree, or have been reponed. The Sheriff-substitute did not hear counsel for Binnie."

An extract from the Sheriff Court books shewing what had taken place in the action of ejection was also laid before the Court. It shewed only that the action had been contested, and that the decree was extracted on 6th October.

On the Court resuming consideration of the case as amended, neither party desired to add further argument.

---

[1] Smith v. M'Donald, Nov. 26, 1886, 14 R. 125.

No. 58.

Jan. 19, 1888.
Strachan v. Binnie.

Lord Craighill.—In the present case we have to consider whether David Binnie has proved his right to be put upon the roll,—whether he had, at the time the Sheriff held his Registration Court the necessary qualification. The qualification founded upon here is that which is contained in section 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. c. 3, sec. 3), which provides that "where a man himself inhabits any dwelling-house by virtue of any office, service, or employment, and the dwelling-house is not inhabited by any person under whom such man serves in such office, service, or employment, he shall be deemed for the purposes of this Act, and of the Representation of the People Acts, to be an inhabitant-occupier of such dwelling-house as a tenant." Now, it will be seen that this section is conditional. Two things must be established, the first that the person claiming has been for the requisite period an inhabitant-occupier, the second that he has occupied as tenant,—that is to say, under a contract of service. Tenancy and occupancy, the one as much as the other, must be established. Let us see what was the view of the Sheriff-substitute when he dismissed the objection. He says that he "repelled the objection on the ground that Binnie was an inhabitant-occupier of the house until a decree of ejection was carried out." There is nothing whatever about tenancy there, only inhabitant-occupancy is regarded. That is a misconception, and thinking so we sent back the case for amendment in order to have the other facts brought before us. The amendment made by the Sheriff-substitute states that he found "Binnie was an inhabitant-occupier of the house in question, and in possession of the house in respect of a contract with the Broxburn Oil Company that he should occupy the house, pay rent, and work for the company. Both parties were anxious that the contract should be carried out, and as soon as the strike was at an end Binnie would resume work." For a time, then, after the strike both parties were anxious that the contract should still subsist, but before the Registration Court was held one party had become dissatisfied with the contract, and was unwilling to go on with it. The Sheriff-substitute then says—(His Lordship quoted the second and third paragraphs of the amended case, as printed above). I think there is great difficulty about this ground of judgment. The ground on which the Sheriff-substitute proceeded was that the original contract by virtue of which Binnie entered on occupation was a contract existing at 6th October, the date of the Registration Court. He does not give any effect at all to the view that there was a strike. The contract had, I think, come to an end. The most general case is that a strike takes place either to obtain higher wages or to resist an attempt to reduce wages. These are sufficient causes, it may be, for a strike, but if the men retire from the employment and cease to do work or to earn wages, it is impossible to say that they continue parties to a contract by which they are to earn wages, pay the rents, and have the occupancy of the houses. That is a strong consideration, but not all, for on 24th August decree of ejectment was given. Now, we desired to know the facts which would shew whether at the date of the decree of ejection the contract was terminated. We thought that one way to obtain these facts would be to get the petition on which the decree proceeded. It seems that cannot be given, but a copy of the record in the Court books has been laid before us. From it we see nothing but the fact that decree was pronounced. This does not enable us to see what was the ground of the termination of the contract, for we do not have the ground on which the decree of ejection was granted. But, in my opinion, there need be no difficulty

No. 58.

Jan. 19, 1888.
Strachan v. Binnie.

house, the right to the franchise, which was founded on these two facts, ceased also.[1] The mistake of the Sheriff-substitute was in holding that mere occupancy, irrespective of right, founded on the contract of service, was sufficient. The respondent's right to occupy had clearly ceased. He had gone out on strike, and his employer had desired him to leave and had obtained decree of ejection against him.

Argued for the respondent;—The respondent had occupied for twelve months prior to 31st July in virtue of his contract. He was still in occupation when the Sheriff came to consider his claim. If it were thought competent to go farther and look at the proceedings in the action of ejection, the case should be remitted for farther statement, as it would be shewn thereby that when the Registration Court was held the employer and the respondent, and others in a like position, were in treaty for a resumption of work.

The Court, on 23d November 1887, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Remit to the Sheriff to amend the case by stating first, whether he had found that the said David Binnie was an inhabitant-occupier of the house in question in respect of any right of tenancy vested in him at the date of the Registration Court, and if so, upon what title? secondly, the grounds in facts and law upon which the decree of removal was obtained; and thirdly, whether it was maintained before him that a contract of employment between the Broxburn Oil Company and the said David Binnie was still in subsistence at the date of the Registration Court, and if so, upon what ground."

The Sheriff-substitute, on 9th December 1887, stated,—"(1) That he found Binnie was an inhabitant-occupier of the house in question, and in possession of the house in respect of a contract with the Broxburn Oil Company that he should occupy the house, pay rent, and work for the company. Both parties were anxious that the contract should be carried out, and as soon as the strike was at an end Binnie would resume work. (2) The decree of removal was granted in a summary ejection case, which formed one of 121 that came up for decision. The facts varied in different cases. No note of the facts was made at the time, and therefore it is scarcely possible now to state accurately what took place in reference to this particular case. A copy of the record in the Court books is annexed. The recollection of the Sheriff-substitute is that the pursuer's procurator urged that Binnie had left the company's employment prior to 19th August last, and that in law the company were entitled, on that ground alone, to have him evicted. At the same time he said the company were anxious the defenders should return to their employment and remain in possession of their houses. In these circumstances the Sheriff-substitute, on 24th August 1887, gave decree of ejection, but superseded execution of the decree till 1st September 1887. (3) The Sheriff-substitute held that the contract still subsisted, and that there was no intention to eject Binnie, as the decree had not been extracted at the time the Court was held. Binnie might have brought a suspension of the decree, or have been reponed. The Sheriff-substitute did not hear counsel for Binnie."

An extract from the Sheriff Court books shewing what had taken place in the action of ejection was also laid before the Court. It shewed only that the action had been contested, and that the decree was extracted on 6th October.

On the Court resuming consideration of the case as amended, neither party desired to add further argument.

---

[1] Smith v. M'Donald, Nov. 26, 1886, 14 R. 125.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—In the present case we have to consider whether David Binnie has proved his right to be put upon the roll,—whether he had, at the time the Sheriff held his Registration Court the necessary qualification. The qualification founded upon here is that which is contained in section 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. c. 3, sec. 3), which provides that "where a man himself inhabits any dwelling-house by virtue of any office, service, or employment, and the dwelling-house is not inhabited by any person under whom such man serves in such office, service, or employment, he shall be deemed for the purposes of this Act, and of the Representation of the People Acts, to be an inhabitant-occupier of such dwelling-house as a tenant." Now, it will be seen that this section is conditional. Two things must be established, the first that the person claiming has been for the requisite period an inhabitant-occupier, the second that he has occupied as tenant,—that is to say, under a contract of service. Tenancy and occupancy, the one as much as the other, must be established. Let us see what was the view of the Sheriff-substitute when he dismissed the objection. He says that he "repelled the objection on the ground that Binnie was an inhabitant-occupier of the house until a decree of ejection was carried out." There is nothing whatever about tenancy there, only inhabitant-occupancy is regarded. That is a misconception, and thinking so we sent back the case for amendment in order to have the other facts brought before us. The amendment made by the Sheriff-substitute states that he found "Binnie was an inhabitant-occupier of the house in question, and in possession of the house in respect of a contract with the Broxburn Oil Company that he should occupy the house, pay rent, and work for the company. Both parties were anxious that the contract should be carried out, and as soon as the strike was at an end Binnie would resume work." For a time, then, after the strike both parties were anxious that the contract should still subsist, but before the Registration Court was held one party had become dissatisfied with the contract, and was unwilling to go on with it. The Sheriff-substitute then says—(His Lordship quoted the second and third paragraphs of the amended case, as printed above). I think there is great difficulty about this ground of judgment. The ground on which the Sheriff-substitute proceeded was that the original contract by virtue of which Binnie entered on occupation was a contract existing at 6th October, the date of the Registration Court. He does not give any effect at all to the view that there was a strike. The contract had, I think, come to an end. The most general case is that a strike takes place either to obtain higher wages or to resist an attempt to reduce wages. These are sufficient causes, it may be, for a strike, but if the men retire from the employment and cease to do work or to earn wages, it is impossible to say that they continue parties to a contract by which they are to earn wages, pay the rents, and have the occupancy of the houses. That is a strong consideration, but not all, for on 24th August decree of ejectment was given. Now, we desired to know the facts which would shew whether at the date of the decree of ejection the contract was terminated. We thought that one way to obtain these facts would be to get the petition on which the decree proceeded. It seems that cannot be given, but a copy of the record in the Court books has been laid before us. From it we see nothing but the fact that decree was pronounced. This does not enable us to see what was the ground of the termination of the contract, for we do not have the ground on which the decree of ejection was granted. But, in my opinion, there need be no difficulty

No. 58.

Jan. 19, 1888.
Strachan v.
Binnie.

on that score. There could be no ground for the decree except that the contract was terminated. Any difficulty that could be raised on that score is met by the consideration that the onus is on the claimant to make out his case. He does not shew us any contract existing at the date of the Registration Court by which he is in tenancy as well as occupancy of the house. On the ground that tenancy is not made out, I am of opinion that we must sustain the objection and disallow the claim.

Lord Kinnear.—I am of the same opinion. I quite understand the view of counsel in thinking it unnecessary to add anything to the argument, for we had a full argument on the original case, and the amended case states no facts requiring further argument. The only difficulty lies in ascertaining what are the facts on which the question is to be decided, and the amended case does not remove that difficulty. It is essential to the supporting of the Sheriff's judgment that we be satisfied not merely that the claimant Binnie is in occupation, but that he is in occupation on a contract of employment. I agree with Lord Craighill that the onus lies on the claimant, and reading the case with that consideration in view I do not come to any conclusion but that the contract on which he held the house was put an end to by the claimant himself. He having done so his employer brought an action of ejection, decree in which was obtained, but the execution of the decree was for reasons I quite appreciate not to take place before 1st September, and had not in fact taken place at the date of the Registration Court. The question for the Sheriff at that Court on 6th October was whether the contract was still in force. The only conclusion I can come to is that the claimant was then occupying by tolerance, and not under any subsisting contract which bound either him or his employer.

Lord Mure.—I come to the same conclusion. The view of the Sheriff, both in the original case and in the amendment, refers to occupation only. He says that he put the claimant on the roll as an inhabitant-occupier, and he states nothing which meets the difficulty caused by the fact that the contract of employment appears to have terminated before the Registration Court was held. By section 3 of the Act of 1884 the basis of this franchise is service or employment. The statute gives it to a man who has the house in respect of his employment or service. The claimant had a house in respect of his employment with the Broxburn Oil Company. When he went out on strike he was no longer working in their employment. If he allowed decree of ejection, also, to go out against him, he lost right to the house. I was anxious when we remitted the case to the Sheriff to see what was the ground on which the decree of ejection proceeded. We have not ascertained that by any statement in the amended case, but it seems certain that it must have proceeded on the ground that the claimant was no longer in the employment. I therefore think that the qualification founded on is bad, and that the Sheriff was wrong in thinking that the claimant was entitled to remain on the roll merely because the "decree had not been extracted at the time the Court was held."

The third question put in our interlocutor sending the case for amendment is whether it was maintained before the Sheriff that a contract of employment between the Broxburn Oil Company and Binnie was still in existence at the date of the Registration Court, and if so, upon what ground. The amended case does not answer that. The Sheriff says that "Binnie might have brought a suspension of the decree, or have been reponed." It may be he might have brought a suspension, but I much doubt as to the reponing, for I see that both the company and he were represented by agents in the ejection process.

No. 58.
Jan. 19, 1888.
Strachan v. Binnie.

I think that when the contract ceased the right to be put on the roll ceased also.

The Court sustained the appeal, and remitted to the Sheriff to expunge from the roll the name of the respondent.

Russell & Dunlop, W.S.—R. R. Simpson, W.S.—Agents.

No. 59.
Jan. 24, 1888.
Taylor's Trustee v. Paul.

George S. Caird (Taylor's Trustee), Appellant.—Low.
William Paul, Respondent.—Balfour—Ferguson.

Process—Appeal—Competency—Cessio—Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 34).—An interlocutor by a Sheriff in a process of cessio under the Debtors Act, 1880, reviewing a trustee's deliverance, and ranking a claimant, may competently be appealed to the Court of Session.

Lease—Sequestration—Compensation—Balancing accounts in bankruptcy.—A tenant under an agricultural lease for nineteen years, having during its currency granted a disposition omnium bonorum, the trustee declined to adopt the lease, but entered into an agreement with the landlord whereby, on the narrative that it was expedient to arrange for laying down the crops for the current year, he continued the occupation of the farm till the following Whitsunday. By a second agreement the landlord agreed to take over and pay for certain articles which were on the farm at a valuation. These articles having been valued, the landlord sought to compensate the claim against him for their value by a debt due to him by the tenant, for which he could only rank as an ordinary creditor. Held that the debt due by the landlord had been incurred subsequently to the tenant's bankruptcy, and could not be compensated by the debt incurred by the tenant prior to bankruptcy.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff.
M.

On 26th January 1887 decree of cessio was pronounced in the Sheriff Court of Stonehaven, on a petition at the instance of William Taylor, farmer, Muchalls, Kincardineshire, and his estates were transferred under the Cessio Acts to a trustee for behoof of his creditors. He was at that time tenant of the farm of Blackbutts, on the estate of Muchalls,—of which Dr John Milne's trustees were proprietors,—holding under a nineteen years' lease from Martinmas 1873 at a yearly rent of £100.

The lease was granted subject to the conditions, stipulations, and reservations contained in the general regulations applicable to the estate of Muchalls, which by article 9 provided that the straw forage and green crops should be used on the farm, and by article 10, inter alia, that at the end of the lease the outgoing tenant should receive from the incoming tenant the value of the ploughing done by the former preceding the term of his removal, but not the value of the land as for a crop. There was also provision for valuing the away-going corn crop and the first year's grass, if the incoming tenant desired to have these. The 10th article also bore:—"The outgoing tenant shall leave at his removal the whole dung prepared during the preceding year, and the value thereof, which shall be ascertained as aforesaid, shall be paid to him by the incoming tenant. The incoming tenant shall have liberty to sow grass seeds with the outgoing tenant's last grain crop, which the latter shall harrow in and roll out without payment." Upon the lease was written,—"8th May 1876.—The proprietors agree to take over by valuation at the end of the lease the threshing-mill on the farm of Blackbutts, if it shall then be in good order and condition, and suitable for the farm. William Paul, for Dr Milne's Trustees."

No. 59.
—
Jan. 24, 1888.
Taylor's Trustee v. Paul.

In February 1887 a minute of agreement was entered into between Mr George S. Caird, the trustee on Taylor's estates, and Mr William Paul, factor for Dr Milne's trustees, as follows:—"The said first party, as trustee foresaid, has intimated that he is not to continue the possession and occupation of said farm of Blackbutts, or to adopt said lease, and it is consequently expedient that an arrangement should be made for the laying down of the grain crops for the present year: Therefore the said George Scott Caird . . . and the said William Paul . . . hereby contract and agree, under reservation of the right of hypothec of the landlords for the rent of said farm for the crop of 1886, for which sequestration was used on or about the 8th day of December 1886, and of their further right of hypothec for the rent of said .farm, payable at Martinmas 1887, and Whitsunday 1888, for crop and year 1887, in so far as the same may be exigible, and subject always to the provisions and stipulations contained in the 10th article of the general regulations and conditions of the estate of Muchalls, . . . and all action competent thereanent, as follows: —(First) that the said first party hereto shall, as trustee foresaid, continue in the occupation of said farm of Blackbutts until the term of Whitsunday next, when he shall remove therefrom as outgoing tenant in manner provided in the said general regulations and conditions, and shall have all the privileges of an outgoing tenant as if the lease had then come to its natural termination; (second) that in the preparation of the ground for the crops of 1887 the first party hereto shall observe the regulations above mentioned, and perform the necessary work in an efficient manner, and lay down the crops at the sight and to the satisfaction of the ground officer on the estate; and (third) that the said first party shall grant at his expense, if required by the said second party, a formal and valid renunciation of said lease in favour of the said proprietors as at and from the term of Whitsunday 1887."

In May 1887 a second minute of agreement was entered into between the same parties under which, after narrating the obligation in the lease on the tenant to leave the houses in good repair, two referees were appointed to inspect the houses on the farm, and to state what sum, if any, would be required to put them into the condition stipulated in the lease, "which sum shall form the amount of the said second party's claim as an ordinary creditor against the said William Taylor's estate." The arbiters were also to value certain articles which were to be taken by the proprietors at a valuation, viz:—"(First) the threshing-mill, water-wheel, and machinery; (second) the whole gates, wire and wood fences on the farm, with the pumps; (third) the berry bushes in the garden; (fourth) the whole dung and manure at present on the farm, or which may yet be made from the current year's crop; (fifth) the grass and clover seeds sown with the last or present year's crop; (sixth) the ploughing and labour employed on the land in preparation for green crop."*

Mr Paul, for the landlords, lodged two claims in Taylor's sequestration, —(1) A preferable claim for £104, 19s. 7d.; and (2) an ordinary claim for £328, 14s. 2d., from which he proposed to deduct £108, 7s. 6d., being

---

* In accordance with that provision the arbiters valued the following subjects:—(1) Grates in house; (2) pump and flag-staff; (3) garden produce; (4) 27 cattle bindings, at 6d. each; (5) the whole fencing on the farm, gates, and two iron gates; (6) threshing-mill; (7) 139 cubic yards 3 feet dung, at 5s. 2d. per yard; (8) ploughing of upper field turnip land, at 18s. per acre; (9) ploughing and labour of field beside houses, at 30s. per acre; (10) green dung. There were certain other charges which need not be specified,—the valuation amounting in whole to £108, 7s. 6d.

No. 59.

Jan. 24, 1888.
Taylor's Trustee v. Paul.

the sum due to the trustee upon the valuations carried out in terms of the minute of agreement second above mentioned, thereby leaving as the amount of the claim the sum of £220, 6s. 8d.

Upon the second branch of the claim the trustee pronounced the following deliverance,—"The trustee is of opinion that the claimants are not entitled to take credit, or to plead compensation, in respect of their claim against the bankrupt for the said sum of £108, 7s. 6d., and thereby to obtain an illegal preference to the prejudice of the other creditors, and the trustee hereby disallows and rejects the said deduction of £108, 7s. 6d., and quoad ultra admits the claim as stated at the sum of £328, 14s. 2d. for a dividend." The trustee stated that he held that the £108, 7s. 6d. should be set against the preferable claim for £104, 19s. 7d., and the balance paid over to him, and he accordingly rejected the preferable claim in toto.

Mr Paul having appealed, by letter addressed to the trustee, against the ranking, the Sheriff-substitute (Brown) on 16th November 1887 pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard parties on the appeal of Mr Paul against the trustee's ranking, makes avizandum therewith"; and on 26th November 1887 he further pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the cause, recalls the deliverance of the trustee: Finds (1) that the claimant, William Paul, is entitled to be ranked preferably on the bankrupt's estate for the sum of £104, 19s. 7d., in terms of his claim No. of process; (2) that the said William Paul is entitled to compensate the amount of the valuations under the minute of agreement, submission, and award referred to by the trustee in his deliverance, by his claim for arrears of rent, amounting to £328, 14s. 2d., and to be ranked as an ordinary creditor for the balance of £220, 6s. 8d., in terms of his claim No. of process: Remits to the trustee to rank the claimant accordingly, and to make up a new list of ranking," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—The circumstances under which this bankrupt estate is in process of being extricated are somewhat peculiar, and to that I am disposed, in a large measure, to impute the error which I think the trustee has made in dealing with the landlord's claim. The position which the trustee takes up is that the valuations due under the lease and the relative regulations of the estate, which have been liquidated by arrangement between the parties, are both by law and covenant payable to him, and that no concourse between landlord and tenant having existed prior to bankruptcy, his duty requires him to retain these sums for division among the general body of creditors.

"Apart from covenant with the trustee, there seems to be no doubt of the extent of the landlord's right. He is entitled to set off arrears of rent against any liquid claim of his tenant, and as the right to set off passes against assignees, legal or voluntary, and as a trustee in bankruptcy takes the estate tantum et tale as it was vested in the bankrupt, the landlord was in a position to enforce his claims, whether he were settling with the trustee or as incoming tenant. The landlord's right rests on the general principle that claims arising hinc inde on a consensual contract may be compensated, and it has been quite decisively established that the effect of bankruptcy is to strengthen the plea of compensation in the mouth of the landlord. In balancing accounts in bankruptcy, Mr Bell (Com. vol. ii. 7th ed. p. 122) says that if one party have failed, and a demand be made upon the other, he will not be obliged to pay the liquid debt, and come in as a creditor only for a dividend, and that is precisely the case here. It appears to me, therefore, that the equitable obligation to permit the landlord to set off claims arising under the lease is a burden on the bankrupt's estate, which the creditors are not entitled to get rid of without the landlord's express consent.

"But the landlord, instead of having lost or compromised the rights which

No. 59.

Jan. 24, 1888.
Taylor's Trustee v. Paul.

The trustee appealed to the Court of Session.

The respondent objected to the competency of the appeal, and argued;—There was no provision for appeal in the Debtors Act of 1880, and the Act of Sederunt of 22d December 1882, which introduced machinery for the working of the Act, only gave a right of appeal from the trustee to the Sheriff, who was to hear the case summarily.* Sec. 7 of the Debtors Act carried one back to the previously recognised procedure under the Cessio Act of 1834 (6 and 7 Will. IV. cap. 56), and the Sheriff Courts Act of 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 70). But under these Acts no judgment was appealable after the final one giving decree of cessio.[1] After that the debtor retired from the process, and the administration of the estate commenced, there being no provision for appeal. Such a proceeding as the present was outwith the petition for cessio altogether. This view was confirmed by the provisions of the 5th and 11th sections of the Bankruptcy and Cessio Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 22). It was the the law gives him by negotiations with the trustee appears to me to have most carefully safeguarded these.

---

"On entering upon his office the trustee found a lease with several years to run, and at once intimated his intention not to continue the tenancy, and on that view there is no doubt he did not adopt the lease. But he proceeded, no doubt with the intention and result of doing the best for the creditors, to invite the landlord to concur in his taking another crop, and having certain claims arising under the lease and the regulations of the estate liquidated, stipulating at the same time that he was to have the privilege of an outgoing tenant, as if the lease had come to a natural termination as at Whitsunday 1887; and in that sense it appears to me that the claimant is perfectly right in his contention that the trustee did adopt the lease. The effect of that adoption was very beneficial to the creditors, for it gave the trustee the benefit of a large deduction of rent; but apart altogether from the question as to who took most advantage from the agreement into which the parties entered, it appears to me that that had the effect of operating not a surrender, but a ratification of the landlord's right. The error into which I conceive the trustee has fallen is in forgetting that the lease is the measure of the rights of parties in regard to all claims arising under it, and he has accordingly misinterpreted the negotiations with the landlord, the effect of which, in my opinion, is very wide of ousting his rights.

"There is no dispute as to the landlord's preferable claim, the only question being whether the landlord is entitled to impute the valuations pro tanto to extinguish his unsecured debt arising from arrears of rent, and the mistake which the trustee makes is in assuming, in taking up the estate or transacting about it, that the concourse which lies at the root of the plea of compensation lies between him and the landlord, instead of being, as it is, between the latter and the tenant."

* The 11th section of the Act of Sederunt provided,—" . . . The debtor or any creditor (notice having been given as above provided) shall be heard orally in support of objections to the trustee's deliverances, admitting in whole or in part claims, and any creditor may in like manner be heard in support of his objections to the rejection in whole or in part of his own claim, and the Sheriff shall, if desired by the trustee, or by the debtor, or by any creditor, make a note of such objections, and of the answers made thereto . . . and on a viva voce hearing, and after such proof, if any, as he may allow (which proof shall be recorded if desired by the trustee or by the debtor or by any creditor) shall dispose of the objections summarily, and settle the rankings of the creditors. The debtor shall be bound to submit at the second meeting to such further examination relative to his affairs as the Sheriff may appoint . . . ."

[1] Adam v. Kinnes, Feb. 27, 1883, 10 R. 670; Galbraith v. Ritchie, Dec. 6, 1856, 19 D. 136, 29 Scot. Jur. 45.

policy of the statutes that the Sheriff's judgment should be final in the winding up of small estates, and where an estate was of large amount the 11th section of the last mentioned statute provided for the cessio being turned into a sequestration under the Bankruptcy Acts.

Argued for the appellant;—The object of the Cessio Acts prior to 1880 was to grant protection to the debtor against imprisonment. Under the Act of that year the process of cessio became a process of distribution. It gave a creditor power to petition for cessio at his own instance, and provision was made for the appointment of a trustee. The new process was one of sequestration for small estates, and looking to the terms of the Act of Sederunt of 1882 it was clearly in the contemplation of the Court that there should be an appeal from the Sheriff just as there was in sequestration processes under the Act of 1856. Further, the 4th subsection of the 9th section of the Act of 1880 (quoted infra in the Lord President's opinion, p. 318) favoured this view. The only question, therefore, was whether the Sheriff had disposed of the whole merits of the case. The interlocutor clearly disposed of the whole merits as between the present claimant and the trustee, and that was sufficient.

Further, it would be most inexpedient that there should be no appeal, looking to the new importance of the process of cessio.

LORD PRESIDENT.—No one can read the interlocutor which it is now sought to bring under review without seeing that it is a judgment pronounced in a process of distribution of a bankrupt estate. The interlocutor would have been very much in the same terms if the estate had been under process of distribution in terms of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856. But it is not under that Act that the present process is brought. It is brought under the Debtors Act of 1880, which provides among other things for a considerable extension of the old process of cessio bonorum.

The Debtors Act of 1880 is very imperfect in itself as regards the details necessary for working out a process of distribution, and it has been supplemented by the Act of Sederunt of 1882. It is under the combined operation of the Act and the Act of Sederunt that this process is going on, and that the Sheriff-substitute is enabled to pronounce the interlocutor now under review. If the Act of Sederunt had not been passed I do not see how the Sheriff could have possibly pronounced the interlocutor, and yet that seems to suggest the very great anomaly that he receives his jurisdiction from the Act of Sederunt instead of from the statute. That is just one of the consequences of such legislation as we see before us in the Act of 1880, which professes to introduce a process of distribution as part of a process of cessio, and yet contains no machinery for carrying that process into effect.

This Court was of opinion that under various Acts of Parliament power was given to them to make regulations regarding proceedings in processes of cessio, and to introduce machinery for the purpose of giving effect to the declaratory provisions of the statute. Accordingly regulations were drawn up in the Act of Sederunt, which we must assume it was in the power of the Court to pass, as nearly as possible in accordance with the regulations provided in the Bankruptcy Act of 1856 for working out that Act. For instance, it is provided in the 6th section of the Act of Sederunt that "the rules of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, regarding the nature and form of affidavits, or claims of creditors for ranking, and the valuation of securities and deductions to be made, and regarding the documents of debt to be produced therewith, shall, mutatis mutandis,

No. 59.

Jan. 24, 1888.
Taylor's Trustee v. Paul.

apply to claiming and being ranked for dividends in processes of cessio." Then there is in the 7th section a provision for the way in which affidavits and claims are to be made, and as to the time when this is to be done; and there is further provision for what is to be done in contemplation of what is called a second meeting, at which all the objections are to be brought up and disposed of by the Sheriff under the 11th section immediately following. It is provided by that section that the Sheriff shall hear parties upon the trustee's deliverance, and shall dispose of the matter summarily, and shall settle the ranking of creditors—that is, he shall dispose of all the claims and objections and the deliverances of the trustee. Nothing is said as to whether the Sheriff's interlocutor is to be final, or whether it is to be subject to appeal, and I think the reason of that is very obvious, because this Court has no power by Act of Sederunt either to confer a right of appeal or to take it away. If it existed before, it remains, and if there was no right of appeal before the Act of Sederunt, then it cannot confer it.

But the deliverances or judgments or interlocutors of a Sheriff pronounced in a process of distribution of a bankrupt estate are all appealable under the Bankruptcy Act of 1856. And even prior to the passing of that Act all deliverances of a trustee were appealable to this Court,—I mean before sequestration processes were appointed to be sent to the Sheriff at all.

So that the class of cases to which the present process belongs were always in use to be brought to this Court on appeal from the deliverance of the trustee, and subsequently to 1856 they were in the first place taken to the Sheriff, who for the first time had jurisdiction in them under the Act of 1856. Accordingly, unless that right of appeal has been taken away, it must still exist. It is no sufficient answer to say that it is provided by the Act of Sederunt that the proceedings before the Sheriff are to be summary—that is not enough. The most summary proceedings are subject to appeal, and the more summary they are the more necessary it appears to be to have a right of appeal in order to prevent abuse. That argument, in my opinion, has nothing to do with the existence of a right of appeal.

But we must look at the Act of 1880, and see what it says on the subject of appeal, because there is in it a section which is obviously intended to give a right of appeal, and whether it is limited to any particular class of interlocutors under that statute or not, or is to be extended to all interlocutors, decrees, and judgments which may competently be pronounced under that Act of Parliament. I am not disposed to admit that the 4th subsection of section 9 of that Act is necessary for the sustaining of the competency of this appeal, but I think the appeal is competent, because the right of appeal has not been taken away. Subsection 4 of section 9 provides that "any judgment or interlocutor or decree pronounced in such petition" (i.e. a petition of cessio brought under this Act) "may be reviewed on appeal in the same form, and subject to the like provisions, restrictions, and conditions as are by law provided in regard to appeals against any judgment or interlocutor or decree pronounced in any other process of cessio bonorum." It must be kept in view that this Act plainly contemplates that a process of cessio shall be in itself a process of distribution. I do not see how it is possible to say that a right of appeal given there against any judgment or interlocutor or decree pronounced in a process of cessio, including a process of distribution, can be restricted to any one class of judgment. The language is in itself quite sufficient to entitle a party to say that he is entitled to appeal against any interlocutor or judgment or decree that may competently be pronounced in the process. It appears to me that on this ground the present appeal is competent.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. Claims in processes of cessio may now be made on affidavits, in the same way as in a sequestration process under the Bankruptcy Act of 1856. This is done under the Debtors Act of 1880, by which a process of cessio is made a process of distribution, and the machinery for giving effect to the provisions of the Act is supplied by the Act of Sederunt of 1882, as explained by your Lordship. The clauses were referred to in the course of the discussion, and it is under the 11th section of the Act of Sederunt that claims which have been made and dealt with by the trustee may be objected to and brought under review. Parties, it is provided, may be heard orally upon those claims, and I may observe that Mr Paul's appeal is contained in his letter addressed to the trustee, and that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 16th November runs,—"Having heard parties on the appeal of Mr Paul against the trustee's ranking," makes avizandum, and on the 26th of November he recalls the deliverance of the trustee.

The question is whether the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, pronounced under this 11th section of the Act of Sederunt, is appealable. It appears to me plain that it is, because the 4th subsection of the 9th section of the Debtors Act, 1880, provides that "any judgment or interlocutor or decree pronounced in such petition may be reviewed on appeal in the same form, and subject to the like provisions, restrictions, and conditions as are by law provided in regard to appeals against any judgment or interlocutor or decree pronounced in any other process of cessio bonorum." We are thus referred back to the earlier Acts, and among them to the Sheriff Courts Act of 1876, which deals with processes of cessio by its 26th section. The 4th subsection of that section enacts that "judgments or interlocutors pronounced in such actions shall be reviewed on appeal in the same form, and subject to the like provisions, restrictions, and conditions as are by law provided in regard to appeals against any judgment or interlocutor pronounced in any other action in the Sheriff's ordinary Court. . . ." Now, the Sheriff's interlocutor of the 26th November is a final judgment relative to Mr Paul's claim in the process. It is no doubt pronounced in an incidental proceeding for the distribution of the estate; but it has been pronounced in a process of cessio, and as the judgment is final it is, I think, appealable under the provisions of the recent statutes.

LORD ADAM.—My view is that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, which is now appealed against, is a competent interlocutor pronounced in a competent process in the Sheriff Court. The action is one subject to the ordinary rules applicable to cases in the Sheriff Court, except in so far as these are competently altered and modified by statutory provision.

The question is whether the Act of Sederunt of 1882 has taken away the right of appeal which, but for it, would undoubtedly have existed. I do not think that the right could competently have been taken away by an Act of Sederunt, and I do not think the Court in passing that Act endeavoured to do what they could not competently do.

This, therefore, being an interlocutor which disposes of the whole merits of the case between the parties in the competition, is a final interlocutor in the process, and being so it may be appealed, and accordingly I think the present objection ought to be repelled.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT accordingly repelled the objection to the competency.

On the merits, argued for the appellant;—The landlord was not entitled to set off the amount of his ordinary claim against the £108, 7s. 6d. due by him as the amount of the valuations under the agreements. The question was whether the debt due by him arose before or after the bankruptcy, because if it arose after it the Sheriff was clearly wrong. There was no irritancy upon bankruptcy under the lease, and a disposition omnium bonorum operated an assignation of the lease to the trustee. If assignees were not expressly excluded by the lease, then it was only in the event of the landlord objecting that exclusion was effected. The Sheriff-substitute had dealt with the case as if the lease came to an end on the 26th January 1887, when the decree of cessio was pronounced. The lease really subsisted until the minutes of agreement were entered into, but they put an end to it, and it was in virtue of them that the claim for £108, 7s. 6d. against the landlord came into existence. The lease not having been adopted by the trustee came to a premature termination by the agreements. The trustee might no doubt be said to have taken up the lease to a limited extent, but that was only for the purpose of granting a renunciation of it, and subject to the modification introduced by the agreements. A debt incurred by the landlord to the trustee after bankruptcy, and in terms of an arrangement subsequently entered into, could not be compensated by a debt incurred by the tenant to the landlord while the tenant was lessee. Besides, the fact that the landlord came under an obligation in the lease to take over certain articles could not prevent other creditors from attaching them. The stipulation in the lease about a valuation was really in the tenant's favour, but viewed as in the landlord's favour it was one of a purely personal nature.[1] The provision in the agreement regarding the dung illustrated the position, for after the decree of cessio was pronounced there was no obligation on the landlord to pay the tenant its value.

Argued for Mr Paul;—The trustee took over the bankrupt's estate tantum et tale as it existed in the bankrupt. While there was not such an adoption on the part of the trustee as to infer a contract on his part which was to continue till the end of the lease, there was a limited adoption to the extent of his intromitting with the subject of the lease, and he was liable for its obligations apart from the agreements subsequently entered into.[2] He was entitled to wind up the lease, and a reasonable period was allowed for this purpose. The items dealt with under the valuation all arose under the lease, and the agreements all depended upon it.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the respondent, Mr Paul, as representing the bankrupt's landlords, has a preferential claim against the bankrupt estate for £104, 19s. 7d. About that there is no dispute, and it is unnecessary to take it into account. But besides the preferential claim, there is also a claim for £328,

---

[1] Stewart v. Rose, 1816, Hume's Dec. 229.

[2] Munro v. Fraser, Dec. 11, 1858, 21 D. 103, 31 Scot. Jur. 70; Kirkland & Sharpe v. Wilson & Son's Trustee, May 17, 1831, 9 S. 596, affd. March 1, 1833, 6 W. & S. 340; Murdoch on Bankruptcy (4th ed.), 92.

No. 59.
Jan. 24, 1888.
Taylor's Trustee v. Paul.

14s. 2d., which it is conceded can only obtain a ranking as an ordinary debt. But the landlords' representative says that he is owing the estate of the bankrupt a sum of £108, 7s. 6d., being the amount of the valuation of certain articles upon the farm, and that upon the ordinary rules of balancing accounts in bankruptcy he is entitled to set the one sum against the other, so that he shall obtain credit in full to the extent of his counter claim, and rank for the balance of £220. If the ordinary rules of balancing accounts are applicable, then that contention is well founded. But the whole matter seems to me to turn upon that consideration, the question being whether the sum of £108, 7s. 6d., which the landlord admits he owes, is a debt which existed at the date of the bankruptcy, or is one of a different description. In the latter case, there will be no balancing of accounts, in the former there may be.

The inquiry which we have to make is how and when did the debt come into existence? I think the answer must be that it came into existence in consequence of two minutes of agreement between the landlords and the trustee under the cessio. The trustee might have adopted the lease of the bankrupt tenant with the assent of the landlords, and in that case he would have become personally tenant for the unexpired period of the lease. But he did not do so. On the other hand, it is contended that all that the trustee did was to enter into possession of the farm, and to intromit with it for the purpose of winding up the lease. There have been many cases in which difficult questions have arisen as to whether there has been adoption of a lease or not, and the solution of them has generally depended upon the conduct of the parties after the bankruptcy takes place. From the conduct of the parties we have frequently had to spell out whether there has been adoption or intromission. But there is no such question here, because the whole matter was arranged between the landlords and the trustee in two distinct written agreements. Accordingly, the question is determined by reference to these agreements without going any further.

By the first of them it is set out that the first party, the trustee, has intimated that he is not to continue the possession and occupation of the farm, or to adopt the lease, and that it is consequently expedient that an arrangement should be made for the laying down of the grain crops for the present year. That statement is to be taken with a certain qualifying provision which follows, because it is agreed that the trustee as trustee shall continue in the occupation of the farm until the following Whitsunday, when he shall remove therefrom in manner provided in the general regulations and conditions, and shall have all the privileges of an outgoing tenant as if the lease had come to its natural termination. Secondly, it is provided that in preparing the ground for the crops of 1887, he shall observe the estate regulations and perform the necessary work in an efficient manner, and lay down the crops; and thirdly, that if required, he shall grant a formal and valid renunciation of the lease at the term of Whitsunday following.

I do not think there can be any doubt about the meaning of that agreement, and that the lease was to be put an end to at the following Whitsunday. Accordingly, there was no adoption of the lease in any proper sense of the term, although there undoubtedly was a continuation of possession and a certain limited adoption for the purpose of putting an end to the lease, and the trustee agrees to do certain things up to Whitsunday in the way of cultivating the farm. He bound himself personally and not the bankrupt, and the landlords,

No. 59.

Jan. 24, 1888.
Taylor's Trustee v. Paul.

on the other hand, bound themselves to the extent that they undertook to give the trustee the privileges of an outgoing tenant.

Accordingly, a second minute of agreement is entered into for the purpose of settling what these privileges are to be, and providing that the landlords were to take over certain things at a valuation. It is needless to go into a specification of these items. But taking both agreements together, it is very clear that what the trustee and the landlords undertook were new obligations which did not exist before these agreements were executed, and which could not have come into existence but for the agreements, which were entered into subsequent to the tenant's bankruptcy. That is sufficient to shew us that the debt incurred by the landlords for the price of the things which they took over was a debt incurred under the agreements, and in following them out, and was non-existent at the date of the bankruptcy. I do not go into details; it is enough to say there are matters dealt with which could not have been brought into a settlement between the landlords and the trustee at the end of the lease. The important thing is that they are brought into existence while the process of division is going on, and subsequent to the date of the bankruptcy.

There is no room, therefore, for applying the principle of balancing accounts, because the £108, 7s. 6d. never was due to the bankrupt. It is a debt due to the trustee personally. No doubt the trustee is acting for the creditors in the matter, but what I mean is that the contract was one between the landlords and the trustee, with which the bankrupt had nothing to do.

I therefore think that the Sheriff has mistaken the nature of the case, and has applied the principle of balancing accounts in a case where it is entirely inapplicable, and that the trustee has taken the proper view of the case.

LORD MURE.—The respondent, as factor for the landlords, has admittedly a preferable claim on the bankrupt estate for £104, 19s. 7d., and it is not disputed that he has also right to rank as an ordinary creditor for £328, 14s. 2d. of arrears of rent. But the main question is whether the respondent is entitled before ranking to deduct from this £328 a sum of £108, 7s. 6d., which he has undertaken under a separate agreement to pay to the trustee, and then to rank for the difference, and so in effect to obtain a preference for that sum. I am of opinion that he is not entitled to make this deduction, and that for the reasons which have been so distinctly laid down by your Lordship.

At the date of the cessio several years of the lease had still to run. It was accordingly necessary for the trustee to make arrangements for the remainder of the lease, and that is made matter of express stipulation between the landlords and the trustee in the first of the two agreements which have been under our consideration. If the matter had stood upon that agreement alone, there could have been no question that the ranking as an ordinary creditor would have been for the £328. The lease would have been renounced in terms of the agreement, and the claim for £108, 7s. 6d. would not then have arisen. But after it was agreed that the lease should be renounced it was sometime afterwards arranged by the second minute of agreement that certain articles on the farm should be taken over by the landlords at a valuation, the price falling to be paid to the trustee under the obligations to that effect undertaken by the respondent in that agreement. Now, this, in the view I take of the case, was the creation of a new debt, and in compliance with the express provisions of that arrangement the amount of the valuation must be paid to the trustee, and credited to the general assets of the bankrupt estate. I see no good grounds in law on which the landlord can claim to set this sum off as a deduction from the amount of his claim as an ordinary creditor on the estate. The sum must, I think, be paid to the trustee, and will thus go to swell the amount of the general bankrupt estate, out of which the landlords will be entitled to rank with the other creditors for the £328 of arrears.

No. 59.

Jan. 24, 1888.
Taylor's Trustee v. Paul.

Lord Adam.—The question is whether the £108, 7s. 6d. was a debt due to the bankrupt prior to his bankruptcy, although liquidated only after the bankruptcy, or a debt due to the trustee and arising after bankruptcy. If it was the former, there is no doubt that the landlords may set off their obligation in this respect against the tenant's obligations to them; if, again, it was the latter, then there was no concursus debiti et crediti.

If the trustee in this case had taken the course open to him at common law, and had not entered into the minutes of agreements which have been before us, the present claim could never have arisen. It was open to him either to abandon the lease, or, on the other hand, to adopt it, in either of which cases his claim would have been a very different one from the present. But he took neither of these courses. He entered into the agreements, and it is under these that this debt of £108, 7s. 6d. has arisen. That being so, it is clear that the debt is due by the one party under the agreements to the other; it is due by the landlords to the trustee, and not to the bankrupt, who was no party to these. The case is not at all such a one as was put by Mr Balfour of an adoption of the lease by the trustee for the purpose of winding up. Under the agreements the parties undertook positive and substantial obligations to each other, for which they were liable in damages to each other if they failed to fulfil them. But that was not adoption for the purpose of winding-up. The obligations arose under agreements to which both were parties, and the landlords cannot set off their liability under the agreements against a debt which was due to them by the bankrupt prior to the execution of the agreements.

Lord Shand was absent.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of date 26th November 1887: Affirm the deliverance of the trustee, and decern: Remit the proceedings back to the Sheriff," &c.

Todd, Murray, & Jamieson, W.S.—Gordon, Pringle, Dallas, & Co., W.S.—Agents.

No. 60.

Jan. 24, 1888.
Forbes v. Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners.

Gordon Forbes, Pursuer (Appellant).—Ure.
Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners, Defenders (Respondents).—C. S. Dickson.

Reparation—Precautions for safety of public—Pond in place accessible to public.—Harbour commissioners in reclaiming land from a river bed in the immediate vicinity of the harbour left a piece of water, about half-an-acre in extent and in some parts over six feet deep, unfenced at a place to which the public had free access. As a boy of sixteen was amusing himself at this place, by floating on a raft which he had made, he fell into the water and was drowned. In an action of damages raised by the boy's father against the harbour commissioners held that no fault had been proved on the part of the defenders, and, therefore, that they were not liable in damages.

No. 60.

Jan. 24, 1888.
Forbes v. Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners.

2d Division.
Sheriff of Aberdeen.
I.

Gordon Forbes, Cove, Kincardineshire, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against the Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners to recover damages for the death of his son, who had been drowned on 28th June 1885 in a piece of water near the harbour on the property of the Harbour Commissioners.

The pursuer averred that the place where his son was drowned was wholly unfenced and unprotected, and was very dangerous, and that, "being within a few yards of public thoroughfares, it was readily accessible to the public on all sides."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defenders having failed to protect and fence the said hole, which was very dangerous, and to which they gave unrestricted access, they are liable in any consequences that may arise therefrom.

The defenders stated that the piece of water was about half-an-acre in extent, and that on the morning of the day when the accident happened the deceased and another lad had been amusing themselves by floating on rafts which they had formed from logs and planks lying in or near the water, and that the deceased when thus engaged had fallen in and been drowned.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The area of water referred to not being situated in close proximity to a public thoroughfare, the defenders were not bound to take any extra precautions in the way of fencing. (4) The deceased's own recklessness and negligence being the direct cause of his death, or having materially contributed thereto, the defenders are not liable in reparation, or otherwise.

The proof shewed that the accident happened in the manner stated by the defenders. It appeared that the piece of water, which was about half-an-acre in extent, was a portion of the old channel of the river Dee, which was being gradually filled up by the Harbour Commissioners. The surface of the pond was from five to ten feet below the surface of the reclaimed ground. The slope around the pond was the natural one formed by the tipping of carts. The reclaimed ground was of considerable extent, and the public had free access to it. The deceased was an apprentice to a joiner who was engaged in erecting a recreation hall near the pond. The place in question was near Market Street, and was resorted to by the public and, in particular, by young people for purposes of amusement. About a fortnight after the accident to the pursuer's son a younger boy, about seven years of age, named Robertson, was drowned at the same spot, and his father in an action in the Sheriff Court recovered damages for his death. It was also proved that when the pool was frozen the Commissioners put up notices that the ice was dangerous.

The Sheriff-substitute (Brown) found that the pursuer's son was drowned through the fault of the defenders, and that they were liable in damages, which he assessed at £100.

On appeal the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) found it not proved that the death of the pursuer's son was due to the fault of the defenders, and therefore assoilzied them.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The negligence of the defenders was clear. The negligence of the pursuer must be as clear as that of the defenders, and not less a cause of the accident.[1] The place was one open to the public, and to which they were in use to come, and the pool was a danger to young persons, who were known to be wont to play there. The boy could not be expected to know the depth of the pool. A boy of his age might be expected to get into just such a danger, and was not bound to guard against it as an older person might be.[1] Besides, here the danger was not manifest. A notice should have been, at the least, put up to shew that the pond was dangerous, as had been done when ice was on the pool.

---

[1] M'Martin v. Hannay, Jan. 24, 1872, 10 Macph. 411, 44 Scot. Jur. 230.

The respondents were not called on.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—This is a sad casualty, but I am entirely of the same opinion as the Sheriff. I think that no case at all of fault on the part of the Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners has been made out, so far as this accident is concerned.

I have no doubt the judgment was right in the case of the boy named Robertson, for the boy there was only seven years of age, and so was incapable of taking care of himself. I think there did exist a danger for boys of that age which the defenders were bound to provide against. But for a boy of sixteen years old I think there was no such danger and no obligation on the Commissioners to provide against his voluntary acts. I have always thought that the term contributory negligence is very much misapplied. The obligation of an employer, for example, is not lessened, nor is a proprietor or master, as the case may be, liberated from his obligation by the act of the person who suffers by his own negligence. If the obligation of the master be once admitted, that obligation continues as much where there is negligence of the other party as before. It is not a question of contract, but only this, that while a man is entitled to be protected from ordinary risks, he is not entitled to increase these risks, and, having so increased them, to be protected against them if he suffers in any way.

I see no ground in the facts of this case for the application of the doctrine of contributory negligence. The boy saw the danger, and knew it well, equally as did his fellows, who used to float on rafts on the water. Probably, no fence would have kept them out. The boy's death resulted from a piece of adventurous foolhardiness for which the Commissioners are not responsible. We must therefore, I think, affirm the Sheriff's judgment.

Lord Craighill.—I am of the same opinion. This accident took place in broad daylight. The boy was left in charge of his fellow-workmen's tools, but left his charge and went to enjoy himself. He was sixteen years of age—a boy old enough to take care of himself, and to take the risk. I do not think there was any obligation, as suggested, on the Commissioners to keep a watchman to warn boys of sixteen off the sheet of water.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark concurred.

Lord Young was absent.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel for the pursuer on his appeal, find that he has failed to prove that his son's death is attributable to the fault of the defenders: Therefore dismiss the appeal, and affirm the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against."

Ronald & Ritchie, S.S.C.—Morton, Neilson, & Smart, W.S.—Agents.

---

[1] Galloway v. King, June 11, 1872, 10 Macph. 788, 44 Scot. Jur. 449; M'Gregor v. Ross & Marshall, March 2, 1883, 10 R. 725; Sharp v. Pathhead Spinning Co., Jan. 30, 1885, 12 R. 574; Findlay v. Angus, Jan. 14, 1887, 14 R. 312.

No. 61.

Jan. 25, 1888.
Cruickshank v. Gow & Sons.

WILLIAM VINCENT CRUICKSHANK, Pursuer (Appellant).—Fleming.
J. GOW & SONS, Defenders (Respondents).—Shaw.

Process—Mismomer in Summons—Interdict.—A small-debt summons was raised against "William Cruickshanks," and was served personally on William Vincent Cruickshank, who did not defend the action. Decree was obtained and a charge given thereon, and a poinding followed. William Vincent Cruickshank then brought an action to have the sale under the poinding interdicted, and for damages, on the ground that his name was "William Vincent Cruickshank," that he was not the William Cruickshanks who was the pursuer's debtor, and that he had intimated by letter when the summons was served that he knew nothing of the alleged debt. Held that he ought to have defended the action, and that his action came too late.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

WILLIAM VINCENT CRUICKSHANK, compositor, 78 Waddell Street, Glasgow, brought an action, on 18th August 1886, against J. Gow & Sons, upholsterers, Glasgow, in the Sheriff Court there, concluding (first) to have the defenders interdicted from selling certain furniture belonging to the pursuer under an alleged extract small-debt decree containing warrant to poind; and (second) for £25 as damages.

He stated that on 13th July 1886 while he was confined to the house by illness, the defenders sent a messenger to him for payment of an alleged account, that he told the messenger he had never bought any goods from the defenders and owed them no account, and was then informed that the defenders had employed an officer of Court to recover the account, that his wife called on the officer and explained that he owed the defenders nothing, and that the officer promised that the matter would be inquired into and a letter of apology for her trouble would be sent her; that on 29th July 1886 a small-debt summons at the defenders' instance against "William Cruickshanks" was served upon him with a relative account against "William Cruickshanks, 70 Waddell Street"; that he sent a letter on 3d August to the officer whose name was on the summons, saying that he had received it but knew nothing of the alleged debt,* but that the defenders without inquiry proceeded with their action, took decree against the defender named in the summons, and thereafter wrongfully executed the poinding of the pursuer's effects now complained of. He further averred;—"The said decree is not ex facie regular. The summons bears to be in name of William Cruickshanks, 78 Waddell Street, while the relative account thereto annexed is in name of the same person at 70 Waddell Street. The pursuer avers that there was formerly a William Cruickshank or Cruickshanks at 70 Waddell Street, and he believes that the latter, who was a tailor, must be the debtor of the defenders." He further stated that he had lived seven years at 78 Waddell Street, and never dealt with the defenders or received any account from them till that rendered with the summons, and that his credit and feelings had been injured by the publication of the decree in the local newspapers.

The defenders admitted that the summons was against "William Cruickshanks." They stated that their decree was against the pursuer, that it was obtained on 5th August, and that he was charged on it on 6th August.

They pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The pursuer not having taken the usual means of having the decree reviewed, he is not entitled to have the same set aside now, as the judgment has become final and is not open to review.

---

* The letter, receipt of which was admitted, bore,—"Sir,—I received a summons to attend Court on Thursday first at your instance, for an account of furniture supplied in 1882 by J. Gow & Sons, which I never received, and know nothing about.—Yours, etc., W. V. Cruickshank."

No. 61.

Jan. 25, 1888.
Cruickshank v. Gow & Sons.

The pursuer in obedience to an interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute consigned the sum of £12, being that contained in the decree.

The Sheriff-substitute (Spens) sustained the defenders' third plea, and assoilzied them.

On appeal the Sheriff (Berry) adhered.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The case was ruled by Brown v. Rodger.[1] There a mistake in the defender's name led to a suspension of the proceedings, and the Court refused a proof that the suspender had been personally cited and personally charged on the decree.

Argued for the respondents;—The decree was against the pursuer. The mistake Cruickshanks for Cruickshank was trifling, and did not excuse the defender for not defending the action. If the defence was good on the merits it should have been stated. This was an attempt to get the case re-tried. The only way to do so was under the Small-Debt Act, 1837 (1 Vict. cap. 41), sec. 16.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that the appellant has himself to blame. It seems that, though the summons was served upon him with the relative account appended, he took no proper steps to have the error rectified which he now says there was. I do not see that we would now be justified in interfering.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—This man got the summons and the account. There was the same alleged error of name in both. But he remained at home and took no steps to prevent decree being taken against him. I think he has now no answer.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think the only question is whether there is or is not a decree against the pursuer of this action. If there is, it can be enforced, and we cannot interfere on the merits. But it is said—and I think it is the only thing that can be said—that the decree is no decree against the pursuer, because the only decree which exists, and which is said to be against him, does not set forth his name correctly. If that be well founded I think the pursuer is entitled to redress. The question therefore comes to be whether when the summons was left at the pursuer's house, and it was erroneous only to the extent of the name being spelt Cruickshanks instead of Cruickshank, he was entitled to disregard it and assume that it was not intended for him at all, and that the decree would not affect him. I do not think he was entitled to take up that position. I think a person in the pursuer's position must know whether a summons is intended for him, and that if the objection to it is good he is bound to appear and state it, or, if he do not, and decree goes out against him, the slight error will not avail to make the decree not a decree against him.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, affirmed the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff appealed against, and of new assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the action.

WINCHESTER & NICOLSON, S.S.C.—M'GREGOR & COCHRANE, S.S.C.—Agents.

---

[1] Brown v. Rodger (Morton's Factor), Dec. 13, 1884, 12 R. 340; cf. also Spalding v. Valentine, July 4, 1883, 10 R. 1092.

No. 62.

Jan. 25, 1888.
Jones' Trustee v. Jones.

JAMES TAYLOR (Jones' Trustee), Pursuer (Respondent).—Sir Charles Pearson—Kennedy.
MARIA BORLAND JONES, Defender (Appellant).—Goudy—A. S. D. Thomson.

Bankruptcy—Cash payment by insolvent debtor to conjunct and confident person—Fraud.—A trader employed his daughter as a saleswoman in December 1883. In December 1885, being insolvent, he attempted unsuccessfully to compound with his creditors. Thereafter the daughter, at a time when she believed sequestration to be imminent, obtained from him payments amounting to £69 as the alleged amount of two years' wages. On 10th March 1886 the trader was sequestrated.

In an action by the trustee for repetition of the amount paid to the daughter as a fraudulent preference, held that the pursuer was entitled to repetition,—the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Craighill holding, that assuming the alleged debt to be due to the defender, the payment was a fraudulent preference; Lord Craighill further holding with Lord Rutherfurd Clark that the resting owing of the alleged debt had not been proved.

Opinion (per Lord Rutherfurd Clark) that if the debt had been due to the defender she would, on the principle of Thomas v. Thomson (3 Macph. 358), have been entitled to retain the payments made to her.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
L.

THE estates of Robert Jones, hardware merchant, 104 Gallowgate, Glasgow, were sequestrated on 10th March 1886.

In September 1886, James Taylor, the trustee, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire against Maria Borland Jones, the bankrupt's daughter, for payment of £69 as part of the sequestrated estate. He stated that the proceeds of stock realised by the bankrupt and his family within about three months before the sequestration had been transferred to the bankrupt's family without true, just, and necessary cause and without value, in defraud of his creditors, and that the defender had so received, on 27th February 1886, £19, on 4th March £29, on 8th March £18, and on 30th March £3, amounting in all to £69, the sum sued for. Further, he averred that the defender was conjunct and confident with the bankrupt, by reason both of her near relationship and of knowledge of his business, and had received the £69 well knowing that he was insolvent and that his creditors were thereby defrauded.

The defender denied these statements. She averred that she had been assistant and saleswoman with the bankrupt from 17th December 1883 till 22d December 1885, at 15s. per week, together with her board, and had received no payment of her wages during that time, but that at the dates of payment mentioned, and after an attempted private settlement of her father's affairs had fallen through, she had demanded and received in part payment of her wages the sum sued for.

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The said sums having been handed over by the bankrupt and received by the defender in the knowledge of the bankrupt's insolvency within sixty days of bankruptcy, and having been handed over gratuitously and without just, true, and necessary cause, and the bankrupt being still insolvent, the transaction constitutes an alienation struck at by the Act 1621, cap. 18, and a fraud against Robert Jones' creditors reducible at common law.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The bankrupt having been justly indebted to defender in said sums as wages due to her for services rendered, he was entitled to pay the same on receiving a discharge thereof. (2) The sums paid to defender being for value, and for a true, just, and necessary cause, the transaction in question is not struck at by the Act 1621, cap. 18, and is not reducible at common law.

The Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) allowed the defender a proof of her averments, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation.

From the proof it appeared that prior to December 1885 the bankrupt kept no books. The defender, a young woman of about 25, lived in family with her father. She and her father and brother deponed that she, having previously been assisting at intervals, was verbally engaged in December 1883 to serve in the shop in place of a man named Smith who was leaving; that his salary was 22s. a-week, and hers was fixed at 15s., the remaining 7s. being taken as the value of her board, and that she served continuously thereafter till December 1885; that the wages of other servants were paid weekly, but that the defender had never received payment of her wages until she threatened to leave, when she received the sums sued for. The defender explained this by saying that knowing her father to have demands upon him, she let the question of her wages rest till after the failure of a proposed composition arrangement which was under discussion between the bankrupt and his creditors in December 1885 and January 1886. She stated that in these negotiations her claim, along with a claim by her brother for repayment of a loan of £129, was laid before the creditors, and that both claims were admitted to be good. After these negotiations fell through, the defender began in February 1886 to press her father for her wages, saying she would leave if they were not paid, and "kept at him till I got all the payments" which were the subject of the action. The defender then knew that sequestration must follow.

It appeared from a cash-book that payments to the amount of £69 were made to the defender, and of £129 to her brother, between February and the date of sequestration, which exhausted the bulk of the drawings, and that no trade debts were paid in cash during that period. The defender and her brother were then in the management of the shop. After the sequestration she set up another business of the same kind as the bankrupt's, and the bankrupt lived with her, and was, at least in part, supported by her.

Persons who had formerly been employed in the bankrupt's business deponed that the defender was well qualified for the business, and that her services were worth 22s. per week.

The Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) found "that the defender is the daughter of Robert Jones, formerly hardware merchant in Gallowgate, and that she was in his employment as saleswoman from December 1883 till his estates were sequestrated . . . Finds that the said Robert Jones became insolvent in or before December 1885, and that his circumstances were well known to the defender: Finds that an attempt to carry through an arrangement for the bankrupt's discharge on payment of a composition failed, and that a sequestration followed on 10th March 1886, in which the pursuer was appointed trustee: Finds that between 27th February and 30th March, inclusive, and after the attempt to carry the said proposed arrangement had failed, the bankrupt paid to the defender various sums in name of wages alleged to have been earned by her and unpaid, amounting in all to £69: Finds that it is not proved that the defender's wages during the whole period of her employment in the bankrupt's shop were unpaid and resting owing when these sums respectively were paid to her, and separatim, and on the assumption that the defender's wages were unpaid, that these payments were made fraudulently, either for the purpose of giving the defender a preference over the bankrupt's other creditors, or of defeating their just claims, and that the pursuer is at common law entitled to repetition thereof: Therefore decerns as craved."

On appeal the Sheriff (Berry) adhered.*

---

* "NOTE.—If I felt myself shut up by the evidence to the view that the defender in this case was a true creditor of her father to an amount equal to or

No. 62.

Jan. 25, 1888. Jones' Trustee v. Jones.

The defender appealed, and argued;—This being a cash payment the Act 1621, cap. 18, could not apply. At common law a cash payment to a creditor shortly prior to sequestration, even though he knew the debtor to be insolvent, was not reducible.[1] Nor was this doctrine weakened by exceeding the sum of £69, which was paid to her at or about the time of her father's sequestration, I should have difficulty in deciding the case in favour of the pursuer. Whether the rule of law be an expedient one or not, it seems to me that the decisions do establish it as a rule that a payment in cash by an insolvent person to a creditor is a valid payment which cannot be set aside, although both debtor and creditor are aware at the time of the payment that the debtor is insolvent. Undoubtedly the circumstances here make it a strong case in which to allow such a rule of law to be applied in the creditor's favour. It is obvious that the daughter knew that sequestration was unavoidable, and that it was impossible that her father could retrieve his position; but in the absence of authority for the proposition that knowledge of the debtor's circumstances being so hopeless justifies an exception to the rule which I have stated, and is sufficient to make the payment fraudulent and reducible at law, I do not think I am free to recognise such an exception. The decision in Thomas v. Thomson, 3 Macph. 358, seems to me to lead to that conclusion. On a consideration of the evidence, however, I do not feel myself shut up to the conclusion that it has been proved on the part of the defender that a valid debt to the amount of £69 was resting owing to her by her father as she alleges. I think in the circumstances that the burden of proof lies upon her to establish the existence of the alleged debt, and she has, in my opinion, failed to sustain that burden. There can be no doubt that she acted in the shop as her father's saleswoman. What her remuneration was to be is spoken to only by herself, her father, and her brother, and whether any part of her remuneration or wages was paid to her during the period of two years, for which the agreement is said to have subsisted, depends on the evidence of her father and herself, the alleged debtor and creditor. No doubt her brother also speaks of his being 'aware' that his sister never got any wages during the two years, but he did not live in family with his father and his sister, and it is plain that his evidence on that point cannot be of any weight. At the best it can only be hearsay evidence, for he cannot possibly know whether his father did or did not make any payment to his sister. Taking then the case of the alleged non-payment as depending on the evidence of the alleged debtor and creditor, I cannot regard it as proved that no payment during the whole period of two years was made of the wages which are said to have been agreed upon. There is strong improbability in face of the allegation to that effect. It is hardly credible that, if the daughter was entitled to wages in cash at the rate 15s. a-week, she would have remained for two years without making any demand for payment. The practice in the father's business seems to have been to pay all other wages or salary weekly or at short intervals, and no sufficient explanation is given for a similar course not having been followed in regard to the defender. No doubt she boarded with her father, and had not to pay for board and lodging, but she must have required articles of clothing, although it is said that she was well provided in that way, for during a period of two years clothing which she had at the commencement of it can hardly have been sufficient. The story is attended with such suspicion that I cannot regard it as proved. I think, therefore, that the pursuer is entitled to succeed, on the ground that it is not shewn that a just debt to the amount of £69 was owing to the defender at the time of the bankruptcy. In considering the law of the case, I have confined myself to the rules of common law, and have avoided considering the question under the first branch of the Act of 1621. The language of that statute is not favourable to its being applicable to the case of payment in cash, and although there are obvious dangers in allowing such payments not to be included within its operation, I do not feel justified, in the absence of authority, in holding that such a case falls within the scope of the statute."

[1] Thomas v. Thomson, Jan. 13, 1865, 3 Macph. 358, 37 Scot. Jur. 166; Coutts' Trustee and Doe v. Webster, July 8, 1886, 13 R. 1112.

No. 62.

Jan. 25, 1888.
Jones' Trustee v. Jones.

the case of Shaw's Trustee,[1] for the basis of that decision was that cessio proceedings had already begun and an order been pronounced in them before the payment was made, which the trustee was held entitled to challenge. The proof shewed that there was a debt due to the defender. It had been established that the defender gave her whole services to the bankrupt. Such services presumed a right to remuneration. The Sheriffs seemed to think some special onus was on the defender, and that her evidence and that of the bankrupt needed corroboration. But she had no further burden of proof than to prove that her services were rendered. In such a case no other proof could be imagined than that which she had supplied.

Argued for the pursuer;—It was unnecessary to consider whether the Act 1621, c. 18, applied. The common law would reach the case.[2] Professor Bell's doctrine in the passages cited was not contradicted in Coutts' Trustee v. Webster. The defender had to prove that the debt was (1) an honest debt, and (2) resting owing, and had failed to do so. The cardinal fact in the case was that this alleged debt was on the defender's own shewing paid, after much pressure, by the bankrupt, after a proposal for composition had fallen through. If it was an honest debt, the ground for the bankrupt's hesitation was hard to understand. The presumption from the facts was that the defender like other servants had been paid or satisfied from time to time, and this all the more that she was the daughter of the bankrupt. It was further to be presumed in law that her services were given for nothing.[3] The case was one of a conjunct and confident person who had control over the business, and in the knowledge of the bankrupt's irretrievable insolvency took payment out of the business, leaving all others unpaid. There was enough to put the case into the same class as that of Shaw's Trustee. There was, to use the words of Lord Craighill in that case, "aiding and abetting" in a transference of a great part of the insolvent's estate to a favoured creditor.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question relates to the payment made to or retained by a daughter, of a sum said to be the amount of two years' wages in the service of her father, who has become bankrupt.

It appears that the daughter succeeded in the management of the business of her father a regular shopman, who had left the employment. She says it was agreed that she was to have wages at 15s. per week. There is no evidence to the contrary, and the father and brother concur in the defender's statement. The first question is whether the statement is true,—whether she was entitled at the dates at which she obtained the payments in question, as her father's creditor, to a sum in respect of unpaid wages at 15s. per week. In ordinary circumstances that is a simple issue. She was the shopwoman actually conducting the business in the father's shop in the face of the public. Prima facie, if she had been a stranger, she must have had wages. Now, her being a daughter does not disentitle her to wages, and the only persons who could give evidence to the effect that she was so entitled are examined.

But it is said that even if she had a right against her father, she was not entitled to receive the payment in question in the circumstances in which it was made. At that point the case assumes a very different aspect. The simple

---

[1] Shaw's Trustee v. Stuart & Bisset, Nov. 15, 1887, ante, p. 32.

[2] Main v. Fleming's Trustees, June 30, 1881, 8 R. 881; Shaw's Trustee v. Stuart & Bisset, supra.

[3] Bell's Com. 226-228 (7th ed.); Fraser, Parent and Child, 45-46.

No. 62.

Jan. 25, 1888.
Jones' Trustee v. Jones.

narrative of the facts is this: The father was in difficulties in December 1885. A meeting of creditors was called, at which the various claims were discussed, and a proposal for a composition settlement was entertained for consideration. I attach, for my part, some importance to the fact that the claims of this sister and brother were then tabled, and as there is no denial of that upon record, I assume that they were considered and admitted. It is said that that may be true enough, but that a fraud was committed upon the other creditors, because in the full knowledge of the father's insolvency the daughter retained the amount of her own debt out of the money she drew in the business. Now, holding, as I do, that the claim for wages is sufficiently made out, which I see no reason to doubt, I am still of opinion that for the daughter to take full payment as a creditor in the knowledge of insolvency, and while acting as a servant, amounted to an illegal preference, and was a fraud upon the other creditors. A creditor obtaining a preference in such circumstances as that comes within the common law rule. There is here no case under the Act 1696. I doubt if there is a case under the Act 1621. But I think it is a simple case of a fraud at common law. I think that after what took place, and the knowledge she had of her father's insolvency, she was not entitled to take payment as she did.

Lord Craighill.—I am of the same opinion. The case is peculiar, and I know of none in which a payment has been sustained in such circumstances. There was not here a cash payment by the father to the daughter. On the contrary, the truth of the case is, that once the compromise fell through the daughter decided to get, at all hazards, payment of her alleged claims. She insisted with her father for payment, and threatened to leave if it were not made. So we see there was an unwillingness on the father's part to pay her. What occurred after that was that the father seems to have consented that the money drawn partly by sales and partly by the collection of the accounts in his business, which his son and daughter were managing, should be applied by them in payment of their demands. That is what took place according to the way in which I read the evidence of the son and daughter. That is not a cash payment by the father, but, on the contrary, a taking payment by the son and daughter out of the drawings of the business which they managed. The business was just handed over to one creditor to the prejudice of the others. To say that that transaction cannot be impugned at common law is to state a proposition which I cannot accept. The business seems to have been really being carried on for the benefit of the son and daughter (the world knowing nothing of it), to accomplish a preference for them. That preference, I think, cannot stand.

Further, while I put my judgment on the same ground as your Lordship, I doubt the constitution of the debt. The evidence of the parties interested is inconsistent with their conduct. I agree with the Sheriff in thinking that if week by week a debt of 15s. had become owing and payable to the daughter, she would not have been content to be paid nothing, when all the other persons connected with the business were being paid.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I agree in thinking that the judgment of the Sheriff should be affirmed, and upon the grounds which the Sheriff has assigned. If I thought it proved that there was a just debt due to the daughter, the appellant, I should hold that the case of Thomas v. Thomson applied, and I should feel myself bound to follow that decision, not only because of the decision itself, but of the repeated approval of it in subsequent cases. Nor do I see in any of the facts of this case any fraud upon the creditors beyond what was there held not to be fraud.

No. 62.

Jan. 25, 1888.
Jones' Trustee v. Jones.

But while that is so, I think that in a case of this kind it is incumbent on the person who has received payment of the alleged debt to shew clearly that the debt was due. A person who has received payment of a sum from an insolvent person, knowing him to be so, must be prepared to shew that his alleged debt is an honest and true one, otherwise the payment will not be sustained. I think there is nothing like sufficient proof of that here. I am not going to examine the proof at length. We have the statement by the father of the daughter's engagement, and so far that is corroborated by the son. But mere evidence of an engagement is not sufficient. The appellant must prove also that the alleged claim for wages arising under it was subsisting at the time when the payment was made, or, in other words, that she did not in the two years receive a farthing of remuneration for her services. It is, I think, impossible to believe that, if this relation were indeed established, it was so acted upon. I am therefore very clearly of opinion that there has not been sufficient proof of the existence of the debt.

On these grounds I am also for affirming the judgment of the Sheriff.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find it not proved that the sum of £69 received and retained by the defender out of funds belonging to her father was due and resting owing by him to her on account of wages as alleged: Therefore dismiss the appeal, and affirm the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and of the Sheriff appealed against: Of new decern in terms of the conclusions of the action."

GREGOR M'GREGOR, S.S.C.—W. R. PATRICK, L.A.—Agents.

No. 63.

Jan. 26, 1888.
Lord Advocate v. Duke of Buccleuch.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, Pursuer (Respondent).—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—A. J. Young.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH AND QUEENSBERRY, Defender (Reclaimer).—R. Johnstone—Low.

Revenue—Succession-Duty—Unlet shootings—Succession-Duty Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. c. 51), sec. 21.—Held that a successor to landed property is subject, under sec. 21 of the Succession-Duty Act, 1853, to succession-duty in respect of unlet shootings.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Fraser.
M.

IN November 1887 the Lord Advocate, on behalf of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, raised an action in the Court of Session against His Grace the Duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry, concluding for payment of £606, 1s. 4d., with interest, being the amount of the first six instalments of succession-duty alleged to be payable by the defender "in respect of the value of the unlet shootings on landed estates in Scotland to which, or the income thereof, the defender became beneficially entitled as successor on the death of" the late Duke on 16th April 1884.

The pursuer alleged that the defender had not included, as he ought to have done, the annual value of the shootings which were unlet on the estates at the time of his succession in the returns rendered by him for the purposes of the Succession-Duty Act, 1853. He further stated that the annual value of the shootings amounted to £6815, 5s. 7d. at the date of the succession. The succession-duty thereon, calculated under the provisions of sec. 21 of the Succession-Duty Act, 1853,* amounted to £808, 1s. 9d., payable in eight instalments, of which six were past due.

The defender averred that the shootings of the Buccleuch and Queensberry estates had never been let prior to his succession. Further, "that at and prior to the date of the defender's succession the shootings referred to yielded no income or profits, and that the present is the first claim which has been made for payment of succession-duty upon the value of unlet shootings."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The annual value of the unlet shootings ought to be taken into account in ascertaining the value of the interest to which the defender became entitled on succeeding to his father in the said estates. (2) Succession-duty being chargeable at one per cent on the value of an annuity equal to the annual value of the said shootings, the pursuer is entitled to decree for the instalments thereof which have already fallen due, with interest at four per cent from the dates when each instalment became payable.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant, and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) The defender should be assoilzied in respect that the said shootings were yielding no annual income when he succeeded, and had not previously been let.

He subsequently added a plea that, in any view, the claim of the pursuer was excessive.

On 12th January 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) pronounced an interlocutor in which he repelled the defender's 1st and 2d pleas in law, and appointed the cause to be put to the roll for further procedure.†

---

* By section 21 of the Succession-Duty Act of 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. c. 51), it is provided that "the interest of every successor . . . in real property shall be considered to be of the value of an annuity equal to the annual value of such property, . . . payable from the date of his becoming entitled thereto in possession, and every such annuity for the purposes of this Act shall be valued according to the tables in the schedule annexed to the Act."

† "OPINION.—It was stated at the debate that this is the first case in which a claim for succession-duty on unlet shootings has been made the subject of judicial discussion in Scotland, though the revenue department have been in use to make the claim and have exacted the duty, and it was also stated, and not contradicted, that such claims have been made and regularly sustained in England. The whole question turns upon the construction of the 21st section of the Succession-Duty Act of 1853, which is in the following terms, so far as bearing upon the point here raised:—'The interest of every successor, except as hereinafter provided, in real property shall be considered to be of the value of an annuity equal to the annual value of such property.' The fact that by the Act 49 Vict. cap. 15, unlet shootings must now be valued and enter the Valuation-roll has no bearing upon the question as to the liability for succession-duty under the Act of 1853. The Valuation Act and the various amendments upon it were all subsequent to the Succession-Duty Act, and consequently the only matter here to be determined is the construction of the 21st section of the latter Act. The defender admits that a proprietor cannot escape liability for duty merely by allowing his lands to go to waste. But, on the other hand, it is said that if he makes a reasonable use of his property, and if by such reasonable use no annual income is returned, then there is no liability. At the time when the succession here opened none of the shootings of the Duke of Buccleuch were let—they were all in his own hands; but how he disposed of the game there is no averment on the one side or the other. It must be assumed therefore in the

No. 63.

Jan. 26, 1883.
Lord Advocate v. Duke of Buccleuch.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The words "annual value" in the 21st section of the Succession-Duty Act must be held to mean the value which the property was actually yielding at the date of the succession. Here admittedly at that date the shootings were yielding nothing, and never had yielded anything.[1] [LORD PRESIDENT.—In estimating the value of estates for the purpose of settling the amount of provisions under the Entail Acts, unlet shootings are taken into account.] That was admitted, and those cases which decided that point, so far as they went, were directly against the defender's contention here, but they were under a different statute, and the valuation was made for a totally different purpose.

Argued for the Lord Advocate;—The question was precisely decided by the cases referred to by the Lord President under the Aberdeen Act.[2] The shootings certainly had a value though they were unlet, and that value ought to be taken into account, even though they were not in the Valuation-roll at the date of the succession.[3]

LORD PRESIDENT.—I cannot find any ground for doubting the soundness of the Lord Ordinary's judgment. Section 21 of the Succession-Duty Act provides that "the interest of every successor, except as hereinafter provided, in real property, shall be considered to be of the value of an annuity equal to the annual value of such property" after making certain allowances. The words we are to construe are "annual value of such property." Everything else is quite plain. The question raised is whether the value of unlet shootings is part of the "annual value of such property." If this question had been quite open it might perhaps have admitted of a good deal of argument; but unfortunately there is a class of cases, not indeed under the same Act, but in pari materia, and under a clause very like the present in expression, which I think are conclusive of the matter. The case of Menzies and the case of Leith decide that in estimating the annual value of an entailed estate, for the purpose of fixing the amount of locality lands, or of children's provisions under the Aberdeen Act, unlet shootings must be taken into account. As regards the case of Leith, in particular, the words of the Aberdeen Act are the yearly "value" of said lands as at "the death of the granter"; while here it is the "annual value of such property" as at the death of the predecessor. I do not see any distinction; and I therefore hold these decisions to be not only applicable to, but conclusive of, the present question. I am therefore for adhering.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. I think this case is ruled by the Duke's favour that all the game obtained on the land was disposed of without pecuniary return therefor. And, taking the case upon that footing, what does it come to? He is the owner of property which admittedly has annual value, and such being the case it comes within the very words of the Act of Parliament. The only case relied upon by the defender as bearing upon the question was that of the Attorney-General v. Sefton (2 Hurlst & Colt, 362, 11 Clark's H. of L. cases, 257), but the answer is that in that case it was admitted that there was no annual value derivable from the property, which is not the case here."

---

[1] Attorney-General v. Lord Sefton, 1863, 2 Hurl. & Colt, 362 and 1865, 11 Clark (H. of L.) 257; Lord Advocate v. Marquis of Ailsa, Oct. 28, 1881, 9 R. 40.

[2] Leith v. Leith, June 10, 1862, 24 D. 1059, 34 Scot. Jur. 523; Macpherson v. Macpherson, May 24, 1839, 1 D. 794, Aug. 13, 1846, 5 Bell's App. Ca. 280.

[3] Menzies v. Inland Revenue, Jan. 18, 1878, 5 R. 531.

No. 63. Jan. 26, 1888. Lord Advocate v. Duke of Buccleuch.

principle of previous decisions. The case of Menzies was decided after gre deliberation, and on the ground that unlet shootings were in reality lands a heritages. The old view was that shootings were a privilege; but it came be decided that shootings are really just part of the rent or value of the lan and that if they were unlet you were getting the value which you would ha otherwise had in the shape of rent.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

D. CROLE, Solicitor of Inland Revenue—GIBSON & STRATHERN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 64. Jan. 27, 1888. Rose v. Stevenson.

ANDREW ROSE, Pursuer (Respondent).—Watt.
JAMES STEVENSON AND OTHERS, Defenders (Reclaimers).—J. Reid.

Title to sue—Decree for expenses—Assignation.—A defender obtained decree for expenses against the pursuer, and thereafter assigned his inter therein to a third party. The assignee raised an action for the amount of expenses against persons who were not named in the decree, averring they had been the true domini litis in the former action. Held (reversing j ment of Lord Lee, Ordinary) that he had no title to sue.

1st Division. Lord Lee. B.

ANDREW BRODIE AND MALCOLM NEIL, weavers, Kilbarchan, raised action of declarator of right of way against Mr Thomas Mann of Glentya in the county of Renfrew. Mr Mann defended the action. After sundr procedure, including an appeal to the House of Lords and a petition to th Court of Session, to have the judgment of the House of Lords applie Mr Mann was assoilzied from the conclusions of the action; and the pur suers Andrew Brodie and Malcolm Neil were decerned and ordained t make payment to him of the expenses in the action, amounting in all t £860, 19s. 4d.[1]

In July 1887 Andrew Rose, commercial traveller, Glasgow, raised an action in the Court of Session against James Stevenson, spirit-dealer, Kilbarchan, and others, residents there, concluding for payment of the above-mentioned sum of £860, 19s. 4d.

After narrating the circumstances of the action above set forth, he averred;—(Cond. 9) "Notwithstanding that the said action of declarator was raised in the names of the said Andrew Brodie and Malcolm Neil against Mr Mann, it was truly instituted and carried on by and for behoof of the defenders, who were the true domini thereof, and directed and controlled the same, and gave instructions to the agents at every stage thereof, the said Andrew Brodie and Malcolm Neil having been selected as pursuers to represent the defenders because of their poverty, and with the object and intention of preventing Mr Mann, in the event, which happened, of his being successful in the litigation, from recovering the expenses thereof from the defenders. The defenders, who were members of a committee appointed at a public meeting to institute and carry on the said action, advanced funds for the carrying on of the same, and guaranteed payment of the account of the agents for the pretended pursuers, and all through gave instructions for the conduct of the case. The defender Gray was treasurer of the fund subscribed by the defenders for the carrying on of the litigation. The said Andrew Brodie and Malcolm

---

[1] Brodie v. Mann, June 13, 1884, 11 R. 925, revd. May 4, 1885, 14 R. (H. L.) 52.

Neil gave no instructions regarding the said action, and contributed nothing to the carrying on of the same. They were put forward as nominal pursuers by the defenders, who are men in a better position in life, in order to secure an immunity to the latter from all possibility of being found liable in expenses. The defenders were interested in the result of the said action of declarator of right of way to a much greater extent than the nominal pursuers. The nominal pursuers have been asked for payment of the expenses decerned for, but they are unable to pay any part thereof." (Cond. 10) "By assignation dated 11th February 1887, the said Thomas Mann assigned, conveyed, and made over to and in favour of the pursuer, his executors or assignees, the said sums of £438, 6s. 5d., £1, 3s. 8d., and £421, 9s. 3d., amounting in all to £860, 19s. 4d., and whole interest due or to become due thereon during the not-payment, together with the said decree of the Court of Session, the said order and judgment of the House of Lords, and the said certificate by the depute-clerk of the Parliaments, and the whole tenor and contents thereof, with all that has followed or may be competent to follow thereupon in so far as relative to the said several sums, with all his, the said Thomas Mann's, right, title, and interest in and to the premises, the pursuer and his foresaids being thereby surrogated and substituted in the said Thomas Mann's full right and place in the premises, with power to the pursuer and his foresaids to ask, crave, sue for, and uplift the sums of money thereby assigned, and upon payment to grant discharges or conveyances thereof either in whole or in part, and generally to do everything in the premises that the said Thomas Mann might have done himself before granting the said assignation. The said assignation is herewith produced and referred to. The pursuer has called upon the defenders to make payment to him of the sum sued for, but they refuse or at least delay to do so, and the present action has therefore been rendered necessary. Mr Mann has nothing whatever to do with the present action, has no interest in the result thereof, and has not supplied, and is not supplying, one farthing towards the carrying on of it."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) Defenders being the real domini of the action of declarator and interdict mentioned in the condescendence are liable conjunctly and severally in payment of the expenses incurred by the said Thomas Mann in the said action, and decerned for in his favour, and the pursuer, as assignee of the said Thomas Mann, is entitled to decree as concluded for, with expenses. (2) In virtue of the assignation by Thomas Mann, in pursuer's favour, of 11th February 1887, condescended on, pursuer is entitled to payment of the sum concluded for, with expenses.

The defenders averred;—(Ans. 10) "The pursuer has no interest or title to sue in this action. The assignation founded on is merely of a decree against Messrs Neil and Brodie, the pursuers in the action of declarator and interdict, who are not defenders in this action. It confers no right upon the pursuer to sue these defenders. It was granted by Mr Mann to the pursuer without onerous consideration, with a view to raising and for the purposes of this action, and to conceal the true pursuer thereof. The pursuer has entered into a collusive agreement with Mr Mann to allow his name to be put forward as nominal pursuer, so as to cause annoyance to these defenders, and to escape liability for expenses. It is believed and averred that Mr Mann is the real dominus litis, and before further procedure he should be ordained to sist himself as a pursuer. He is the person really interested in this action. He gave instructions for raising, and he is now directing it, and supplying funds for carrying it on. The pursuer was at one time in the employment of Mr Mann. He

No. 64.

Jan. 27, 1888.
Rose v.
Stevenson.

is now acting as a grocer's assistant, earning a weekly wage, a no means to carry on a litigation in the Court of Session."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer has n sue. (3) The true dominus litis being Mr Mann, he should be to sist himself before further procedure. (5) These defenders assoilzied in respect that Mr Mann, the defender in the action o tor and interdict condescended on, accepted Messrs Neil and the real pursuers of that action, and carried the action to a c with them alone.

On 11th January 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Lee) allowed the a proof of their allegations in answer to condescendence 10, a pursuer a conjunct probation.*

---

* "OPINION.—In this action the pursuer founds upon an assigna favour by Mr Thomas Mann of two sums, amounting together to £86 being the expenses connected with a litigation in the Court of Se House of Lords, and for which Mr Mann obtained against Andrew Malcolm Neil, other parties to the litigation, a decree of the Court of the extent of £438, 6s. 5d., and an order and judgment by the Hous to the extent of £421, 9s. 3d.

"The pursuer alleges as his ground of action that the debtors nar assignation, and against whom alone the debt is constituted (viz Brodie and Malcolm Neil), were merely nominal pursuers in that litig were truly put forward by the defenders in this action in order to se against liability for expenses.

"The first question raised by the defenders is, Whether the p virtue of the alleged assignation, had a title to sue such an acti assignation makes mention only of the sums themselves, together decree of the Court of Session, the order and judgment of the House 'and the whole tenor and contents thereof; with all that has follow be competent to follow thereupon, in so far as relative to the said sev with all his, the said Thomas Mann's right, title, and interest in a premises.' But although there is no mention made of any right to debtors as being truly liable in the sums contained in the decree agai and Neil, the assignation contains the usual clause, surrogating and su the pursuer in Mr Mann's full right and place in the premises; with ask, crave, sue for, and uplift the sums of money thereby assigned, payment to grant discharges, and generally to do everything in the that the said Thomas Mann might have done himself before grantin assignation. The assignation contains the usual warrandice from deed.

"I have had some difficulty in sustaining the title, more especi authority or precedent was cited for allowing the assignee to a debt c against one person to raise action against another as being the true d have come, however, to be of opinion that the title is sufficient. As carry to the assignee all rights that corroborate or strengthen the right though these corroborative rights should not be specially mentioned in veyance—(Ersk. iii. 5, 8; Stair, iii. 1, 17; Cultie v. Earl of Airlie, re Stair, 2 Br. Sup. 197; Lyell v. Chrystie, 11th March 1823, 2 Shaw It appears, therefore, to be sufficient to entitle the assignee to proce all persons who are liable, that the debt itself be conveyed, with all th rights therein.

"II. Another point raised by the defenders, however, is, that Mr M not the pursuer, is the real dominus litis in the case. It is alleged Mann is the person really interested in the action; that he gave instru raising it, and is now directing it, and supplying funds for carrying it also alleged that the pursuer is a person without means, who has ente collusive agreement with Mr Mann for the purposes of this action. A sideration appears to have been given for the assignation, I think that

No. 64.
—
Jan. 27, 1888.
Rose v. Stevenson.

The defenders James Stevenson and others reclaimed, and argued;—The assignation of a decree against two individuals only entitled the assignee to proceed against those persons mentioned in the decree, and against no one else. Mr Mann, the cedent, might have reserved the right to sue. The authorities quoted by the Lord Ordinary applied to cases of bonds of corroboration or caution, which were merely subsidiary rights. Here there was nothing assigned except the debt against Brodie and Neil.[1] Even though the pursuer proved Stevenson to have been the dominus litis, he could not better his case thereby. The action should be dismissed on the ground of want of title.

Argued for the respondent;—The only question at this stage was the effect of the assignation. That deed conveyed to the pursuer every right which Mr Mann had.[2] It was not merely a corroborative right.

Lord President.—I am of opinion that the pursuer has no title to sue under the assignation. The Lord Ordinary entertained some doubt on this point, but from his note it appears he hardly realised the true question. He says,—"I have had some difficulty in sustaining the title, more especially as no authority or precedent was cited for allowing the assignee to a debt constituted against one person to raise action against another as being the true debtor."

Now, I do not think the pursuer was assignee to a debt at all. He was assignee to a decree, and to nothing else. The sum in the decree consists of the amount of expenses awarded to the successful party. That is a claim which has no antecedent existence. When the Court decern, they, for the first time, bring into existence the debt, and the only debt in question. What Mr Mann assigned was and could be nothing but that decree, and it clearly cannot be used against anybody else. But the decree is not the ground of action. The ground of action consists of the special facts condescended on in article 9 of the condescendence, which sets forth the ground for trying to make the defenders liable as being the true domini litis.

Looking to the assignation it is impossible to hold that Mr Mann is assigning a right of action against different parties altogether. The cases cited have no bearing on the point. I am therefore for recalling the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and dismissing the action.

Lord Mure concurred.

Lord Adam.—In my opinion the only debt assigned was the claim against Brodie and Neil. If Mr Mann had raised an action against the defenders this decree would have been of no avail except in modo probationis.

Lord Shand was absent.

---

course must be followed here as was adopted in the case of Jenkins v. Robertson, 7 Macph. 739; and that, before deciding anything as to the pursuer's right to sue this action, without either bringing forward Mr Mann or finding caution for expenses, the defenders must be allowed a proof of the allegations contained in answer to cond. 10, so far as bearing on this point."

[1] Cultie v. Earl of Airlie, cited by the Lord Ordinary; Matthieson v. Thomson, Nov. 8, 1853, 16 D. 19.

[2] Hepburn v. Tait, May 12, 1874, 1 R. 875; Thomson v. Magistrates of Kirkcudbright, Jan. 23, 1878, 5 R. 561; Kyle v. Kyle's Trustees, Nov. 30, 1821, 1 S. (N. E.) 215; Barbour v. Bell, Jan. 25, 1831, 9 S. 334.

No. 64.
Jan. 27, 1888.
Rose v. Stevenson.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, and dismissed the action.

WINCHESTER & NICOLSON, S.S.C.—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—GORDON PETRIE & SHAND, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 65.
Jan. 27, 1888.
Stobie's Trustees.

GEORGE REID AND ANOTHER (Stobie's Trustees), First Parties.—J. C. Lorimer.

MRS MARGARET STOBIE OR RONALDSON AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—J. C. Lorimer.

ALEXANDER CRUM BROWN AND OTHERS (Miss M. J. Clark's Trustees), Third Parties—Low.

Succession—Accretion—Liferent—Residue.—A testatrix directed her trustees as soon as they should think expedient after her death to realise her estate, and to hold the proceeds thereof for behoof of her two sisters in liferent, and to pay over the annual proceeds to "them equally during their joint lives, and in the event of either of my said sisters predeceasing me, or upon the death of either of them after my decease, my trustees shall pay over one half of the said free proceeds or income to her children equally, share and share alike, if more than one, during the lifetime of the survivor of my said sisters, and the other half to such survivor." She further directed that after the death of the longest liver of her sisters "my trustees shall pay over and divide the whole free residue" of the estate to and among their children. Both sisters survived the testatrix, but one of them subsequently died leaving a child. After the death of the child the surviving sister claimed the liferent of the other half of the residue, on the ground that it accresced to her under the settlement, or alternatively she maintained that it fell into intestacy, and that she was entitled to it as heir in mobilibus to the testatrix. Held that it did not accresce to her, but that it fell to be accumulated with the capital of the residue, and to be divided among the nephews and nieces in terms of the deed.

Paxton's Trustees v. Cowie, July 16, 1886, 13 R. 1191, followed.

1ST DIVISION.
B.

MISS HELEN STOBIE of Easter Balgedie, in the county of Kinross, died on 16th September 1883, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement and codicil, dated 19th December 1877 and 19th March 1881 respectively. Mr George Reid and another were appointed trustees under the deed. The fourth and fifth purposes of the deed were,—"That my said trustees shall, as soon as they shall judge expedient after my decease, and in such way and manner as they shall think proper, realise and convert into cash the whole residue and remainder of my said means and estates, including my property of Easter Balgedie, and shall hold the whole of the said residue and remainder, and the price and proceeds thereof, for behoof of the said Margaret Stobie or Ronaldson and Jane Stobie or Clark in liferent, and shall annually, or at such other times as my trustees shall judge expedient, pay over to them, equally between them, the free annual produce or income thereof during their joint lives, and in the event of either of my said sisters predeceasing me, or upon the death of either of them after my decease, my trustees shall pay over one half of the said free proceeds or income to her children equally, share and share alike, if more than one, during the lifetime of the survivor of my said sisters, and the other half to such survivor; and fifth, that as soon as conveniently may be after the death of the longest liver of the said Margaret Stobie or Ronaldson and Jane Stobie or Clark, or after my own death should they both predecease me, my trustees shall pay over and divide the whole free residue and remainder of my said means and estates, and the price and proceeds thereof, to and among the said William Ronaldson, Thomas Ronaldson,

No. 65.

Jan. 27, 1888.
Stobie's Trustees.

John Ronaldson, Eliza Ronaldson or Thomson, and Maggie Jane Clark, my nephews and nieces equally, share and share alike."

Miss Helen Stobie was survived by two sisters, Mrs Margaret Stobie or Ronaldson and Mrs Jane Stobie or Clark, both widows, but Mrs Clark died on 17th September 1883, the day after Miss Stobie's death, leaving an only child, Miss Maggie Jane Clark.

On the death of Miss Helen Stobie her trustees entered upon possession of her estate and proceeded to execute the purposes of the trust. After giving effect to the prior purposes they, as instructed by the fourth purpose above quoted, sold the property of Easter Balgedie and realised the other portions of the trust-estate so far as necessary, and in terms of the fourth purpose they paid over to Mrs Ronaldson and Miss Clark, equally between them, the free annual produce of the estate until the death of Miss Clark, which took place on 10th November 1885.

Miss Clark died unmarried, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement whereby she conveyed her whole means and estate to Alexander Crum Brown, M.D., and others as trustees. In this conveyance Miss Clark expressly included all her right and interest under Miss Helen Stobie's trust-disposition and codicil by conveying the same to her trustees in these words:—"(Second) All my right and interest under the trust-disposition and settlement of my late aunt, Miss Helen Stobie of Easter Balgedie, in the county of Kinross, dated the 19th day of December 1877, and codicil thereto, dated the 19th day of March 1881." After Miss Clark's death a difficulty arose as to the disposal of the one-half of the annual produce of Miss Helen Stobie's estate accruing during the lifetime of Mrs Ronaldson. The present special case was accordingly presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court. To this case Miss Helen Stobie's trustees were the first parties. The second parties were Mrs Ronaldson and her surviving children, and the third parties were the trustees of Miss Maggie Jane Clark.

The second parties maintained (1) that upon the death of Miss Clark the liferent of the one-half of the residue enjoyed by her passed by force of the settlement to Mrs Ronaldson; or otherwise (2) that both Mrs Clark and her daughter, Miss Maggie Jane Clark, having survived the testatrix and predeceased Mrs Ronaldson, which event was unprovided for by Miss Helen Stobie's trust-disposition and settlement, the one-half of the said free annual proceeds or income of Miss Helen Stobie's estate which was payable to Mrs Clark and her daughter, Miss Maggie Jane Clark, and which would, since Miss Clark's death, accrue during the lifetime of Mrs Ronaldson, fell into intestacy, and that Mrs Ronaldson was entitled to payment thereof during her lifetime as Miss Helen Stobie's next of kin.

The third parties maintained that the one-half of the free annual proceeds or income of Miss Helen Stobie's estate which was payable to Mrs Clark and her daughter, Miss Maggie Jane Clark, and which would, since Miss Clark's death, accrue during the lifetime of Mrs Ronaldson, formed part of the residue of the said Miss Helen Stobie's estate conveyed by her trust-disposition and settlement, and should be accumulated with the capital of her estate from time to time as it fell due until the residue became divisible in terms of the fifth purpose.

The questions of law presented for the opinion of the Court were;—"(1) Is the said Mrs Margaret Stobie or Ronaldson, as the survivor of the two liferentrices nominated and appointed by the said Miss Helen Stobie, entitled since the death of the said Miss Maggie Jane Clark, to the liferent of the whole residue of Miss Helen Stobie's trust-estate? (2) Is the said Mrs Margaret Stobie or Ronaldson, as the heir in mobilibus of the said Miss Helen Stobie, entitled since the death of the said Miss Maggie Jane Clark to payment during her lifetime of the one-half of the said free annual proceeds or income of the said Miss Helen Stobie's estate which was payable to Mrs Clark and her daughter, Miss Maggie Jane Clark? (4) Does the said one-half of the free annual proceeds or income of the said Miss Helen Stobie's estate which was payable to Mrs Clark and her daughter, Miss Maggie Jane Clark, and which will, since Miss Clark's death, accrue during the lifetime of Mrs Ronaldson, form part of the residue of the said Miss Helen Stobie's estate conveyed by her trust-disposition and settlement, and should it be accumulated with the capital of her estate from time to time as it falls due until the residue becomes divisible in terms of the said fifth purpose?"

No. 65.

Jan. 27, 1888.
Stobie's Trustees.

Argued for the second parties;—Mrs Ronaldson became entitled to the liferent of the whole residue on the death of her niece. The occurrence which actually took place had not been provided for in the trust-disposition and settlement, and therefore it was necessary to look back to the primary purpose. Clearly accretion should take place here, and the surviving liferentrix should be found entitled to the liferent of the whole residue. Otherwise the produce of one-half of the residue would be undisposed of, and would fall into intestacy.[1]

Argued for the third parties;—The half of the free yearly interest of the estate set free by Miss Clark's death fell into residue, and went according to the directions of the residuary clause. The case was provided for under the fifth purpose of the deed.[2]

Lord President.—There are two questions to solve here. The first is whether Mrs Ronaldson, as the survivor of two liferentrices, is entitled to the liferent of the whole residue of Miss Helen Stobie's trust-estate, in consequence of the predecease of Mrs Clark and her daughter. That depends on whether there existed a right of accretion as between the two liferenters. The second question is whether one-half of the free annual proceeds or income of the trust-estate is to fall into residue, or to pass into the estate not disposed of.

On the first question there is not much room for doubt. Mr Lorimer endeavours to separate the liferent clauses. I do not think that is a fair mode of construing the deed. The provision is this. The trustees were directed in the fourth purpose of the deed to "hold the whole of the said residue and remainder, and the price and proceeds thereof, for behoof of the said Margaret Stobie or Ronaldson and Jane Stobie or Clark in liferent, and shall annually, or at such other times as my trustees shall judge expedient, pay over to them equally between them the free annual produce or income thereof during their joint lives, and in the event of either of my said sisters predeceasing me, or upon the death of either of them after my decease, my trustees shall pay over one-half of the said free proceeds or income to her children equally, share and share alike, if more than one, during the lifetime of the survivor of my said sisters."

I do not concede that if all that was said was "shall hold the whole of the said residue and remainder, and the price and proceeds thereof, for behoof of the said Margaret Stobie or Ronaldson and Jane Stobie or Clark in liferent," these words taken alone would have created a right of accretion; but taking the clause altogether there is a clear equality between the sisters. Each is to

---

[1] Tulloch v. Welsh, Nov. 23, 1838, 1 D. 94; Barber v. Findlater, Feb. 6, 1835, 13 S. 422.

[2] Paxton's Trustees v. Cowie, July 16, 1886, 13 R. 1191; Pursell v. Elder, June 13, 1865, 3 Macph. (H. L.) 59, 37 Scot. Jur. 394.

No. 65.

Jan. 27, 1888.
Stobie's Trustees.

get one-half. They are clearly to enjoy the liferent equally, but it is even more clear that the right of each is separable. On the decease of the first sister the liferent does not accresce. There is a provision to the contrary.

Taking that clause altogether, one does not require the case of Paxton. I think, however, that that case is applicable, and that this case is a fortiori of it.

The next question is, what is to become of the one-half of the liferent undisposed of after the death of Miss Clark, the daughter of the first deceasing liferentrix. As a general rule, where there is a residuary clause, that prevents all intestacy. This is not a universal but a general rule. Something special is required to prevent it, but the construction of the deed here makes it clear that there is no intestacy. There are two residues mentioned in this settlement. The first is the residue referred to in the fourth purpose; after disposing of the corporeal moveables and two or three pecuniary legacies, the testatrix directs,—"That my said trustees shall realise and convert into cash the whole residue and remainder of my said means and estate, including my property of Easter Balgedie," that is to say, the trustees are to create a residue by means of sale and realisation, and this residue is to bear the burden of the liferents. But at the end of this clause reference is made to another residue, the nature of which is set forth in the fifth purpose of the deed,—"As soon as conveniently may be after the death of the longest liver of the said Margaret Stobie or Ronaldson and Jane Stobie or Clark, or after my own death should they both predecease me, my trustees shall pay over and divide the whole free residue and remainder of my said means and estates" to and among certain nephews and nieces.

There is no reference back there to the residue in the fourth purpose as "said residue"; on the contrary, it is quite separate. Whatever belongs to the estate at the death of the liferentrix is declared to fall into the residue created by this clause, because it is the "free residue of my estate" at that date.

There is no room for distinction. There is no room for intestacy, there being a proper residuary clause.

LORD MURE and LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT answered the first and second questions in the negative, and the fourth question in the affirmative.

N. BRIGGS CONSTABLE, W.S.—FYFE, IRELAND, & MACKAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 66.

Jan. 31, 1888.
Greenock Harbour Trustees.

THE GREENOCK HARBOUR TRUSTEES, First Parties.—Balfour—M'Kechnie.
THE BROWN SOCIETY AND OTHERS, Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Parties.—Asher—C. S. Dickson.
VIOLET GRAY, Seventh Party.—G. R. Gillespie.
THOMAS AITKEN AND OTHERS, Eighth and Ninth Parties.—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—C. J. Guthrie.
MRS J. G. MURRAY OR HILL (Hill's Executrix), Tenth Party.—Darling—H. Johnston.
JOHN M'ARTHUR AND OTHERS (Macfarlane's Trustees), Eleventh Parties.—D.-F. Mackintosh—Murray.
THE GALBREATH MORTIFICATION AND OTHERS, Twelfth Parties.—Sir Charles Pearson—Low.

Process—Special Case—Competency.—In a special case presented by the Greenock Harbour Trustees and by certain classes of lenders holding assignments under the different Acts of the Trust, it was stated that the funds of the Trust

No. 66.
——
Jan. 31, 1888.
Greenock Harbour Trustees.

"were not at Whitsunday last and have not since been adequate to meet the repayment of certain loans then and since payable, and the payments of interest due in respect of money borrowed." The Court entertained the case and decided questions of preference raised therein.

Bankruptcy—Preference—Uncompleted Security—Right to assignation of rates and duties.—The Greenock Harbour Trustees were authorised by their Acts to borrow money, and in security therefor to grant assignations of the rates and duties leviable by the trust. Some of the creditors of the trust held only interim receipts for their advances signed by the treasurer of the trust, with an undertaking that an assignment would afterwards be completed. The trustees became unable to meet all their liabilities. A question of preference between the holders of the statutory assignations and the holders of the interim receipts having arisen, held that creditors holding assignations granted in terms of the statute had a preference over the interim receipt holders, who held no statutory security.

Right in Security—Public Harbour—Assignation of "works and property."—Statutory assignments for moneys borrowed by Harbour Trustees contained assignations to "the rates, duties, and other revenues of the trust, and the works and property of the trust." Held that the words "works and property of the trust" were of no practical effect, as it was obviously not contemplated by the Legislature to give a security which could not be made effectual without the use of real diligence.

1st Division.
B.

THE harbours of Greenock were originally constructed under the authority of a series of Acts of Parliament ending in the year 1817.

The next local Act dealing with them was passed in 1842 (5 Vict. sess. 2, cap. liv.). It gave the Harbour Trustees power to borrow up to £220,000 on the credit of the rates and duties, and in the form of assignment appended in the schedule to that Act it was provided that the security should remain until the sum borrowed, "with the legal interest thereof (or such interest as may be agreed on, if less than £5 per centum), shall be fully satisfied and paid." Section 22 enacted,—"That all persons to whom securities have, before the passing of this Act, been granted under the said recited Acts, and all persons to whom assignments or securities shall hereafter be made, or who are or shall be entitled to the moneys thereby secured, shall, in proportion to the sums therein respectively mentioned, be creditors on the said rates or duties, equally, one with another, without any preference in respect of the priority of advancing such moneys, or of the dates of any such securities or assignments respectively."

The Act of 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. clvi.) repeated certain previous Acts, including that of 1842, and gave power to the trustees to borrow up to £650,000. The form of assignment therein provided was in similar terms to that under the Act of 1842. Sec. 72 of the Act of 1866 enacted,—"All assignments or mortgages for money borrowed under the authority of the recited Acts, and which shall be in force at the time of the passing of this Act, shall, during the continuance thereof, have priority over any assignments or mortgages for money borrowed by virtue of this Act, and the several holders of the assignments or mortgages first mentioned shall have the same priority among themselves in respect thereof as they would have had if this Act had not been passed."

The Act of 1867 merely raised the borrowing powers from £650,000 to £750,000.

The Act of 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. lxxi.) gave the trustees power to borrow up to £1,000,000, and provided by the 34th section that "for securing repayment of the money so borrowed, with interest, the trustees may assign over the rates and duties and other revenues of the trust, and the works and property of the trust, or any part thereof, or any of those securities, to the lender accordingly." Section 35 provided,—"All moneys to be raised by the trustees under this Act from the time when the same shall be advanced, and the interest for the time being due thereon shall have priority against the trustees, and all the rates, duties, and other revenues of the trust, and the works and property of the trust, over all other claims on account of any debts incurred, or to be incurred, or engagements entered into, or to be entered into, by them. . . . ." The 38th section provided,—" In relation to the borrowing of money by the trustees, the following farther provisions shall have effect, namely, (1) every assignment in security made by the trustees after the passing of this Act, by virtue of their borrowing powers under their former Acts, or this Act, and interest warrants or coupons to be delivered with such assignments, and minutes of renewal and discharges of such assignments, may be in the respective forms given in the fifth schedule to this Act, or to the like effect. . . . ."* The 40th section provided,—" All assignments for money borrowed by the trustees before the passing of this Act in force at the passing of this Act shall, during their respective

No. 66.

Jan. 31, 1888.
Greenock Harbour Trustees.

---

* The fifth schedule of the Act gave this form of assignment,—" By virtue of the Greenock Port and Harbours Acts, 1866, 1867, and 1872, the trustees of the port and harbours of Greenock in consideration of the sum of pounds sterling paid to them by do hereby bind themselves to pay to the said executors, administrators, or assigns, the principal sum of pounds at the principal office of the trustees on the day of eighteen hundred and with a fifth part more of liquidate penalty in case of failure, together with interest on the said principal sum at the rate of per centum per annum, payable half-yearly (as per coupons or interest warrants delivered herewith), or in the option of the said or foresaids, the said principal sum shall thereafter in virtue hereof remain as a loan to the said trustees until the expiry of a further term of years to be afterwards agreed on, or the said principal sum shall be payable at the dates, and subject to the provisions contained in the said Acts in the same manner as if the said sum had been advanced on the day of payment first above specified without any period being fixed for the repayment thereof, and subject to the provisions of the said Acts the trustees do hereby assign and make over to the said his executors, administrators, and assignees, All and Sundry the rates, duties, and other revenues of the trust, and the works and property of the trust, payable or belonging to the trust in virtue of the said Acts, and all their right, title, and interest, of, in, and to the same, to be held by the said assignee and his foresaids until the said sum of with the interest thereof, shall be fully satisfied and paid.

"In witness whereof these presents, written (so far as not printed) by are sealed with the common seal of the said trustees, and subscribed by us, three of the trustees and their clerk, at Greenock, the day of eighteen hundred and before these witnesses.

Trustee.
Trustee.
Trustee.
" Clerk of the Trust.

"Form of Minute of Renewal.—No. 1.

" 18 .—It has been mutually stipulated and agreed upon that the repayment of the principal sum contained in the within assignment shall be postponed, and the same shall not be due and exigible until the day of eighteen hundred and , and that interest shall become due on the said principal sum to the date last mentioned at the rate of per centum per annum, and shall be paid half-yearly on presentation of the respective coupons or interest warrants in number issued herewith.

(Signature of Assignee)

Trustee.
Trustee.
Trustee."

The forms of minutes of renewal Nos. 2 and 3 were in similar terms, except that the word " mortgage " was used in place of the word " assignment."

No. 66.

Jan. 31, 1888.
Greenock Harbour Trustees.

continuance, have priority over any assignments for money borrowed by them after the passing of this Act; and the several holders of assignments in force at the passing of this Act shall have the same priority among themselves in respect thereof as they would have had if this Act had not been passed."

The Act of 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. clxx.), provided,—Section 66,—"The trustees may, under the authority of this Act, borrow at interest on the security of the rates and duties and other revenues of the trust any sum which, together with the amount already authorised to be borrowed before the passing of this Act, shall not exceed £1,300,000; . . . . and for securing the repayment of the money so borrowed, with interest, the trustees may assign over the rates and duties and other revenues of the trust, or any part thereof, or any of those securities, to the lender accordingly." Section 71 provided,—"All moneys to be borrowed under the authority of this Act may be borrowed in the several ways and manners by the Acts of 1866 and 1872 provided, and may be secured, and the security thereof be transferred in such manner and form as directed by the said Acts with respect to the money borrowed or to be borrowed under the authority thereof, and all the provisions of the said Acts with respect to the borrowing, and to the security, and to the transfer or assignment, shall extend and apply to the moneys by this Act authorised to be borrowed as if the same had been borrowed under the said Acts: Provided that in regard to sums to be borrowed under the authority of this Act, the deed of assignment shall bear reference to this Act as well as to the trustees' former Acts, and that the form of transfers of assignments . . . contained in the said Harbour Acts of 1866 and 1872, shall apply to the transfer of all sums borrowed and due by the trust." Section 72 provided,—"All assignments for money borrowed by the trustees before the passing of this Act, in force at the passing of this Act, shall, during their respective continuance, and subject to the provisions of the Acts under which the same were respectively granted, have priority over any assignments for money borrowed by them after the passing of this Act, and the several holders of assignments in force at the passing of this Act shall have the same priority among themselves in respect thereof as they would have had if this Act had not been passed." Section 73 provided that the trustees, in lieu of continuing on mortgage money borrowed under that or former Acts, might resolve to fund the whole or any part thereof, and might issue certificates to the holders of such funded debt entitling them to annuities on the sums lent by them,—to rank pari passu with the other mortgages and assignations granted under the Act.

An Act passed in 1884 raised the borrowing powers of the trustees to £1,800,000.

The Harbour Trustees finding at Whitsunday 1887 that they were unable to meet their liabilities as at that term in full, it was arranged that a special case should be presented to the Court to have certain questions relating to the preferences and priorities of the various classes of creditors under the different Acts determined.

The case stated that "owing to various causes the funds at the command of the first parties (the trustees) were not at Whitsunday last, and have not since been, adequate to meet the repayment of certain loans then and since payable, and the payments of interest due in respect of money borrowed under the various Acts of Parliament." (The words printed in italics were added after the case had appeared in the Single Bills and in answer to a doubt expressed by the Court as to the competency of their entertaining it.[1])

---

[1] Cf. Trustees of North British Building Society, July 14, 1885, 12 R. 1271.

No. 66.

—

Jan. 31, 1888.
Greenock Harbour Trustees.

The Harbour Trustees were the first parties to the case. The other parties, and the Acts under which they were creditors, were,—(2) 1842 Act. (The Brown Society.) The holders of an assignment issued under the Act of 1842, which had never been renewed. (3) 1842 Act. (Adam's Trustees.) The holders of an assignment issued under the Act of 1842, which was renewed by minutes of renewal appended thereto, of dates 19th September 1876 and 24th April 1883. (4) 1866-7 Acts. (Mrs M'Pherson.) The holder of an assignment issued under the 1866 and 1867 Acts, which had never been renewed. (5) 1866-7 Acts. (Mr and Mrs Mumme.) The holders of an assignment issued under the 1866 and 1867 Acts, which was renewed by minutes of renewal, of dates 4th December 1876 and 23d September 1881. (6) 1872 Act. (George Baine and Mrs Denniston.) The holders of (A) an assignment issued under the 1866, 1867, and 1872 Acts, the term of payment whereof fell before the passing of the 1880 Act, and which assignment had never been renewed; and (B) an assignment issued under the 1866, 1867, and 1872 Acts previous to the passing of the 1880 Act, the term of payment whereof had not yet expired. (7) 1872 Act. (Miss Violet Gray.) The holder of an assignment, dated 21st July 1876, issued under the 1866, 1867, and 1872 Acts, the term of payment whereof was 15th May 1881, and which assignment was renewed by minute of renewal in the statutory form, dated 21st October 1881, the period of renewal expiring on 15th May 1886. The assignment bore this marginal note:—"Greenock, 2d March 1886.—It has been agreed to continue this loan at the rate of four pounds per cent per annum until further notice. WM. HUTCHESON, Treasurer." (8) 1872 Act. (Thomas Aitken.) The holder of an assignment issued under the 1866, 1867, and 1872 Acts, which fell due after the Act of 1880 on 11th November 1883, and was renewed by minute of renewal in the statutory form, of date 21st December 1883. The postponed term of payment was 11th November 1891. (9) 1872 Act. (Robert Macfarlane's Trustees.) The holders of an assignment issued under the 1866, 1867, and 1872 Acts, which fell due before the passing of the 1880 Act, and was renewed twice by minutes of renewal, of dates 23d April 1880 and 24th March 1885, both dates being prior to the arrival of the term specified for payment of the assignment. The postponed term of payment was 15th May 1893. (10) 1872 Act. (Executrix of Alexander Hill.) The holder of an assignment issued under the Acts of 1866, 1867, and 1872, and being of an amount within the borrowing powers of the 1872 Act, but issued of date 19th November 1880, being after the passing of the Act of 1880. (11) 1880 and 1884 Acts. (Hugh Macfarlane's Trustees and Charles Broadfoot Connell.) (A) The holders of an assignment issued under the Acts of 1866, 1867, 1872, 1880, 1882, and 1884, and (B) the holders of a certificate for £500 of the funded debt. (12) (The Galbreath Mortification, Greenock Charitable Society, and Mr and Mrs M'Murrich.) Holders of interim receipts for sums advanced by them respectively, which were dated 28th December 1867, 7th January 1870, and 19th January 1887. The total amount of loans on interim receipts was £6375.

In regard to the case of the 12th parties (the interim receipt holders), it was stated in the case,—"All sums received in loan by the parties of the first part were entered as received in a book called the Loans Book, from which the formal assignments were prepared. The assignments as issued were entered in the Register of Assignments. Formal assignments were not executed in the case of the said loans of £6375. In the ordinary course of dealing, the trustees, in borrowing money under their statutory powers, granted an interim receipt therefor, which was exchangeable, and was usually exchanged for a formal assignment at a later date.

No. 66.

Jan. 31, 1888.
Greenock Harbour Trustees.

No distinction was made between money borrowed under interim receipts and money borrowed under formal assignments, both being equally represented in the accounts and balance-sheets of the trustees as borrowed under the said Acts. The annual accounts published by the trustees, to which they were in use to refer intending lenders for information, shewed the full amount of indebtedness in respect of money borrowed under statutory powers at the time, and described it as 'debt due on assignments,' without distinguishing between money standing on interim receipt and on formal assignment."

The following questions were submitted to the Court:—"1. Do the second parties rank on the rates and revenues of the trust preferably to the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth parties, or to any, and which of them? 2. Are the third parties in the same position as the second parties, or does their preference, if any, rank as if the loan had been granted of the date of one or other, and which, of the minutes of renewal? 3. Do the fourth parties rank on the rates and revenues of the trust preferably to the fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth parties, or to any, and which of them? 4. Are the fifth parties in the same position as the fourth parties, or does their preference, if any, rank as if the loan had been granted of the date of one or other, and which of the minutes of renewal? 5. Do the sixth parties rank on the rates and revenues of the trust preferably to the seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth parties, or to any, and which of them? 6. Do the sixth parties rank on the works and property of the trust preferably to all the other parties, or to any, and which of them? 7. Is the seventh party as regards the rates and revenues of the trust entitled to rank pari passu with the sixth parties? 8. Is the seventh party entitled to rank pari passu with the sixth, eighth, and ninth parties on the works and property of the trust, and preferably to all the other parties to the case? or, Is she entitled to rank preferably as aforesaid only on the works and property of the trust existing at the date of her assignment? 9. Do the eighth and ninth parties rank on the rates and revenues of the trust preferably to the seventh, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth parties, or any, and which of them, and pari passu with the sixth party? 10. Do the eighth and ninth parties rank on the works and property of the trust preferably to all the parties in the case except the sixth parties? or, Do the eighth and ninth parties rank preferably as aforesaid only on the works and property of the trust existing at the dates of their respective assignments? 11. Is the tenth party entitled to rank on the rates and revenues of the trust pari passu with the sixth parties, class (B), and preferably to all the other parties in the case except the second and fourth parties, or to any, and which of them? 12. Is the tenth party entitled to rank on the works and property of the trust preferably to all the parties in the case, or to any, and which of them? or, Is she entitled to rank preferably as aforesaid only on the works and property of the trust existing at the date of her assignment? 13. Have the twelfth parties, or any, and which of them, the same rights and preferences as if formal assignments had been delivered to them of the dates of their respective interim receipts; or are they, or any, and which of them, now entitled to demand such assignments from the first parties to that effect? 14. Assuming that the sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth parties are entitled to the preferences which they claim over the works and property of the trust, are they entitled to effectuate their rights over the said works and property either (1) by bringing the said works and property, or such part thereof as may be necessary to meet their claims to public sale, or (2) by administering

No. 66.

Jan. 31, 1888
Greenock Harbour
Trustees.

said works and property for their behoof until their claims are satisfied, or by which of these modes? 15. Alternatively to the whole of the foregoing questions, Do the whole parties other than the first rank pari passu upon the said rates and revenues?"

The arguments in regard to all except two of the questions involved turned upon the construction of the respective Acts of Parliament, and need not be set forth.

I. The twelfth parties—the interim receipt-holders—argued that they were in the same position as if they had got formal assignations. These could have been demanded at any time, and the interest was always paid just as if there had been assignations from the first. It would make no difference even if the trust were in a position of insolvency, which it was not. The only objection to the trustees giving assignations now was that that would be in fraudem of the rights of the other creditors. But such assignations would not be reducible under the Act of 1696, even if granted within sixty days of bankruptcy.[1] They would be granted in implement of obligations undertaken concurrently with the issue of the receipts. They were not new debts.

In answer it was argued that in order to accede to the demand of the twelfth parties it would be necessary to antedate the assignations, which was impossible. Further, the trust was practically insolvent, and the position of the creditors could not be varied.[2] If granted the bonds could not be antedated, and must be granted under the Act of 1880. But interim receipts were not contemplated under that Act, and no effect could be given to them.

II. It was argued, upon the terms of the assignations in the 1872 Act, on behalf of the parties holding assignations under that Act, that the words "works and property" gave an additional security upon which real diligence could be done,[3] thereby giving to these parties rights which those holding under the previous Acts had not.

In answer it was argued, inter alia, that the fact that it would be impossible to work out such a security as was contended for was enough to shew that it could not be successfully maintained.[4]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The first parties in this special case are the trustees of the port and harbours of Greenock, who are, under various Acts of Parliament, vested in the property of the harbour and in the management and application of all the revenues received from the use of the harbours.

The other parties are creditors under the assignments which have been granted by the trustees for money borrowed under the authority of the Acts of Parliament which I shall immediately refer to.

It is stated by the first parties, with the assent of all the other parties to the case, that "owing to various causes the funds at the command of the first parties were not at Whitsunday last, and have not since been, adequate to meet the payment of certain loans then and since payable, and the payments of interest due in respect of money borrowed under the various Acts of Parliament."

---

[1] Stiven v. Scott & Simson, June 30, 1871, 9 Macph. 923, 43 Scot. Jur. 511; Gourlay v. Mackie, Jan. 27, 1887, 14 R. 403; Rose v. Falconer, June 26, 1868, 6 Macph. 960, 40 Scot. Jur. 550.

[2] Nelson Mitchell v. City of Glasgow Bank, Dec. 21, 1878, 6 R. 420 (Lord Deas, p. 433).

[3] Mersey Docks Trustees v. Gibbs, &c., June 5, 1866, L. R., 1 E. and I. Apps. 93; Virtue v. Police Commissioners of Alloa, Dec. 12, 1873, 1 R. 285.

[4] Dundee Union Bank v. Dundee and Newtyle Railway Co., Jan. 25, 1844, 6 D. 521; Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., Dec., 1866, L. R., 2 Chan. Apps. 201.

The special case has therefore been presented for the purpose of determining what may be called the order of ranking of the various classes of creditors represented by the parties before us; and as regards certain classes of these creditors the case is not attended with any difficulty.

There are four Acts of Parliament that require particular attention. The first was passed in the year 1842, by which the trustees were empowered to borrow the sum of £220,000 for the purposes of the harbour and works. The second was passed in 1866, and, along with a supplementary Act of the following year, 1867, it authorised borrowing powers up to £750,000, including the previous borrowing powers.

In the Act of 1872 the borrowing powers were extended to £1,000,000, and in 1880 to £1,300,000.

Now, as regards the Act of 1842, it would rather appear that at that time there were some loans outstanding under the previous Acts of Parliament; for by the 22d section of that Act it is appointed that the sums borrowed under the Act of 1842 should rank pari passu with all the previous loans; and money having been borrowed under the Act of 1842 to a considerable extent, the Act of 1866 was passed, and contained a clause which again secured a priority to creditors who had lent their money under the Act of 1842, and as this clause is repeated in subsequent Acts of Parliament, I may as well read it at once, and once for all. It is the 72d section of the Act of 1866. "All assignments or mortgages for money borrowed under the authority of the recited Acts, and which shall be in force at the time of the passing of this Act, shall, during the continuance thereof, have priority over any assignments or mortgages for money borrowed by virtue of this Act, and the several holders of the assignments or mortgages first mentioned shall have the same priority among themselves in respect thereof as they would have had if this Act had not been passed." That clause therefore makes it quite plain that the creditors under the Act of 1842 have a priority over the creditors under the Act of 1866.

And, in like manner, when the next Act was passed in 1872, there was a similar clause introduced—section 40—which gave priority to all the creditors who had already lent their money under the provisions of the Acts, including the Act of 1866, over the creditors who were to advance their money under the Act of 1872.

And so in the next Act of 1880 there is a similar priority clause.

While therefore the creditors under the Act of 1842 rank primo loco, the creditors under the Act of 1866 rank secundo loco, the creditors under the Act of 1872 rank tertio loco, and lastly come the creditors under the Act of 1880, who are a different set of creditors—that is to say, creditors not under the operation of the earlier Acts, but who also necessarily rank pari passu with one another, because it must be observed that the securities which are granted for the money advanced under this Act are not real securities in any proper sense of the term. There is nothing done by that Act to confer or make a real security. To do so in the case of ordinary securities in our law we know that in the case of heritable securities there must be infeftment or its equivalent, in the case of moveables there must be delivery, and in the case of incorporeal moveables there must be an intimated assignation. But none of these things was done, or could be done, in the case of the statutory assignments with which we are here dealing, and therefore it follows of necessity that for one thing there was no priority of time under this Act of Parliament, and for another there was under it no priority in point of preference.

As regards the cases which have occurred under the Act of 1842 and the Act of 1866, I do not think any difficulty occurs at all. The assignments under these Acts of Parliament specify no times of payment, and they just assign the revenues of the harbour in security, and fix a rate of interest. The debtor has the option, if he chooses, to put an end to the assignments by giving notice of payment as provided in the statutes, and of course the creditor is entitled to demand payment of his money when he pleases.

In some of the cases which we have before us under the Act of 1866, there is a form of renewal gone through, but it is perfectly obvious from the language of the assignments under that Act that nothing of the kind was necessary. The assignments remained in force until the money was paid up by the debtor, or until the creditor called up his money and got payment of it, and I suppose the form of renewal which was gone through in some of these cases was suggested by the circumstance that when these renewals took place the Act of 1872 had been passed, which required renewals of the assignments given under its authority, and that seems to have suggested to the parties that probably it was intended that there must be similar renewals under the provisions of the former statutes. But that, obviously, is an entire mistake. Nothing of the kind was necessary, and therefore we are not at all required to consider whether, if renewals had been necessary under the Act of 1866, they were rightly given in the form we have before us. The creditors therefore under the Act of 1842, as I have said before, come to rank, in the first place, on the revenues of the harbour; and the creditors under the Act of 1866 rank in the second place.

But the Act of 1872 introduced a new form of assignment; and there is a clause in that statute relating to the form of assignments which it is necessary to keep in view. The 38th section provides that in relation to the borrowing of money by the trustees the following further provisions shall have effect, and the first of these provisions is, that "every assignment in security made by the trustees after the passing of this Act by virtue of their borrowing powers under their former Acts or this Act, and interest warrants or coupons to be delivered with such assignments, and minutes of renewals, and discharges of such assignments, may be in the respective forms given in the fifth schedule to this Act, or to the like effect. . . ." Then, in the 3d subsection of the same section, it is provided that "section 67 of the Harbour Act of 1866" (relating to forms of assignment) "shall not apply to any assignment made by the trustees after the passing of this Act." Now, I think the effect of that clause, taking this subsection into account, is, that an assignment made after the passing of the Act of 1872 required to be in the form prescribed in the fifth schedule of that statute, because the previous forms are forbidden to be used, and that new form is substituted.

That brings us therefore to a consideration of the form contained in that fifth schedule, which differs very materially from the form in the previous statutes. The trustees here bind themselves to pay to the lender, and his executors, at the principal office of the trustees, on a certain date to be specified, the principal sum borrowed by them, together with interest upon it at the rate of so much per centum per annum, payable half-yearly, as per coupons or interest warrants delivered herewith, or in the option of the creditor, "the said principal sum shall thereafter, in virtue hereof, remain as a loan to the said trustees until the expiry of a further term of years, to be afterwards agreed on, or the said principal sum shall be payable at the dates and subject to the provisions contained in the said Acts, in the same manner as if the said sum had been advanced on the day of payment first above specified, without any period being fixed for the repayment thereof; and, subject to the provisions of the said Acts, the trustees do hereby assign and make over" to the creditor "the rates, duties, and other revenues of the trust, and the works and property of the trust, payable or belonging to the trust," in security of the advance.

Now, that form differs from the form in the previous statutes in this respect, that there was no day of payment specified in the previous form. The money remained until it should be called up or paid, and the creditor's security subsisted until the money was fully paid, with the specified amount of interest; but in the schedule now before us there is a day of payment specified, and it is plain that it is not intended that the security shall subsist in the same form or to the same effect after that day of payment is past, because there are delivered with the assignments coupons or interest warrants which come down only to the date of payment, and as soon as these coupons or interest warrants are exhausted (which is the same time as the date of payment of the principal), there are no further means of recovering interest and no provision for the payment of interest.

Now the object of all this plainly is to give parties an opportunity of altering the rate of interest after a certain period has elapsed. Suppose that the period prescribed for payment is five years after the date of the assignment; the effect of that is that the interest warrants or coupons being exhausted, the rate of interest may be altered by agreement. It is to be observed that it is not altered by the statute at all, but it must be arranged between the parties when the date of payment of the principal arrives. The rate of interest falls to be fixed then if the loan is to be continued, and accordingly the alternative is for the creditor to say that the principal sum is to be paid, or that it may thereafter be allowed to remain as a loan to the trustees until the expiry of a further term of years to be afterwards agreed on.

Now there is a form provided for such an agreement in this same schedule. It is called "form of minute of renewal," and it bears that "it has been mutually stipulated and agreed upon that "the repayment of the principal sum contained in the within assignment shall be postponed, and the same shall not be due and exigible until" another specified date, "and that interest shall become due on the said principal sum to the date last mentioned" at a certain rate, which is specified also in the minute of renewal. Therefore when the term arrives for payment of the principal in the original assignment, the parties may, if they think fit, come to this kind of agreement. If they do not, the money must be paid. These are the two alternatives presented.

It seems to me that there are just two cases before us in which this procedure has been regularly gone about. One is the second security held by the sixth party, and the other is the security held by the ninth party.

The security held by the sixth party, which is distinguished by the letter B, is an assignment which is dated in 1878, and the term of payment is 1888, so it is not yet due. I am perhaps wrong in the form of expression I applied to this case, for there is no minute of renewal. So it is not yet due, and accordingly no question is raised as to this. But what I meant was, that it is undoubtedly a well made assignment, and a subsisting assignment under the provisions of the Act of 1872, because it is an assignment made in the terms prescribed by the schedule. But the day of payment of the principal has not yet arrived, so no minute of renewal was necessary.

In the case of the ninth party the assignment fell due before the passing of the Act of 1880, but there was a renewal by minute, dated 23d April 1880, which was before the arrival of the term of payment of the assignment. It was again renewed on the 24th of March 1885, and that renewal was also within the term of payment specified within the first renewal, and in that second renewal the term of payment is there postponed until the 15th May 1893. It appears to me, therefore, that, in so far as regards the B security belonging to the sixth party, and the security belonging to the ninth party, these are both perfectly good under the Act of 1872, and precisely conform to the forms of that Act and its schedule.

But there are three other securities constituted under the Act of 1872, which stand in a different position. These are (1) the security A belonging to the sixth party; (2) the seventh party's security; and (3) the eighth party's security.

As regards the security belonging to the sixth party, the term of payment arrived before the passing of the Act of 1880, and that assignment never was renewed at all.

As regards the seventh party's assignment, it fell due after the passing of the Act of 1880, and it was renewed, but it was renewed too late, because the term of payment precedes the date of renewal by some months.

The eighth party is in that respect in the same position. The renewal there was too late also.

Accordingly, the condition of these three parties is this, that they have not complied with that part of the schedule of the Act of 1872, which, of course, gave them as creditors under the assignment which they received the option of postponing the term of payment for an additional period, and fixing the rate of interest for that additional period. The schedule—I shall refer to it again—gives this alternative,—"The said principal sum shall thereafter, in virtue hereof, remain as a loan to the said trustees until the expiry of a farther term of years to be afterwards agreed on." Now, no term of years was agreed on in the case of the sixth party's A security; and although a term of years was agreed on in the case of the seventh and eighth parties, it was not agreed on till after the assignment had lapsed altogether by the arrival of the term of payment. But I have placed these three parties all in the same position. They have all availed themselves of that option which is given by the terms of their assignments.

But, then, there is another point. The schedule of the Act of 1872, which is also embraced in the assignments of all these three parties, is thus expressed, "or the said principal sum"—that is the principal sum in the original assignment—"shall be payable at the dates, and subject to the provisions contained in the said Acts in the same manner as if the said sum had been advanced on the day of payment first above specified without any period being fixed for the repayment thereof." Then follows the form of security, without any period being fixed for the repayment thereof.

No agreement having been come to for a renewal until after the postponed period of payment, the statute says the principal sum shall be held as advanced of new upon the date of payment originally fixed in the assignment, ar any date of payment being fixed, and it shall be subject to the rules ditions prescribed by the Acts. Now what does that mean? It i happily expressed, because it leaves room for a good deal of argumen meaning. But it appears to me that, keeping in view that the whol or at least the main, if not the only object—of this new form of assig scribed by the Act of 1872, is to provide for fixed periods of paymen give an opportunity of dealing with the rate of interest if the loa further continued. It seems to me the most simple meaning, that if before the term of payment arrives provide for another fixed term with a fixed rate of interest, then you shall be held to continue the l the date of payment in the original assignment upon no fixed term of and without any fixed rate of interest.

I think that answers all the expressions contained in this alternat would be very difficult to find any other reasonable construction o ticular schedule, because if it were to be held that the assignment end altogether, and lost its whole operation and effect, by allowing t payment to pass without any renewal, these assignments, under the A would be liable to lose their force altogether in regard to the order o
They would lose the benefit of the priority clause in the Act of 1 would be a very strong thing to imply from the use of such terms a here. It is not so expressed, and I do not think it can be implied, place, because I think that would be a most unreasonable constructi the second place, because the assignment in security stands just as was from the beginning. The lapse of the period of payment prescri assignment does not put an end to the effect of the assignment i Nothing of the kind is said, and surely that cannot be implied, and being an assignment, it is to stand good. The assignment bears th subsist, and be held by the assignee until the principal sum, wit thereon, shall be fully satisfied and paid. Now, it would be enti sistent with that to hold that when there is an assignment contai original instrument granted to the creditor under the Act of 1872, it s all its force and efficacy as an assignment in security, having a certai attached to it. I therefore come to the conclusion that these three p sixth party, for the security A, and the seventh and eighth parties entitled to preferences as coming under the Act of 1872, and secu 72d section of the Act of 1880.

The priority clause of the Act of 1880 is very like the one which I the Act of 1842, but there are certain slight variances of expression, fore it may be as well to advert to it. It provides that "all assign money borrowed by the trustees before the passing of this Act, in fo passing of this Act, shall, during their respective continuance, and the provisions of the Acts under which the same were respectively gra priority over any assignments for money borrowed by them after the this Act, and the several holders of assignments in force at the passi Act shall have the same priority among themselves in respect there would have had if this Act had not been passed." I think the secur which I have been dealing are fairly within the words of this clause.
"assignments for money borrowed by the trustees before the passin Act." There can be no doubt they are the governing words of the the subject of the sentence is "all assignments." These assignments, whatever may have happened to them afterwards, are undoubtedly assignments for money which was borrowed by the trustees before the passing of the Act of 1880. They are also assignments which were in force at the passing of the Act of 1880, and are still continuing. They have not fallen. They are admittedly still subsisting obligations of these harbour trustees, and subsisting securities, and therefore they answer to all the conditions of the 72d section.

The result, therefore, is that these three securities which I have already mentioned are entitled to rank pari passu with the security B of the sixth party and the security of the ninth party. They were all ranked pari passu under the Act of 1872, and therefore tertio loco in this competition.

We then come to the tenth party, and there the money was borrowed under the Act of 1872. But then it was borrowed after the passing of the Act of 1880, and it therefore does not answer to the language of the 72d section of the Act of 1880, because it is not "money borrowed before the passing of this Act," and it was not a security in force at the passing of that Act, and if it does not get the benefit of the preferences conferred by the 72d section of the Act of 1880, I know of no other kind of preference it has, and that being so, it must fall down in the scale, and rank with the securities which are given in the Act of 1880 itself.

Then comes the eleventh party, and the money there was borrowed under the Act of 1880; and, of course, the eleventh party does not contend that he can rank with securities under the Act of 1872, and indeed he does not maintain anything, except that the sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth parties should be reduced to that level. That is said to be the sole contention of the eleventh party. From what I have said upon the previous cases—that is to say, upon those of the sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth parties, it will be obvious that the conclusion I come to upon the assignment of the eleventh party, is that he has not succeeded in bringing down any of these previous parties except the tenth. He has brought No. 10 down to his own level, but nobody else.

There is in the case of No. 11 also the funded debt, or share of the funded debt, but that does not seem to give rise to any difficulty so far as I can see, because by section 77 of the Act of 1880 it is obvious that his share of the funded debt ranks pari passu with the other mortgages and assignations under the Act of 1880.

Then comes the twelfth party, and he is in the unfortunate position of not having any assignment at all, and thereby stands in a very unfavourable position of contrast to the other parties before us. There are in this twelfth category three cases presented. One of the securities, if it may be so called, which is held by the twelfth party, is entitled an interim receipt. It bears date 28th December 1867, and it is in these terms:—"I have this day received from William M'Clure, Esquire, . . . as a loan to the Greenock Harbour Trust, the sum of £300 sterling, for which I will procure an assignment by the trustees in exchange for this receipt.—JOHN ADAM, treasurer, p. WILLIAM SMITH." The second is rather longer in point of expression, and it is dated the 7th January 1870. That document sets out the Act of Parliament, being the Act of 1866, under which the money is advanced, and it proceeds,—"I have this day received from" so and so "as a loan to the Greenock Harbour Trust the sum of £200, which has been placed to their credit in the books of the trust, and for which interest, at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, or at such other

No. 66.
Jan. 31, 1888.
Greenock Harbour Trustees.

rate as may be fixed by the finance committee of the said trust on six notice given, will be paid half-yearly from this date, at the terms of Wh and Martinmas.—JOHN ADAM, treasurer." And then the third doc dated 19th January 1887, and bears to be,—"By virtue of the b powers contained in the above-named Acts, I acknowledge to have received from" so and so "the sum of £600 sterling as a loan to the Harbour Trustees till Martinmas 1889 at 4 per cent. An assignm warrants for the interest thereon will be prepared forthwith, and deli exchange for this receipt.—WILLIAM HUTCHESON, treasurer."

Now it will be observed that the first and second of these receipts wer before the passing of the Act of 1872, while the third is granted after th of the Act of 1880, and therefore they stand in a somewhat different But the great objection to them is that they are in the form of a securi the Greenock Harbour Trustees have no authority to grant. Whether entitle the holders to demand delivery of assignments in security for th mentioned in these receipts is a different question. But there is no su tion put to us in this special case. The question put to us in regard receipts is the thirteenth, and it is this—"Have the twelfth partie and which of them, the same rights and preferences as if formal ass had been delivered to them of the dates of their respective interim re are they, or any and which of them, now entitled to demand such ass from the first parties to that effect?" That is the question we have to and as there is no question put to us as to the right of the parties to delivery of assignments now, I say nothing about that question, or ab the effect of these assignments might be if they were granted, but I prepared to answer the thirteenth question in the negative, upon both of it.

The first part of the particular question appears to suggest to us th receipts shall be in this competition equivalent to assignments grante same dates; that is to say, that the receipt No. 1, which is dated in 18 rank along with the parties who are here preferred secundo loco, v creditors advancing their money under the Act of 1866; and so also second, while of course the third cannot obtain any preference under t but would only rank in the last grade with the creditors under the Act But it is quite obvious, I think, that as the statutes prescribe the particu in which the securities are to be given, and state distinctly what is to effect of these forms, if different forms are adopted, they cannot po allowed to have the same effect as those prescribed by the statute, and the form which has been adopted here is no obligation by the Greenock Trustees at all. These documents are no doubt receipts granted by their t But there are clauses in these Acts of Parliament which expressly provid manner in which the Trustees can bind themselves, and the only m which they can bind themselves to any effect at all, and that is by number of the trustees signing documents of debt along with the clerk other officer, and therefore, even in that point of view, these receipts for nothing at all. I therefore come to the conclusion, without any he that the holders of these receipts are not in a condition to ask anything nature of a preference here, because they have not got statutory docume in the second place, as regards the one granted in 1887, the course whic bably open to the holder of that document is to ask that an assignment given to him in terms of the obligation, but as to what the effect of that assignment might be I give no opinion, because it is not raised in this special case.

Now, it appears to me that that disposes of the whole case, with the exception of one question, and that is, What is to be the effect of the insertion in some of the statutory securities of the words "the works and property" in addition to the words "rates and revenues of the trust"?

Now, that matter stands in a very curious position as regards the dates of the statutes, as was pointed out by the Dean of Faculty. In the statute of 1842 the advances are made on the credit of the rates and duties and other property vested in the trustees, and it is provided that the trustees may assign their "rates, duties, and property, or any part thereof," but oddly enough the form in the schedule does not correspond with that provision in the clause of the statute, because the form in the schedule does not assign the property, but only the rates and duties. Under the Act of 1866 there is no mention of anything either in the clauses or in the schedules except rates, duties, and revenues. There is no assignment of the property or works. In the Act of 1872 it is provided that the trustees may borrow on the "rates, duties, and other revenues of the trust, and of the works and property of the trust," and in this case the schedule is in harmony with the clauses, which it is not in the Act of 1842, so that the Act of 1872 is the most complete in the way of assigning "works and property" in addition to "rates, duties, and other revenues."

In the Act of 1880 there is no form of assignment given in any schedule, but clause 71, which is important in this connection, provides that "all moneys to be borrowed under the authority of this Act may be borrowed in the several ways and manners by the Acts of 1866 and 1872 provided, and may be secured, and the security thereof be transferred in such manner and form as directed by the said Acts with respect to the money borrowed or to be borrowed under the authority thereof, and all the provisions of the said Acts with respect to the borrowing and to the security, and to the transfer or assignment, shall extend and apply to the moneys by this Act authorised to be borrowed as if the same had been borrowed under the said Acts."

Now, that gives power in dealing under the Act of 1880 to adopt any of the forms of the previous Acts, and therefore creditors lending money under the Act of 1880, if they can agree with the trustees, may take their security in the terms provided in the Act of 1866, in which case they will have no assignment of the works and property, or they may take under the Act of 1872, under which they will have an assignment of the works and property of the trust.

I think this only leads one to the conclusion that the insertion of these words, "works and property of the trust," was really not meant to have any practical effect at all. The meaning of inserting these words at all was just to give a little more intensity to the conveyance. The works and property of the trust are revenue-producing subjects, and it is quite obvious that in no event under these Acts of Parliament was it ever contemplated that a security should be created over the property and works of any efficacy, which could not be made effectual without doing real diligence against the property and works; and it is almost needless to say that there is not the smallest appearance of any such intention in any of the statutes. I do not suppose any of your Lordships would have the slightest hesitation in saying that an adjudication led by one of the creditors under the Act of 1872, to carry off the harbour works from the statutory trustees would be an utterly absurd and ineffectual proceeding, and yet

No. 65.

Jan. 31, 1888.
Greenock Harbour Trustees.

unless this is to be the effect of this assignment of the property and works, I do not see very well what the creditors can get by it except the revenue derived from the works and property. They must either be content with the revenue derived from the property and works or carry off the property itself, and it is certainly obvious that the latter was not intended, and if so, then the only thing remaining is the revenues produced by the use of the harbour and works. The difficulty of giving any other construction to these words under the different statutes may be further illustrated by this, that by section 40 of the Act of 1872 it is provided that all assignments given under the provisions of the earlier statutes, and particularly under the Act of 1866, are to have a priority over the assignments given in the Act of 1872. But if assignments given under the Act of 1872 are to have a more comprehensive security than those given under the Act of 1866, then that section 40 would be to a considerable extent defeated altogether, and the priority thereby created would not be an effectual priority. And it must be observed that the language of these two priority clauses is very distinct and very complete. Assignments, that is to say, assignments in security of certain sums of money, if they be in operation and effect at the date of passing of the new Act, are to have priority in all respects over assignments granted after them. Now, that would be wholly inconsistent with the terms of the assignments granted under the Act of 1872, on the assumption that the assignment of the works and property enlarged the security, and therefore I think a preference over the property and works in competition with assignments granted under the Act of 1866 would plainly be just a contradiction in terms of the 40th section of the Act of 1872.

I think these remarks go over the whole points we are asked to consider, and it will not be difficult, I imagine, to apply the observations which I have made, if your Lordships agree with me, to answering the various questions which are appended to this case, and I do not go into them in detail at present.

LORD MURE and LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"In answer to the first question in the case, find and declare that the second parties rank on the rates and revenues of the trust pari passu with the third parties, and preferably to the fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth parties: In answer to the second question, find and declare that the third parties are in the same position as the second parties, and answer the second branch of the question in the negative: In answer to the third question find and declare that the fourth parties rank on the rates and revenues of the trust pari passu with the fifth parties, and preferably to the sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth parties: In answer to the fourth question, find and declare that the fifth parties are in the same position as the fourth parties, and answer the second branch of the question in the negative: In answer to the fifth question, find and declare that the sixth parties rank on the rates and revenues of the trust pari passu with the seventh, eighth, and ninth parties, and preferably to the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth parties: In answer to the seventh question, find and declare that the seventh party ranks on the rates and revenues of the trust pari passu with the sixth parties: In answer to the ninth question, find and declare that the eighth and ninth parties rank on the rates and revenues of the trust pari passu with the sixth and seventh parties, and preferably to the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth parties: Answer the first branch of the eleventh question in the negative, and in answer to the second branch, find and declare that the tenth party ranks pari passu with the eleventh parties, and preferably to the twelfth parties: Answer the thirteenth question in the negative: Answer the sixth, eighth, tenth, twelfth, and fourteenth questions in the negative: Further, answer the fifteenth question in the negative: Of consent find the whole parties entitled to expenses as between agent and client out of the revenues of the trust," &c.

R. BRUCE COWAN, W.S.—GRAHAM, JOHNSTON, & FLEMING, W.S.—GILLESPIE & PATERSON, W.S.—COWAN & DALMAHOY, W.S.—J. & J. ROSS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 67.

Feb. 1, 1888.
Walls' Trustees v. Drynan.

HENRY WALLS AND ANOTHER (Walls' Trustees), Pursuers and Real Raisers.
JOHN DRYNAN AND MANDATORY, Claimants (Reclaimers).—Sir Charles Pearson—Sym.
WILLIAM FIRTH, SONS, & COMPANY, Claimants (Respondents).—Gloag.
PETER RYAN, Claimant (Respondent).—Gloag.

Jurisdiction—Process—Arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa—Signeting of summons—Where jurisdiction is to be founded against a foreigner by letters of arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa, it is not necessary to execute them before the summons is signeted.

Opinions that it is enough that they be executed before defences are lodged.

Observations (per the Lord President) on the legal significance of the signeting of a summons.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord M'Laren.
M.

JOHN DRYNAN, merchant in Toronto, a creditor of Thomas Walls, residing in America, in September 1886 arrested the latter's share of his father (John Walls') estate in Scotland in the hands of the testamentary trustees jurisdictionis fundandæ causa. The letters of arrestment passed Her Majesty's signet on 20th September. A summons at the instance of Drynan and his mandatory against Thomas Walls, containing warrant to arrest, and concluding for payment of a sum of about £2870, was signeted on the 21st September. On the 23d September the letters of arrestment were executed, and on the same day an arrestment was used on the dependence of the action. On the 24th September the summons was served personally upon Thomas Walls, and decree in absence followed.

William Firth, Sons, & Company, and Peter Ryan, who were also creditors of Thomas Walls, used separate arrestments against his share of his father's succession in the hands of the trustees.

The trustees having subsequently brought a multiplepoinding in order to the distribution of the estate, claims were lodged, inter alios, by (1) John Drynan; (2) William Firth, Sons, & Company; and (3) Peter Ryan.

In regard to Drynan's claim, each of the other two claimants stated,—"With reference to the claim for John Drynan, it is averred that the arrestments to found jurisdiction alleged to have been used by that claimant were not executed until 23d September 1886, whereas the action founding upon said arrestments was raised upon 21st September. The alleged arrestments on the dependence were executed of the same date as the arrestments to found jurisdiction." They pleaded;—(4) The action and diligence at the instance of John Drynan being inept, the claimants are, in respect of the arrestments used by them, entitled to a preferable ranking upon Thomas' share of the trust-estate.

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren), on 15th June 1887, pronounced an interlocutor dealing with this and other questions raised in the multiple-

No. 67.
Feb. 1, 1888.
Wall's Trustees v. Drynan.

poinding. So far as relating to the present question, he found,- reference to the claim of John Drynan and mandatory, finds tl the summons at their instance, containing a warrant for ar passed the signet, jurisdiction had not been founded against Walls, and consequently that the said warrant of arrestment, execution of arrestment following thereon, are null and ineffectu

Drynan reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary had founc signeting of the summons required that jurisdiction be first founde the defender whom it was proposed to call. But jurisdiction at the of signeting was immaterial, jurisdiction at the moment of executi essential. All the cases in which questions of jurisdiction had be turned on the point whether there was jurisdiction when the sumn executed.[1] The respondents' own averment was that the reclaime ments to found jurisdiction "were not executed till 23d Septem whereas the action founding upon said arrestments was raise September." But it was settled that an action was not "raised summons was served.[2] It was then a "begun action."[3] Rai beginning an action were synonymous, what was meant being cise of an act of jurisdiction against the defender. It was that matter which the law regarded. A signeted summons never se of no avail to anyone or against anyone. The Writer to tl

---

* "NOTE.— . . III.—The third and only remaining question i the arrestment which was used by the creditor Drynan to found juris well laid on, in view of the fact that the letters of arrestment wer before the signeting of the summons, but were not executed until signeting of the summons. The letters of arrestment were signeted tember, the summons was signeted 21st September, and the letters of a were executed on the 23d September. These are the material dates.

"In the argument before me, it was not contended that this Court diction over the debtor otherwise than as was constituted by the a
And it is evident that an arrestment which is to be used for the p founding jurisdiction must be executed before any act of jurisdictio done; because a mere issue of letters of arrestment attaching noth ground of jurisdiction against anyone. Now, in the present case, t ment had not been executed at the time when the summons passed th and the question is, whether jurisdiction is necessary in order to su issue of a summons by a Writer to the Signet against a foreigne summons were no more than a statement of the pursuer's case, togetl warrant for summoning the defender to enter appearance and to plead, I should have no great difficulty in holding that it might be writte and sealed before the arrestments were laid on. I think, for examp petition or a note of suspension and interdict might be prepared and the petitioner or complainer in anticipation of jurisdiction being c against the defender by arrestment. In such a case jurisdiction o when an order of service is pronounced by the officiating Judge. But of a summons is different. It is not only a warrant for service, bu form and substance a warrant for decree against the defender, unles shew a 'reasonable cause to the contrary.' The issue of a summons ingly an act of jurisdiction, as indeed appears from the consideratio our older practice, the summons was preceded by a bill, and bore to b ex deliberatione dominorum. I am therefore of opinion that the question (that of John Drynan and mandatory) is defective on the want of jurisdiction, and that the arrestments used in the action ca pete with those of the other opposing creditors. . . ."

[1] Dickson, De Wolfe, & Co. v. Wilkin, June 25, 1859, 31 Scot. Ju

[2] Aitken v. Dick, July 7, 1863, 1 Macph. 1038, 35 Scot. Jur. 596; Macdougall, Nov. 18, 1887, ante, p. 78.

[3] Ersk. Inst. iii. 6, 3; Stair, iv. 3, 20.

having put his name to it, the Keeper of the Signet must affix the signet, but the proceeding was ineffectual if no defender were cited. It might be against a dead man, or a mere name. It would fall, too, in a year and day, unless executed. After execution, however, the action being "begun," the summons would last for forty years.[1]

The Lord Ordinary sought to shew that a summons differed from another writ, because it was "in form and substance a warrant for decree." But without execution on the defender it was no warrant for decree. The signeting of it was an authority to serve it, but not because it had been considered by a Judge at all, as in the case of a petition presented to the Court and considered, and which the Court might refuse to order to be served.[2] A summons got its name "a summonendo," because "the execution thereof advertises the defender to appear."[3] Its certification, which Stair called its "sting," and regarded as its important feature, required execution.

The Lord Ordinary thought that all summonses formerly required to proceed ex deliberatione dominorum concilii, but this was an historical error. Only privileged summonses so proceeded, and for the reason that the bill was presented to obtain for them the privilege of a short induciæ upon some specialty.[4] An ordinary summons would pass the signet as of course. This misapprehension had misled the Lord Ordinary and formed an erroneous ground of judgment. But further, it was impossible to say that for every writ which passed the signet ex deliberatione dominorum concilii jurisdiction was required. A bill to obtain letters of arrestment to found jurisdiction passed the signet ex deliberatione dominorum concilii, and yet ex hypothesi there was then no jurisdiction founded. To see this it was only necessary to look at the bill for letters of arrestment in this case.

Argued for the respondents;—The practice was that the signeting of the summons proceeding on a warrant of arrestment should follow the execution of the letters of arrestment. No instance to the contrary could be cited by the reclaimer. In this particular case, as in all others, the summons when signeted bore to be against a defender "against whom arrestments have been used jurisdictionis fundandæ causa," shewing both the practice and the general opinion of its necessity. The style books made the practice quite clear.[5] It was always stated in such a summons that the arrestment had already been used. A signeted summons was a warrant for letters of arrestment as on a depending action "upon production of the libelled summons."[6] Erskine's doctrine was that "no action can be brought against" a foreigner actually abroad "till his effects be attached by arrestment."[7] A summons was an order of the Sovereign, the fountain of jurisdiction, that the alleged debtor should appear and plead. It was thus an act of jurisdiction. It was an order to come into the Court that claimed jurisdiction to judge the defender, and there could be no order, even for service, on a foreigner without jurisdiction.[8]

---

[1] Aitken v. Dick, supra (Lord Deas), 1 Macph. 1041.

[2] Macdonell's Trustees v. Oregonian Railway Company, June 12, 1884, 11 R. 912.

[3] Stair, iv. 3, 27; Shand's Practice, i. 209; W.S. Society v. S.S.C. Society, Feb. 25, 1880, M. App. College of Justice, I.

[4] Beveridge's Forms of Process, 234; Shand's Practice, i. 264; Stair, iv. 3, 32 and 33.

[5] Juridical Styles, 2d ed. (1828), p. 4 and pp. 550, 553.

[6] Act 33 Geo. III. cap. 74, sec. 3, and see Act 54 Geo. III. c. 137, sec. 3.

[7] Ersk. i. 2, 19; iii. 6, 5 (Ivory's note); iv. 1, 4.

[8] Kames' Law Tracts, vol. i., No. 7, History of Courts, p. 374.

No. 67.

Feb. 1, 1888.
Walls' Trustees v. Drynan.

At advising,—

Lord President.—This is a process of multiplepoinding brought for the purpose of distributing the estate of the deceased John Walls. One portion of the estate belongs under his settlement to his son Thomas Walls, and his share has been attached by Mr Drynan, an arresting creditor, who has preferred a claim in the present process. The Lord Ordinary has found in reference to his claim, —"With reference to the claim of John Drynan and mandatory, finds that when the summons at their instance, containing a warrant for arrestment, passed the signet, jurisdiction had not been founded against Thomas Walls, and consequently that the said warrant of arrestment, and the execution of arrestment following thereon, are null and ineffectual."

It is not disputed in point of fact that when the summons at the instance of Mr Drynan and his mandatory passed the signet jurisdiction had not been founded against Thomas Walls; and the question we have now to determine is whether the consequence of that is that the proceedings which followed are null and void.

The state of the fact, as I understand it, is that on the 21st September 1886, the summons at the instance of Mr Drynan against Mr Thomas Walls was signeted, but that at that date although Drynan had obtained letters of arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem, they had not been executed. They were executed on the 23d September following, and on the same day an arrestment was executed on the dependence of the action. On the 24th September the summons was served personally on Thomas Walls.

I am not able to agree with the opinion of the Lord Ordinary as to the effect of these proceedings. I do not think that the circumstance of there being no jurisdiction against the defender at the time when the summons passed the signet was of any consequence. The Lord Ordinary seems to think that the presenting of a summons to the signet to be signeted is in some sense an application to a Court or a Judge. But to my mind it does not at all partake of that nature. The Keeper of the Signet is not a Judge, neither is he the deputy of a Judge, and still less are any of the Clerks or Writers to the Signet such deputies. The whole effect of obtaining a summons to be signeted is that in the Queen's name a warrant is issued by the Keeper of the Signet or his deputy for serving a summons. That is not in any sense a judicial act.

The Lord Ordinary has, I think, been misled in coming to that conclusion by a mistake which he has made in the history of summonses. He seems to think that all summonses were formerly preceded by bills. But this is not the case. No summons ever required a bill. No doubt there was a class of summonses which were called "privileged summonses," in which the pursuer could apply to the Court for leave to serve upon a shorter induciæ, but the bill in such cases was required not as an authority for serving the summons but for shortening the induciæ. Otherwise there was no occasion for a bill, and accordingly I think the proposition is universal and incontestable that no summons ever required a bill.

That being so, the question comes to be, when is it necessary that the Court should have jurisdiction over a defender personally in order to make a judgment against him effectual? Certainly it is not necessary that it should have that jurisdiction before the action commences, and it has been very recently determined in this Court that an action commences when a summons is served, and not sooner (Alston v. Macdougall, 15 R. 78). Accordingly on that ground alone, it is enough to say that jurisdiction is founded in perfectly good time if it is founded when the summons is served, because until the summons is served there is no action.

But I am not sure that even that is the true view, because the first and only time that the defender has an opportunity of objecting to the jurisdiction of the Court before which he is brought is when he lodges his defences. He cannot possibly do so sooner, and he cannot do it later. That is his only opportunity; primus actus judicii est judicis approbatorius. And if he comes into Court and does not object to the jurisdiction, it will be too late to do so afterwards, and the judgment pronounced against him will be perfectly effectual, even although jurisdiction has not been created against him.

No doubt there are cases where it is the interest of the Court itself to raise the question of jurisdiction. If the Court is asked to entertain a question which is outwith its jurisdiction, it is pars judicis to take exception in such a case. For instance, in a question regarding the claim to a peerage, we should not sustain our jurisdiction even if none of the parties were to raise the objection. So in cases of privative jurisdiction, it is pars judicis to interfere to prevent the jurisdiction of the only Court which may be entitled to adjudicate in the cause from being ousted even by the agreement of parties.

But where an individual is made subject to the jurisdiction of a Court by the possession of heritable estate or in any other way, such as by arrestment, the Court has no interest to interfere. The defender alone has an interest, and is entitled to do so, and if he does not state the objection, then no one else has an interest to do so, and the objection falls. On the other hand, if he does state it, the question which is raised is not whether the Court had jurisdiction over the defender at any antecedent time, but whether it has jurisdiction de præsenti at the time when the objection is stated, and if it has, I do not see how the objection can be sustained.

I am of opinion that the finding of the Lord Ordinary is not well founded, that the arrestment and decree were competently and validly obtained, and that the reclaimer is entitled to be ranked according to the priority of his decree in point of time.

LORD MURE.—I think the broad ground on which your Lordship has rested your opinion is the right ground to decide the case on; and that upon that footing the Lord Ordinary should have refused to give effect to the plea of want of jurisdiction. If, however, it had been necessary to shew that before the raising of the summons an arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem had been validly executed, it appears to me that in the present case the facts are sufficient to support that result. The letters of arrestment were signeted on the 20th of September, and the summons on the 21st, and although the letters of arrestment were not executed until the 23d, the summons on the other hand was not served until the 24th, so that the arrestment was completed before the summons was served; and even upon the strictest view of the law I think that the jurisdiction was good, because it was created before the summons was executed. I cannot adopt the view that the signeting of the summons was an act of jurisdiction. I think that the passage from Erskine (III. 6, 3) which was cited by Sir Charles Pearson states the law correctly, and that an action cannot be held to be begun until after the execution of the summons.

No. 67.

Feb. 1, 1888.
Walls' Trustees v. Drynan.

Lord Adam.—I am of opinion that the signeting of a summons volve any assertion or exercise of judicial authority. It is a warran the Queen's name to cite a defender before the Court. The quest diction only arises when the person who is so cited appears before that question being not whether at any antecedent time a person not subject to that jurisdiction, but whether he is at that time su being so, I think the arrestments in the present case are valid, a Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in this matter should be recalled.

Lord Shand was absent.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the locutor so far as it finds with reference to the claim John Drynan and mandatory, 'that when the summo instance containing a warrant of arrestment passed the diction had not been founded against Thomas Walls, quently that the said warrants of arrestment following null and ineffectual': Find that the decree and arrestm on by the said claimants are not open to any objecti ground that the Court had no jurisdiction to pronoun decree: Also recall the interlocutor so far as it finds t John Drynan and mandatory liable to the other clain penses: Find the said John Drynan and mandatory expenses since the date of the said interlocutor against ants William Firth, Sons, & Company, and Peter Ryan

Campbell & Smith, S.S.C.—Scott Moncrieff & Trail, W.S.—
J. & J. Galletly, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 68.

Feb. 1, 1888.
Earl of Strathmore v. Heritors of Rescobie.

Earl of Strathmore, First Party.—Sol.-Gen. Robertson— Heritors of Rescobie, Second Parties.—Sir Charles Pearson

Church—Church Patronage (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 and 38 V secs. 4 and 5—Patron's compensation.—A patron obtained in 1875 the Church Patronage Act, 1874, an interlocutor by the Sheriff dete amount of compensation to which he was entitled under the Act fo the patronage of a parish, and finding and declaring that on the c a vacancy he should be entitled to receive from the heritors pay amount by four equal yearly instalments out of the first four years' vacancy occurred in the parish in 1880, and a new minister was ap the patron did not intimate the Sheriff's interlocutor to the heritors payment of his compensation till 1887—the whole stipend having meantime paid in each year to the minister. Held that as the heri bona fide in paying away the whole stipends for the four years ove deduction in respect of the compensation would have spread, the pat his claim against them by neglecting to apply for his compensation period.

1st Division.
B.

Prior to the passing of the Church Patronage Act, 1874 Vict. cap. 82), the Earl of Strathmore and Kinghorn was pat parish of Rescobie, in the county of Forfar.

Within six months after the passing of the Act, viz., on 26 1875, a petition was presented to the Sheriff of Forfarshire for to have the sum of compensation to which he was entitled in terms of the 4th and 5th sections of the statute.*

---

* The 4th section of the Act 37 and 38 Vict. c. 82, enacte cases in which the patronage of a parish is held, either solely by a private patron, or any guardian or trustee on his behalf,

No. 68.

Feb. 1, 1888.
Earl of Strathmore v. Heritors of Rescobie.

On 18th March 1875 the Sheriff-substitute (Robertson) pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . Further found and determined, and hereby finds and determines, that the compensation to be paid to the said petitioner, . . . or those in his right, in respect of the operation of e foresaid Act, for the parish of Rescobie, is £233, 1s. sterling, being e sum which, on an average of the three years 1871, 1872, and 1873, minister has received in name of stipend out of the teinds of the said ish of Rescobie: Therefore found and declared, and hereby finds and clares, that on the occurrence of a vacancy in the said parish of scobie the petitioner, . . . or those in his right, shall be entitled nless the sum shall be otherwise provided) to receive from the heritors the said parish of Rescobie payment of the foresaid sum of £233, 1s. rling, and that by four equal yearly instalments out of the first four ars' stipend which, but for the passing of the foresaid Act, would have en wholly payable by them to the minister to be appointed on the currence of said vacancy, or his successors, in said parish . . . ."

The petition was not served on the heritors, nor was any intimation of e Sheriff's interlocutor made to them.

In 1880, a vacancy having occurred in the parish, a new minister was pointed. Lord Strathmore made no application to the heritors for payment of the compensation to which he had been found entitled until 887, and they had paid to the minister the whole of the stipend for wful for him, or for such guardian or trustee, at any time within six onths after the passing of this Act, to present a petition to the Sheriff f the county praying him to determine the compensation to be paid to ch patron in respect of the operation of this Act; but it shall not be cumbent on any such patron, or upon any guardian or trustee for such tron, whether the patronage is held upon a fee-simple title or under a deed of tail or other limited title, to present such petition; and if no such petition hall be presented within the said period, it shall be held and taken that the claim for such compensation has been renounced, and no claim therefor shall afterwards be competent in any manner of way. . . ."

---

The 5th section provided,—"Upon any petition for the determination of the compensation payable under this Act being presented, the Sheriff shall order it to be intimated to the minister of the parish to which the petition relates, and to the clerk of the presbytery of the bounds, and, after the expiry of the induciæ of twenty-one days, whether with or without answers, shall first inquire as to the title of the petitioner, and, if he shall be satisfied thereof, he shall proceed to determine the amount of such compensation, which shall be equal to one year's stipend of the parish to which the petition relates when the petitioner is sole patron, and such proportion thereof as to the Sheriff shall seem just when the petitioner is a joint patron; and the Sheriff shall pronounce an interlocutor finding and declaring that, on the occurrence of a vacancy in the parish, the petitioner, or those in his right, shall be entitled, unless the sum shall be otherwise provided, to receive from the heritors payment of the amount of compensation found due, by four equal yearly instalments out of the first four years' stipend, which, but for the passing of this Act, would have been wholly payable by them to the minister to be appointed on the occurrence of said vacancy, or his successor in such parish, or in the case of the appointment of an assistant and successor, out of the first four years' stipend which, but for the passing of this Act, would have been wholly payable after the date of such appointment to the minister of such parish; and the petitioner, or those in his right, shall have the same or the like remedy for recovery of said compensation which a minister has for the recovery of his stipend: Provided that where the patron is himself an heritor of the parish he shall be entitled to retain and appropriate the sum or sums of stipend which, had he not been himself the patron, would, under the operation of this Act, have been payable by him to the patron of the parish."

No. 68.

Feb. 1, 1888.
Earl of Strathmore v. Heritors of Rescobie.

crops and years 1881, 1882, 1883, and 1884 without making tion for that compensation.

A dispute having arisen between Lord Strathmore and the to whether the latter were liable in compensation in these circ they presented a special case to the Court in which they aske tion, "Is the first party" (Lord Strathmore) "entitled to deman from the second parties of the said sum of £233, 1s.?"

The case bore,—Lord Strathmore "maintains that he is now demand payment from the second parties of the said sum of £ respect that the said Act 37 and 38 Vict. c. 82, being a publi were bound to know that the legal obligation of paying comp provided by said Act rested upon them, and that, not having f obligation, they are now, as in a question with the first part pay him the sum to which he was found entitled by the Sh second parties decline to pay the first party any part of the s the ground that no intimation of the decree was made to th first party until after the expiry of four years from the appo the new minister, and that they have bona fide paid the whole the present incumbent. They maintain that it was the duty party to intimate that he had availed himself of the option wh under the Act of applying for compensation, and so interpel paying the whole stipend to the minister."

Argued for the first party;—The second parties must shew had probable ground for believing that the minister was the creditor before they could be held to have paid to him in bona first party's right to compensation might be illustrated by the ca intimated assignation, but there was this difference, that the d were aware, or ought to have been aware, of their obligation, w on a public statute. It was not stated that the heritors were i of the first party's rights, and, according to the words of th was only if no petition were presented within six months from of the Act that it was to be held that the claim to compe renounced.

Argued for the second parties;—There was no duty put upo the Act to inquire whether the first party intended to enforc for compensation. The 4th section of the Act was directly adv such view. The second parties having paid away the stipend ister in bona fide, the patron had lost all claim to compensatio ting to apply for payment within the four years after the appointment.[2]

Lord President.—The answer to the question put in this case d the construction to be placed upon the two clauses of the statute Vict. cap. 82) which have been brought before us. In the first p section enacts that "in all cases in which the patronage of a pa either solely or jointly, by a private patron, or any guardian or tr behalf, it shall be lawful for him, or for such guardian or trustee, within six months after the passing of this Act, to present a pet Sheriff of the county praying him to determine the compensation such patron in respect of the operation of this Act"; and then foll sion, which throws light upon the general tone of the statute, to th

---

[1] Erskine's Inst. iii. 4, 3.

[2] Collector of Vacant Stipends v. Parishioners of Maybole, 166
Stair's Inst. i. 18, 3; College of Aberdeen v. Lord Aboyne, 1679, M

No. 68.

Feb. 1, 1883.
Earl of Strathmore v. Heritors of Rescobie.

"it shall not be incumbent on any such patron, or upon any guardian or trustee for such patron, whether the patronage is held upon a fee-simple title or under a deed of entail or other limited title, to present such petition." The right given by the statute is accordingly a right which it is left entirely in the discretion of the patron to exercise, and although he be an heir of entail, or a guardian, or a trustee, he is not to be under any obligation to present a petition. He is to exercise his judgment whether he will present a petition or not, and if he does not present a petition within six months, he is to have no claim for compensation. Such is the import of the 4th section of the statute.

The 5th section makes provision for working out the right given by the 4th section. It provides that "upon any petition for the determination of the compensation payable under this Act being presented, the Sheriff shall order it to be intimated to the minister of the parish to which the petition relates, and to the clerk of the presbytery of the bounds." There is no provision for intimation to anyone but the minister. There is to be no intimation to the heritors, and the reason for that is the clear one, that no new obligation is created against them, and no decree is to be pronounced. If they were to be subjected to a new obligation in favour of a new creditor, I cannot doubt that the statute would have appointed that intimation should be made to them. But the section goes on further to enact that the Sheriff must satisfy himself about the title of the petitioner, and thereafter "he shall proceed to determine the amount of such compensation, which shall be equal to one year's stipend of the parish to which the petition relates when the petitioner is sole patron, and such proportion thereof as to the Sheriff shall seem just when the petitioner is a joint patron." Then the very terms are given in which the Legislature enacts that the interlocutor is to be pronounced,—"And the Sheriff shall pronounce an interlocutor finding and declaring that, on the occurrence of a vacancy in the parish, the petitioner, or those in his right, shall be entitled, unless the sum shall be otherwise provided, to receive from the heritors payment of the amount of compensation found due, by four equal yearly instalments out of the first four years' stipend, which, but for the passing of this Act, would have been wholly payable by them to the minister to be appointed on the occurrence of said vacancy, or his successor in such parish, or in the case of the appointment of an assistant and successor, out of the first four years' stipend which, but for the passing of this Act, would have been wholly payable after the date of such appointment to the minister of such parish; and the petitioner, or those in his right, shall have the same or the like remedy for recovery of said compensation which a minister has for the recovery of his stipend: Provided that where the patron is himself an heritor of the parish he shall be entitled to retain and appropriate the sum or sums of stipend which, had he not been himself the patron, would, under the operation of this Act, have been payable by him to the patron of the parish."

In the first place, there is no authority given to the Sheriff to pronounce decree of payment against the heritors. All the Sheriff is given authority to do is to grant decree to the effect that there is a right or privilege belonging to the patron to intervene between the heritor and the minister, and to ask that a certain portion of the stipend shall be assigned for the purpose of paying off the compensation to which he has been found entitled. The way in which the money is to be recovered is "by four equal yearly instalments out of the first four years' stipend," meaning that the first instalment is to be paid out of the first year's stipend after the presentation of the new minister, and so on for four years, so that the patron's right attaches immediately on the first year's stipend becoming payable, and to that year's stipend. The patron is entitled then to come forward. If he does not choose to ask payment out of the first year's stipend, he is simply neglecting his own interests very seriously, and is not observing the statute. He is to come to the heritors and to ask for payment of his instalment. The heritors are not his debtors, because there is no decree against them. If there had been, it would have been their duty to go to the creditor and make payment to him, and they could not have expected him to come to them to ask for payment. The debtor's duty is to go to his creditor. But here the patron's duty was to go to the heritors and intimate to them that he intended to ask payment of an instalment. He might have got his first instalment out of the stipend for the year 1881,—and so on for the next three years,—but he failed to do so. It is an ascertained fact that he made no intimation of his intention to claim compensation until March 1887.

No. 68.

Feb. 1, 1888.
Earl of Strathmore v. Heritors of Rescobie.

While such was the state of matters in regard to the patron, what were the heritors doing? The determination of the Sheriff was dated as far back as 1875—there had been no intimation to them of the petition to the Sheriff or of the determination of the Sheriff thereon—and there was further no intimation in 1880, when the vacancy occurred, that it gave rise to such a claim on the part of the patron. The heritors never heard of the claim until 1887. I do not say that there was any statutory obligation upon the patron to make intimation to the heritors,—but the question is whether the patron has not debarred himself from now challenging payments which were made in good faith by parties who had no reason to suppose that the claim would be enforced. I think it is clear that the payments were made in good faith. I do not say that the heritors were not bound to know of the provisions of the Act of Parliament, and of the possibility that such a claim might exist. But they were not in any case bound to know what the determination of the Sheriff was—nor that the patron had made up his mind to exercise the discretion which was vested in him by the statute—because even after the interlocutor of the Sheriff is pronounced, it is a mere matter of will whether the patron proceeds further or not.

Seeing, therefore, that there was no movement on the part of the patron for so many years, I can have no doubt of the good faith of the heritors in paying the stipend in full to the minister. There was very serious neglect on the part of the patron, and good faith on the other side, and that, I think, is enough for the decision of the question.

Lord Mure.—The decision of this question depends upon the provisions of the statute founded upon in the case, under the 5th section of which a patron "on the occurrence of a vacancy in the parish . . . shall be entitled . . . to receive from the heritors payment of the amount of compensation found due." It is provided by the preceding section that the amount of that compensation must be fixed within six months of the passing of the Act, and in the present case that appears to have been done by petition to the Sheriff as required by the statute. But no service of that petition was made upon the second parties; and it is admitted that no intimation of the decree, or of the patron's intention to claim compensation, was made to them till seven years after the appointment of the new minister. In these circumstances, the heritors were, I think, in perfect bona fides in continuing to pay the stipend to the minister as they had previously done. The heritors are not in this matter debtors to the patron in the ordinary ense—they are holders of a fund belonging to the minister and payable to him s stipend, unless some portion of it is demanded from them by the patron, as n competition with the minister to whom the heritor is in the ordinary case ound to pay. I have no difficulty, therefore, in holding with your Lordship hat the heritors are not now bound to pay over again to the patron the sum hich they have already paid to the clergyman.

No. 68.

Feb. 1, 1888.
Earl of Strathmore v. Heritors of Rescobie.

Lord Adam.—I think, in the first place, that the heritors have, bona fide, aid the whole stipend to the present incumbent, and in the second place, that hey had probable ground for believing that they were making payment to the rue creditor. If that is so, there is no foundation for the contention of the irst party.

I do not think the presentation of a petition by a patron to have a sum of ompensation fixed in the least indicates that he intends to insist upon claiming compensation when his right to do so emerges. The object of the statute was that the whole amount of compensation claimed by the patron should be settled at once—i.e., within six months from the passing of the Act—and accordingly these petitions were in many cases brought—although, as I have said, I do not think it was intended to indicate thereby that compensation would be claimed.

The fund from which the first party maintains a deduction should have been made came into existence in each year and disappeared in each year. It is not an ordinary case of debt. The stipend was paid out of a particular fund, and if it was all paid away by the heritors there is no other fund out of which the compensation can be paid. There was a clear duty upon the patron to make his demand timeously—and not having done so, I think the heritors were bound to pay the minister his stipend in the usual way.

Lord Shand was absent.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find and declare that in the circumstances the first party is not entitled to demand payment from the second party of the sum of £233, 1s. mentioned in the case, and decern."

Dundas & Wilson, C.S.—Mackenzie & Black, W.S.—Agents.

No. 69.

Feb. 2, 1888.
Montgomery's Trustees v. Montgomery.

Sir W. S. Walker, K.C.B., and Another (Montgomery's Trustees), First Parties.—Gloag—H. Johnston.
James Montgomery, Second Party.—Mackay—Martin.

Trust—Denuding—Renunciation of alimentary liferent—Marriage-contract.—By antenuptial marriage-contract trustees were directed to pay the income of the trust-estate (which amounted to £18,500, £16,000 being contributed by the husband's father, and £2500 by the wife) to the spouses during the subsistence of the marriage, and to the husband in the event of his wife's death. The income was declared to be "strictly alimentary." After the death of both spouses, if one child survived, he or she was to get £10,000 of the capital; if two survived, they were to get £12,000; if more, they were to get the whole. It was further provided that in the event of only one or two children surviving, "the residue of said trust-capital shall be at the disposal of" the husband "or his heirs, executors, or assignees." Failing surviving children, the whole capital was to be paid over to the representatives of the spouses in the proportions advanced by or for them.

After the death of the wife, and there being only two children of the marriage surviving, the husband called upon the trustees to denude of the trust-funds, in so far as they exceeded £12,000, upon his renouncing and discharging his life-

No. 69.
—
Feb. 2, 1888.
Montgomery's
Trustees v.
Montgomery.
—
1st Division.
B.

rent of the surplus. In a special case, held that the trustees were or bound to denude.

Question, whether if the children had consented to take immedi of their provisions the trustees could have refused to denude.

In an antenuptial marriage-contract, dated 10th and 16th between James Montgomery and Miss Eleanora Anstruthe
Mr Montgomery's father bound himself to pay to the trustees £16,000, and the said Eleanora Anstruther Thomson bound hers the trustees the sum of £2500. Both payments were made.

The trustees under the contract were appointed to hold the and to pay the free income during the subsistence of the mar spouses, and in the event of the dissolution of the marriage b of Mrs Montgomery, to pay the free income to Mr Montgon the remainder of his life. It was further declared "that the f or annual proceeds aforesaid so to be paid over to the said Ja gomery and Eleanora Anstruther Thomson, or the survivor of be strictly alimentary, and shall not be arrestable or affect debts or deeds of the said James Montgomery and Eleanora Thomson, or either of them, or of the survivor, or by the diliger his, or her creditors."

It was further provided :—" Quarto, with regard to the disp capital or principal of the said trust-funds after the decease of liver of the said James Montgomery and Eleanora Anstruthe and of the free interest or annual proceeds to accrue thereon event till the arrival of the terms of payment after specified, th trustees or trustee acting for the time may hold and retain the for behoof of the child or children who may be procreated of tended marriage, and the issue of such child or children, whon hereinafter written, for behoof of the persons or person to who failure, the same is likewise hereinafter provided, and shall and pay over the said capital to the said child or children, issue, at the times and in the manner following, viz. :—If onl shall be procreated of the said intended marriage, and shall attai or being a daughter, shall be married, and if such child shall longest liver of the said James Montgomery and Eleanora Thomson, or shall die leaving lawful issue, to account for an to the said child or issue the sum of £10,000 of the said trust-if two children shall be procreated of the said intended ma shall attain to majority, or being daughters, shall be married, children shall survive the longest liver of the said James M and Eleanora Anstruther Thomson, or if either of them shall lawful issue, to account for and pay over to the said children sum of £12,000 of the said trust-capital, and that equally be two children, or in case of the death of one or both of them, t have right to the share of the parent equally amongst them; an of the above events of there being only one or two children, t of said trust-capital shall be at the disposal of the said James M or his heirs, executors, or assignees; and if three or more chil be procreated of the said intended marriage, and shall attain to being daughters, shall be married, and if such children shall s longest liver of the said James Montgomery and Eleanora Thomson, or if any of them shall die leaving lawful issue, to a and pay over to the said children or issue the whole of the capital . . . And in the event that there shall be no child of the said intended marriage, or issue of the bodies of such children, surviving at the death of the longest liver of the s

No. 69.
—
Feb. 2, 1888.
Montgomery's Trustees v. Montgomery.

Montgomery and Eleanora Anstruther Thomson, or that such as may survive the longest liver and their issue shall die before majority, or being daughters, before marriage, that the said trustees, or trustee acting for the time, shall pay over, assign, and convey to and in favour of the assignees, executors, or nearest of kin of the said James Montgomery and Eleanora Anstruther Thomson respectively, the whole of the said trust-capital, and that in the proportions respectively advanced by or for them as herein specified."

Mrs Montgomery died on 8th January 1878, and was survived by her husband and by three children, one of whom died unmarried and intestate in 1885.

The marriage-contract trustees and the husband now presented this special case, to which they were respectively the first and second parties, to have the following question which had arisen between them determined,—"Whether on the second party renouncing and discharging his right to the liferent of the marriage-contract funds, so far as they exceed £12,000, the first parties are bound to denude of the surplus in his favour?"

The marriage-contract funds in the hands of the trustees amounted at the date of the case to £18,966, 0s. 10d.

The case further bore:—"The second party maintains that in consequence of the children of the marriage being reduced to two in number, the first parties are bound, on his renouncing and discharging pro tanto his liferent, to denude in his favour of the trust-estate in so far as the same exceeds the principal sum of £12,000, being the provision made in the marriage-contract in the event of there being only two children of the marriage or issue of such children. The first parties maintain that as the provision of the liferent in favour of the second party is declared to be strictly alimentary, and not arrestable or affectable for the debts or deeds of the first party, or the diligence of his creditors, the second party is not in titulo to renounce or discharge his liferent in any part of the trust-estate, but that the first parties are bound to hold the whole capital of the trust-funds so long as the second party survives. The first parties also maintain that they hold the whole trust-funds as fiduciary fiars, and in security of the provision to the children of the marriage, whatever their number."

Argued for the first parties;—The bulk of the marriage-contract funds was provided by the husband's father for the purposes of the marriage. As a condition of the marriage, it was stipulated that the income of the fund should be alimentary, and it must continue so. So long also as there were children's interests to protect, the fund must be retained by the trustees, and the marriage-contract must subsist. The present case was a fortiori of that of Corbet,[1] because there was no need here, as there, to have recourse to extraneous evidence to explain the contract, and there were here no directions to pay over the residue to the husband. The husband had a power of testing, and nothing else. The case of Martin[2] relied upon on the other side was very different from the present. There was no reason there for keeping up the protecting trust, as one of the spouses had died, and there were no children of the marriage.

Argued for the second party;—The radical right to the surplus fund which he claimed was in him, and there were no trust purposes remaining

---

[1] Corbet, &c. v. Waddell, &c., Nov. 13, 1879, 7 R. 200; cf. also Smith v. Campbell, May 30, 1873, 11 Macph. 639, 45 Scot. Jur. 403; White's Trustees v. White, June 1, 1877, 4 R. 786; Duthie's Trustees v. Kinloch, &c., June 5, 1878, 5 R. 858; Barron v. Barron's Trustees, July 7, 1887, 24 S. L. R. 735.

[2] Martin v. Bannatyne, &c., March 8, 1861, 23 D. 705, 33 Scot. Jur. 347.

No. 69.
—
Feb. 2, 1888.
Montgomery's
Trustees v.
Montgomery.

unfulfilled, the £12,000 being retained by the trustees for the This was not the case of a third party providing the marriage fund subject to conditions, as in Corbet's case.[1] The footing upc the £16,000 was provided by the husband's father was rather gave his son his legitim antecedently. The present case was on with that of Martin.[2] Corbet's case was very different, because marriage was still subsisting, and there were children alive.

Lord President.—In this case, in the arguments of the two partie was placed upon the one side on the case of Corbet, &c. v. Wa (7 R. 200), and upon the other side on the case of Martin v. Bannaty 705). It humbly appears to me that neither of these cases has any a to the present case.

In Corbet's case there was a subsisting marriage-contract trust,— husband and wife were alive, and there were children of the mar accordingly there were interests of all kinds which fell to be prote which were protected by the marriage-contract. The liferent intere parents, and the ultimate interests of the children were dealt with in and the only question raised by the case was whether there was an a liferent settled on the husband, and whether a contingent right to a the fee was attached by the diligence of creditors of the husband, become bankrupt. In Martin's case, the whole trust purposes had been —there were no longer any interests to protect, and in short the mar tract was no longer operative, and was at an end.

Such are not the conditions of the present case. There is here a contract still in subsistence. Although the marriage has been dissolv death of the wife, there are children whose interests are provided f marriage-contract, and the husband, who is still alive, has a liferent of fund. It therefore appears to me that the decision of the present case not upon authority, but upon the construction of the marriage-contrac

By the marriage-contract the husband's father provided a sum of and the lady herself a sum of £2500,—both of which were convey trustees. One of the purposes of the trust was to provide a strictly a annuity of the whole trust-fund to the spouses jointly and to the That was the leading purpose of the deed, and then follows a clause w to the disposal of the capital. After the decease of the longest liv spouses, it is provided that the trustees "may hold and retain the sa for behoof of the child or children who may be procreated of the said marriage, and the issue of such child or children, whom failing, as h written, for behoof of the persons or person to whom, on their failure, is likewise hereinafter provided." Then the provisions in various eve children are very clearly specified,—if there be only one child of the who attains majority, or being a daughter, is married, and survives th liver of the spouses, or dies leaving lawful issue, he or she is to have of the capital of the trust-fund paid over to her. If there be two children who live to attain majority, or being daughters, to marry, and survive both parents, then the two are to have £12,000 equally between them. If there be three or more children who attain majority, or being daughters, are married, and survive both parents, then the entire trust-capital is to be divided among them in such shares as shall be prescribed by the father in a deed of appointment and failing such deed, equally among them. Such is the scheme of the trust, and it is provided that in either of the two first events,—that is, if there is either only one or two children of the marriage,—then "the residue of the trust-capital shall be at the disposal of the said James Montgomery, or his heirs, executors, or assignees." Then follows a provision for the case of there being no child or children, or issue of any child or children surviving at the death of the longest liver of the spouses, or of such as may survive the longest liver and their issue dying before majority, or being daughters, before marriage,—in that event "the said trustees or trustee acting for the time shall pay over, assign, and convey to and in favour of the assignees, executors, or nearest of kin of the said James Montgomery and Eleanora Anstruther Thomson respectively, the whole of the said trust-capital, and that in the proportions respectively advanced by or for them as herein specified."

---

[1] 7 R. 200.

[2] Martin v. Bannatyne, &c., March 8, 1861, 23 D. 705, 33 Scot. cf. also Urquhart's Trustees v. Urquhart, Nov. 23, 1886, 14 R. 112; M &c. v. Mackenzie's Trustees, July 10, 1878, 5 R. 1027; Hamilton's T Hamilton, July 9, 1879, 6 R. 1216; M'Lean's Trustees v. M'Lean, 1878, 5 R. 679.

I do not think that the deed is one difficult to construe. I think that the different events which are contemplated in it are very clearly dealt with, and that the provisions are set forth in very plain language. The part of the deed which requires construction is that which deals with the disposal of the residue in the event of there being only one or two children. The capital as originally provided amounted to £18,500, and it now amounts to something more by reason of favourable investment; so that in the event of there being only one child, under the provisions of the deed the residue would be the difference between £10,000 and the amount of the capital as it then stood, and in the event of there being two children it would be the difference between £12,000 and the amount of that capital. It is to be observed that there is no direction to the trustees in any event to convey or pay over what is called the residue. In the event of there being no child at all surviving the spouses, then there is a direction to pay over and convey the whole of the trust-capital to the assignees, executors, or nearest of kin of the two spouses in the proportions contributed by each spouse, viz., £16,000 to the representatives of the husband and £2500 to the wife's representatives. In regard to the residue, as I have said, there is no direction to pay at all. What is directed is that it "shall be at the disposal of the said James Montgomery or his heirs, executors, or assignees." That means nothing more than that he can dispose of the residue by a deed to take effect after his death. That is clearly a power of testamentary disposition, and the use of the word "assignees" does not seem to me to create any difficulty. If that be so, then it is plain to my mind that it was not intended by the marriage-contract that the so-called residue should, in the event which has happened, ever be paid over to the husband during his lifetime.

If it had happened that it was not necessary to keep up the marriage-contract trust for the protection of any of the interests involved in it, it might have followed on the authority of many cases that the residue might have come into the husband's hands during his lifetime. If the two children consented to put an end to the trust, it would make a very different case. If they gave their father their consent now, I do not know that anyone would have an interest to interfere. But they are not here. It is said that it is a sufficient securit if the trustees retain £12,000 for their behoof, but I cannot say th that is the meaning of the marriage-contract. I think the meaning i trust is to subsist in the events which have happened, and is to be k the benefit of the two children. The whole estate is to remain in of the trustees for the benefit of that security. If the trustees are t £12,000 only, it might be that when payment came to be demanded rities would have fallen in value or might be lost, and so the beneficia not have the protection which the marriage-contract intended.

No. 69.

Feb. 2, 1888.
Montgomery's Trustees v. Montgomery.

But if the intention was that the trust should be kept up until th are in a position to demand payment,—what about the husband's posi the deed? All that is provided for him is an alimentary liferent of funds. I do not know that he has any interest to have that convert alimentary to a non-alimentary fund. But the thing to which he i and the only thing, is an alimentary liferent. And that being so, answer the question put to us to the effect that the first parties are n or bound, in the event stated in the question, to denude of any surp marriage-contract funds over and above the £12,000.

Lord Mure.—I am of the same opinion. I think this deed has carefully framed with regard to the disposal of the liferent intere spouses in the capital-fund, and also of the fee of that fund; and I to read its provisions in any such sense as can on sound construction conclusion that any portion of the capital-fund was intended to be p either of the surviving spouses during the subsistence of the trust.
no words in the deed to warrant that result; while the clauses, on hand, which regulate the disposal of the liferent are express tha income of the fund conveyed to the trustees is to be paid over to the spouse, and is to be strictly alimentary. Why that clause should inserted, I do not know,—unless it was to prevent such a question as from being raised. It would, I conceive, be altogether inconsistent terms of these clauses to assent to the proposal here made.

Lord Adam.—We are not here dealing with a marriage-contract which has failed, or one in which the purposes have been imple become inoperative. Here the marriage-contract rules a subsisting that being so, the question is, what construction are we to put on i to carry out the intention of the parties to it? The husband is now an alimentary liferent of the whole trust-funds. The fourth purpo for the disposal of the fee, and it will be observed that directions a to what is to be done after the death of the longest liver of the two that is, on the death of the husband, he being the survivor. At of the longest liver the trustees are directed to pay £10,000 if th child, and £12,000 if there are two children. I agree with your that the absence of any direction to pay the balance of residue t viving spouse is significant, and like all the other directions poin that the disposal thereof is to take place at the death of the lon
What is not said is that Mr Montgomery shall have the disposal o of the residue during his life. It is evident he is not to be allowed the money; he is to dispose of it by mortis causa settlement, and if n

No. 69.

Feb. 2, 1888.
Montgomery's Trustees v. Montgomery.

goes to his heirs. This was evidently what was in the mind of the parties when the marriage-contract was made.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find and declare that the first parties are not entitled or bound to denude in favour of the second party of any surplus or residue of the marriage-contract funds in their hands beyond the sum of £12,000 upon his renouncing his right of liferent of the trust-funds in so far as they exceed the said sum," &c.

HENDERSON & CLARK, W.S.—F. J. MARTIN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 70.

Feb. 4, 1888.
M'Murchy v. Emslie & Guthrie.

DONALD M'MURCHY, Petitioner.—Lyell.
EMSLIE & GUTHRIE, Respondents.—Forsyth.

Arrestment—Recall—Burgh lamplighter—Wages Arrestment Limitation Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. cap. 63), secs. 1 and 2.—Held that the wages of a burgh lamplighter who had contracted with the Police Commissioners to look after the burgh lamps for £2, 4s. a-week during winter, when he was taken bound to employ two assistants at 10s. and 15s. respectively, and for 18s. in summer, were exempted from arrestment by the Wages Arrestment Limitation Act, 1870.

1ST DIVISION.
M.

DONALD M'MURCHY was employed as lamplighter at Oban under a contract with the Police Commissioners of the burgh to light, extinguish, and keep clean all their public lamps for a year from 18th August 1887. For the period to 20th April 1888 he was to get £2, 4s. per week. Out of that sum he was bound by the contract to employ and pay two men at wages of 10s. and 15s. respectively. From 20th April to 18th August 1888 he was to do the work himself at a wage of 18s. per week.

On 11th and 26th November 1887 arrestments were used in the hands of the Police Commissioners, attaching M'Murchy's wages for a debt incurred by him to Messrs Emslie & Guthrie, S.S.C., in connection with a litigation in which he had been unsuccessful. The Commissioners had accordingly since these dates declined to pay him the £2, 4s.

He now brought a petition for recall of these arrestments, stating that these weekly payments were his only source of income, and that he had a wife and children to maintain, and further that he was now unable to employ the two assistants.

Emslie & Guthrie answered that the proceeds of his contract did not constitute his sole income,—as he had the whole day at his disposal for other employment. Further under an arrangement the whole of his wages had not been withheld from him, and they were willing that one-half of them should continue to be paid to him.

Argued for the petitioner;—Under the Wages Arrestment Limitation Act (33 and 34 Vict. cap. 63)* the arrestments were not competent.[1]

Argued for the respondents;—The payments to the petitioner under the contract were not "wages." There was no obligation on the petitioner

---

* The 1st section of that Act enacted,—"That from and after the 1st January 1871 the wages of all labourers, farm-servants, manufacturers, artificers, and workpeople shall cease to be liable to arrestment for debts contracted subsequent to the passing of this Act, save as hereinafter excepted."

The 2d section enacted that—"If the amount of wages earned exceeds 20s. per week, any surplus above that amount shall still be liable to arrestment as before the passing of this Act," &c.

[1] Cf. Vincent v. Chalmers & Co.'s Trustee, Nov. 2, 1877, 5 R. 43; Dick v. Russell, Dec. 24, 1887, ante, p. 261.

No. 70.

Feb. 4, 1888.
M'Murchy v.
Emslie &
Guthrie.

to do any work himself. Further this was an arrestment in executio following on a decree, and there was no authority for the interference o the Court in a case of that kind.[1]

Lord President.—The question is whether the petitioner is within the word of the 1st section of the Wages Arrestment Limitation Act,—and to bring him within that section he must be either a labourer or a workman. The othe words of the section do not apply to him. The only other question is whethe the payments which he receives are "wages," and if so whether these are unde 20s. per week.

It is clear that so far as regards the summer months from April to Augus the petitioner is a labourer in the service of the Police Commissioners, and receives a wage of 18s. a-week. Can it be said that for the rest of the yea he changes his character from that of a labourer receiving wages to that of a contractor? I think there is not enough in the agreement to effect this change. No doubt during the latter period he is allowed £2, 4s. a-week, but out of that he has to provide for two assistants,—and in practice it comes to this, that he makes during these months 19s. instead of 18s. I do not think that is a sufficient distinction to take the case out of the statute.

Lord Mure and Lord Adam concurred.

Lord Shand was absent.

The Court granted the prayer of the petition, and recalled the arrestments.

Smith & Mason, S.S.C.—Emslie & Guthrie, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 71.

Feb. 7, 1888.
Spence v.
Boyd.

Mary Munro or Spence, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Kennedy—M'Lennan.
J. L. Boyd and Others, Defenders (Respondents).—Jameson—Salvesen.

Marriage-contract—Acquiescence—Trust.—By antenuptial contract of marriage the wife conveyed to trustees certain funds for behoof of herself in liferent, exclusive of her husband's rights, and of the children in fee. The husband conveyed nothing to the trustees, but he bound himself, inter alia, to insure his life in the trustees' names for a certain sum, and to pay the annual premium, and in the event of the trustees finding it necessary at any time "to pay to the company any sum or sums on account of the premium" he bound himself to repay them. He failed to pay the premium, and the trustees for many years, with the wife's knowledge, paid the premium out of the liferent of the wife, both they and she being in the belief that they were entitled to do so. Thereafter the wife being desirous that her income should be free of the burden of keeping up the policy, and a doubt having been raised as to the power of the trustees to keep it up out of her income, the two spouses and the trustees entered into an agreement for the sale of the policy, on the footing that the proceeds should be added to the trust-funds. Nine years afterwards the spouses raised an action against the trustees for repayment, with interest, of the sums expended in paying the premiums, on the ground that the payments were ultra vires of the trustees. Held that, even assuming the payments to have been ultra vires of the trustees, the action was barred by the fact that the wife had been a party to the agreement which embodied a settlement of the whole transaction.

Opinion (per the Lord Justice-Clerk) that the question was one not between beneficiary and trustee, but between truster and trustee, and that the wife being in the position of a truster, and having been in the knowledge of the action of the trustees, was not entitled to dispute it afterwards.

---

[1] Erskine's Inst. iii. 6, 12.

No. 71.

Feb. 7, 1888.
Spence v. Boyd.

2D DIVISION.
Lord M'Laren.
I.

BY antenuptial contract between Andrew Spence, merchant, Leith, and Miss Mary Munro, dated 20th October 1862, the husband bound himself to pay an annuity of £100 to his widow, and further, within three months from the date of the contract, to insure his life for £600, and to pay the annual premium. The policy was to be taken in names of certain trustees, one of whom was Mr J. L. Boyd, S.S.C., Leith, and it was provided that "in the event of the said trustees finding it necessary at any time to advance and pay to the said Life Assurance Company any sum or sums on account of the said premium, the said A. Spence binds and obliges himself and his foresaids to make payment to them or their foresaids of each sum as the same may be instructed by the company's receipts therefor, with interest of such sum or sums at the rate of five per centum from the time at which the same falls due, and till payment."

The policy and the proceeds thereof were to be held by the trustees "in trust for behoof of the said Mary Munro in liferent, for her liferent use allenarly, free of all rights of every description competent to her said intended husband, or any husband she may marry, and unaffectable by his debts and deeds," and the annual proceeds of the sum realised were to be received by her pro tanto of her annuity. On her death the fee was to be held for the issue of the marriage, and failing issue, for the heirs and assignees of the husband.

The wife on her part conveyed to the trustees the whole estate then belonging to her, or which she might acquire stante matrimonio, to be held by them for her liferent allenarly, excluding the jus mariti, and on her death, for the husband in liferent allenarly, if the survivor, and for the issue of the marriage, if any, in fee, and failing issue, for her nearest heirs and assignees. "And it is hereby declared that full power and authority is hereby given to the said trustees or trustee acting in both or either of the trusts hereinbefore created," to make up titles to the policy and the other estate conveyed by the contract, and "exercise the whole rights of owners thereof." The trustees were further empowered to advance to the husband out of the trust-estate a sum not exceeding £600 on his own personal security if they were of opinion that he could use it advantageously in his business or otherwise.

The capital of the estate conveyed by Mrs Spence was about £1600. Mr Spence obtained the advance of £600 contemplated by the contract. He failed shortly after the marriage, and paid neither the principal nor any interest. The policy of insurance was taken out by Mr Spence in the trustees' names. He could not pay the annual premium, and down to 1877 the trustees paid the annual premium out of the income of the funds conveyed to them by Mrs Spence before paying it over to her. The sums so paid amounted to £185, 8s. 9d.

On 12th January 1887 Mrs Spence, with consent of her husband, and he for his interest, raised an action against Mr Boyd, as sole surviving original trustee, and against two other trustees who had been recently assumed into the trust, for payment of £306, as the amount, with interest, of the premiums thus paid. The representatives of the other original trustees were subsequently called for their interest in a supplementary action, which contained no conclusion against them except for expenses in the event of their appearance. The pursuer alleged that Mr Boyd and the other trustees had no power to pay the premium out of her liferent, and had done so notwithstanding her repeated remonstrances.

The defenders stated that both spouses were well aware that the payments were being made, and entirely approved thereof, and had docqueted as correct statements shewing the application of the funds.

They pleaded, inter alia ;—(3) The defender Mr Boyd being only one of a number of trustees, is not in any event liable in solidum. (5) The trustees having acted within their powers in paying the said premiums of insurance out of revenue, for the purpose of keeping the said policy in force, should be assoilzied, with expenses. (6) The pursuers are barred from maintaining this action, in respect that the payments in question are embraced in the settled accounts between them and the defenders. (7) The pursuers having authorised, or at least homologated, the payment of the said premiums out of the said revenue, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

On 15th December 1887 a proof was led. It appeared from letters which had passed between Mrs Spence and Mr Boyd at various dates between 1865 and 1878 that she was well aware of the fact that the insurance was being kept up out of her income. She and her husband had likewise examined various accounts in the sederunt-book of the trust, which shewed the payments now objected to, and had docqueted them as correct. She deponed, however, that on her complaining to Mr Boyd in 1875 that it was a hardship to her to lose the portion of her income, which was used to keep up the policy, she was informed that the trustees had power to keep it up as they were doing, and it was admitted that this was the view on which the trustees acted.

It appeared that Mr and Mrs Spence had for many years been in the practice of borrowing money on the security of the liferent and of the policy, and that they had been in communication with various agents acting for the lenders. In 1878 they consulted Mr M'Intosh, S.S.C., one of whose clients had lent them money, as to the deduction from the income of the premium on the policy, and learned from him that in his opinion there was a question as to the trustees' power to deduct it. Mrs Spence wrote on 7th February 1878 to Mr Boyd, as follows:—"You are aware that for a considerable number of years (twelve or thirteen I am sure) the premiums of the insurance on Mr Spence's life have been paid out of my income, and as there are now additions amounting to upwards of £100, added to the policy, I think I am not unreasonable in requesting that some arrangement should now be come to, either to pay the premium or part of it (out) of these profits, or as it is not at all probable I shall ever derive any benefit from it during my lifetime, that these profits should be given to me now. I am most unwilling that the insurance should lapse, but under present circumstances I cannot sanction that any further payments of the premium shall be paid out of my income." Mr Boyd replied that the children of the marriage, of whom there were several, and the creditor in the loan, in security of which she had assigned her liferent, were also now interested in the policy, and expressed the view that the proposal could not be acceded to. Mr M'Intosh and Mr Boyd had a correspondence as to the policy, the result of which was an agreement that the policy should be sold. In order to effect this the following letter was sent by Mrs Spence to Mr Boyd:—"I hereby request and authorise you, as the sole surviving and acting trustee under my antenuptial contract of marriage, to dispose either by public sale or private bargain of the policy of insurance effected by the marriage trustees on the life of my husband for £600, with the Standard Life Assurance Company, and to retain the proceeds (after deduction of all necessary expenses) as forming part of the trust-funds under your management, of which I am entitled to enjoy a mere liferent, and I undertake if and when required by you to grant a deed of exoneration in your favour in respect of the sale now authorised by me." Mr Spence and the creditor signed docquets, concurring in the letter. The policy was then sold, and the price, £113, about £15 above the surrender value, was added to the capital of the trust.

No. 71.

Feb. 7, 1888.
Spence v. Boyd.

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) conjoined the actions, and in the conjoined actions pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the conjoined actions, for the reasons stated in his opinion, sustains the defenders' seventh plea in law in the original action, and assoilzies the defender James Lawrence Boyd from the conclusions of both actions as against him, and decerns: Quoad ultra, in respect there are no conclusions against the other defenders unless they appear and oppose, dismisses both actions as against them, and decerns: Finds the defenders who have appeared entitled to expenses so far as regards their outlay out of the trust-fund." *

---

* "OPINION.—I have no doubt as to what my decision should be in this case, and never had, although I was anxious to hear argument upon it in case there might be more in the case than at first appeared to me.

"It is a claim by a married lady against trustees to repay money which, strictly speaking, ought to be paid to her, but which was applied to her benefit in a somewhat different way,—that is to say, the lady's husband's life being insured for her benefit, the trustees, instead of paying over to her the whole life interest in terms of the marriage-contract, paid out of her income the premiums due on the husband's policy of assurance from which she was eventually to derive benefit.

"Now, it is clear enough that Mr Boyd, who took the chief management of the trust, explained this from the very beginning to Mrs Spence, and that she was throughout perfectly aware that a part of her income was applied towards keeping up the policy. And I am not sure that if she had been told that this application of the money depended on her assent she would have refused her assent, because it was obviously an arrangement for her interest and that of her children. But it certainly was not explained to Mrs Spence that her assent was needed. I think that Mr Boyd was himself under the belief that the trustees had the power of making this application of the money, and being in that belief it was not likely that he should convey any different impression to Mrs Spence than was in his own mind. One argument submitted to me was that it was the duty of every beneficiary to know his rights under the trust-settlement. That view can only be received with very large qualifications. It is certainly held to be the business of every man to possess such knowledge of the civil law as is necessary to regulate his conduct in any business in which he may be engaged. A merchant must understand the law of contracts and bills. A shipowner must understand maritime law; and if either makes a mistake he must suffer for it. He cannot throw the loss upon any other party. But in matters between trustees and beneficiaries, where trustees have no interest distinct from that of the beneficiary, I should not hold that the beneficiary is barred from having the mistake in law—if there has been such—put right. It would obviously depend to some extent upon the consideration whether matters could be put right without detriment to other interests. But, in the view I take of this case, it is not necessary to consider such questions, because when Mrs Spence came to borrow money upon the security of her beneficiary interest she employed an independent agent, Mr M'Intosh, a gentleman of ability and experience in his profession. He, going into the whole question of her rights under the settlement, clearly raised the point whether the trustees were entitled to appropriate his client's money to paying premiums, and the trustees were informed that Mrs Spence would not consent to a further appropriation of her money towards such purposes. It is, however, clear to my mind that if Mrs Spence was entitled to prevent the trustees from further payments she must be entitled to hold them responsible for former payments. That was the time to raise the question as to their appropriation of the estate. But this was not done. On the contrary, there being naturally some demur on the part of the trustees to the course of administration, it was eventually agreed, as a fair

No. 71.

Feb. 7, 1888.
Spence v.
Boyd.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—(1) It was ultra vires of the trustees to pay the premium on the policy. These premiums were the husband's debt and nothing else, and the contract under which the trust itself was created provided that the wife's income was to be free of the husband's debts. On a sound construction of the marriage-contract, there were two trusts, not one trust, of two funds with different destinations. Indeed this was expressed in the contract, for it spoke of "both or either of the trusts hereinbefore created." Each of these trusts ought to bear its own expenses.[1] It was not in point of fact for the benefit of the wife to keep up the policy; on the contrary, it proved a loss to her of £70. (2) The defenders maintained that assuming the conduct of Mr Boyd in the trust to be ultra vires, the action was barred, because Mrs Spence knew that her income was being used to keep up the policy. But that mere fact was no bar to her unless she had assented to it in the knowledge that she had a right to prevent it. She did not object, because she was informed by Mr Boyd that the trustees had power to apply the income as they had done, and she did not know to the contrary. That was not acquiescence. The case was in this respect a contrast to that of Kippen.[2] In that case the lady who ultimately challenged a discharge given by her co-trustees did not do so till eighteen years after the discharge, and fifteen years after the trust had been wound up on the footing of the discharge being good. There was there no error of fact. The error was an error in law. This case more resembled the cases of Sanders[3] and Douglas.[4] The Lord President's opinion (7 R. 163) in the former case precisely applied to the pursuers' case. It was the case of a female beneficiary who was alleged to have homologated an act of trustees which was ultra vires, and his Lordship pointed out that it must be shewn that she knew that the trustees were exceeding their powers, and assented to their doing so, and went on to say that it was difficult for trustees to maintain arrangement between the parties, recognising that they were dealing with a point of some difficulty, that the policy should be sold so as to relieve Mrs Spence from the burden of paying the premiums. But with the view of protecting the children, the proceeds were to be invested and held to be part of the trust-estate. Now, I hold that this was an arrangement entered into on behalf of Mrs Spence by an agent duly authorised, and certainly not exceeding the powers of an agent in family matters. Under that arrangement Mrs Spence brought forward all the claims that she intended to make against the trustees. They assented to her wishes so far as they thought it their duty, and that was an end of the matter. It is quite contrary to sound policy and legal principle that a party who, in full knowledge of her rights, has come to an arrangement with trustees should be allowed to re-open that question.

---

"In that view I have no hesitation in dismissing the personal conclusions against the trustees.

"With regard to the claim to be repaid the policy money out of the trust-estate, I think it must be held that Mrs Spence has irrevocably appropriated that money to the purposes of the trust. Even if the children were represented in the action, I have great doubt whether the Court could hold that that money could be taken from them. Most certainly not in an action where the children were not represented. Therefore, on the other view of the case, I must come to the conclusion that the claim is not supported. I shall therefore assoilzie from the conclusions of the action generally."

[1] Gibb v. Pitcairn, June 8, 1839, 1 D. 189, 11 Scot. Jur. 511; Rennie v. Ritchie, Dec. 8, 1840, 13 Scot. Jur. 73, rev. April 25, 1845, 4 Bell's Appeals, 221, 17 Scot. Jur. 332.

[2] Kippen v. Kippen's Trustees, July 10, 1874, 1 R. 1171.

[3] Sanders v. Sanders' Trustees, Nov. 6, 1879, 7 R. 157.

[4] Douglas v. Douglas' Trustees, June 30, 1859, 21 D. 1066, 31 Scot. Jur. 598.

No. 71.
—
Feb. 7, 1888.
Spence v. Boyd.

such a plea when their case otherwise was that no such illegality existed. All these considerations were here applicable. (3) Mr Boyd was liable in solidum if the acts of trustees were ultra vires, and also because, in any view, he was the agent of the trust as well as a trustee.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The trustees had acted within their powers. There was really one trust, which contemplated that the trustees might use the wife's funds to pay the premium on the policy. This was clear, simply because there was a power to keep up the policy if necessary, and there were no funds conveyed to them except by the wife. (2) The pursuer had in any view homologated the acts of the trustees in paying the premium. From 1865 to 1878 she never objected, and in the latter year she wrote a letter speaking of her "sanction" of the arrangement. The trustees were entitled to hold her as consenting to what was done. The pursuer's error, if any, was not in fact but in law, and that gave no ground for redress.[1] Nor was she in legal matters at all dependent on Mr Boyd for advice. She consulted Mr M'Intosh, and, as the proof shewed, other lawyers also. (3) What occurred at the time of the sale of the policy was, as in Kippen's case, a transaction in full knowledge of the facts which barred the pursuer from now going back upon what was then closed.

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—In this case several pleas have been maintained on the part of the pursuers, Mrs Spence and her husband. The action is brought against the only surviving trustee under Mrs Spence's marriage-contract, and it seeks repetition of certain payments which were made by the trustees under that contract out of the accruing interest or liferent to which she was entitled under the contract. These payments were made for the purpose of keeping up a policy of insurance by paying the premiums which Mr Spence, the husband, was bound to maintain on his own account, and which still remain apparently as debts against him.

The grounds upon which the challenge is made are, first, that the trustees were not entitled under the marriage-settlement to make these payments; in the second place, that although the pursuer consented or acquiesced in their being made, she was not aware at that time of her legal rights; and thirdly, it is contended that notwithstanding a certain agreement which took place between the spouses and the trustee she is entitled to recover these payments from the trustee.

I think the case is one of considerable importance in some aspects of it; but the result at which I have arrived is that under the third head—viz., the agreement that was come to in 1878 to sell the policy and add the proceeds to the capital sum under the trust—there is no longer any ground for going back to consider the propriety of the former payments, and that the pursuers are substantially foreclosed from raising that question. I wish, however, just to say a word or two upon each of the views, because I rather think that the case stands in a different position from that in which it was substantially presented at the bar.

This is not a case between trustee and beneficiary. It is a case between truster and trustee,—between the author of the trust and the trustees who act under the authority so conferred. That is a material distinction as regards one

---

[1] Graham v. Jolly, June 29, 1831, 5 W. & S. 280, Lord Wynford, at p. 297.

No. 71.

Feb. 7, 1888.
Spence v. Boyd.

part of the argument presented to us. Now, without going into the facts, my views upon the three heads are simply these. In regard to the question of authority under the trust-deed, I think it a more difficult question than it struck me as being at first. I am not prepared to say that the trust-deed does authorise these payments, but I do not think it is a question free from doubt, and on this ground,—there was a provision in the trust-deed that the husband should receive a payment of £600 out of the wife's fortune, and the insurance in question was intended to provide for that sum coming back to the trust, when the insurance should take effect and the sum become due by the death of the husband. It was intended as a security and counterpart of this payment which was to be made simply on the husband's own credit out of the trust-funds. No property was conveyed to the trustees belonging to the husband. The whole property conveyed to the trustees, as was known at the time, was the property of the wife. Now, in those circumstances, the trustees are authorised, in the event of the husband not paying the premiums, to advance the money,—keeping it up as a debt against the husband. It is not said out of what fund that advance is to be made; but the fact remains that there were no funds of any kind or description handed over to the trustees out of which it could be made except the property of the wife. The wife herself, by being a party to this deed, authorises the trustees to pay the premiums, in the event of their thinking it desirable to do so, and the question is—I do not say the thing is clear—but the question is, whether that does not amount substantially to a mandate from the proprietrix who was setting up this trust, and describing the conditions under which power was given and exercised, to the trustees to pay the money out of the only fund they had. I think there is more weight due to that view than I was at first inclined to give it.

But, in the second place, even irrespective of the ultimate agreement, I do not think I could have found the trustees liable for these payments. It is not like a case of election or repudiation of conventional provisions. It is a series of acts on the part of the truster herself about her own estate going over two-and-twenty years during which these payments were made by the trustees, as far as I see, without any objection whatever, in satisfaction of the premiums of insurance. Mrs Spence was entitled to make them if she chose to use her liferent in that way, and she was entitled, I think, also to direct her trustees to do it, or to approve of what her trustees did; I do not think there can be much doubt about that. It is said she did not know her rights. She was herself a party. The rights were conferred upon herself and no one else, for no one else had the property to which they applied; and although, no doubt, it is desirable in many cases under trust-deeds in questions with trustees to consider how far the party who is said to have acquiesced or homologated was aware of his or her rights, still, in the case of the truster himself or herself, and when the act relates to payments made year by year, or rather half year by half year on nearly forty different occasions without any representation to the contrary, I think it cannot be said that the pursuer was not aware of her rights. I think she was quite aware of her rights, and she deliberately and intentionally gave her sanction to payments in which she had a deep interest, because it is quite certain that if they had not been made the policy must have fallen, and the £600 must have been ultimately lost to the estate.

I have indicated the views which have occurred to me on these matters, and looking to the termination of this long course of dealing,—I mean the agreement to which both husband and wife were parties, and under which the trustees undertook to sell the policy and to add the proceeds to the trust-estate,—I do not think the pursuers can now go back and raise any question either on the byegone use of the liferent right or the byegone payments of premium; I think all matters were merged into that agreement, and on that ground I am prepared to affirm the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

No. 71. — Feb. 7, 1888. Spence v. Boyd.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

LORD YOUNG and LORD CRAIGHILL were absent.

THE COURT adhered.

J. D. MACAULAY, S.S.C.—BOYD, JAMESON, & KELLY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 72. — Feb. 8, 1888. Stewart v. Forbes.

MALCOLM STEWART, Pursuer (Respondent).—R. V. Campbell.
MRS ELIZABETH WEST OR FORBES AND ALEXANDER FORBES, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Rhind—Salvesen.

Adjudication—Trust—Diligence against trust-estate for expenses of litigation.—Held competent to adjudge a trust-estate for expenses decerned for against the trustees in a litigation in which the trust-estate was alone concerned.

Process—Adjudication—Decree.—Where a Lord Ordinary pronounced decree of adjudication, and on a reclaiming note the Court adhered, decree of adjudication was pronounced of new in the Inner-House.

1st Division. Lord Fraser. M.

IN 1886 Mr Malcolm Stewart, the superior of certain subjects in Grange Place, Edinburgh, brought an action of declarator of irritancy ob non solutum canonem and of removing against Mrs Elizabeth West or Forbes, William Moncur, and John Howie, the proprietors of the subjects in question, as trustees under a trust-disposition and deed of settlement by Mrs Forbes and her husband. Mrs Forbes, as an individual and as liferenter of the subjects, and her husband and children, the latter of whom were entitled to the subjects in fee, were also called for any interest they might have. The summons set forth that the feu-duty had been unpaid for the two years prior to Martinmas 1886.

Defences were lodged by the trustees, and by Mrs Forbes as an individual, and thereafter, on 3d February 1887, the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) pronounced an interlocutor holding the irritancy to be purged, in respect the feu-duties had then been paid, and finding the compearing defenders liable in expenses. On a reclaiming note against the finding for expenses the First Division adhered, and found the pursuer entitled to additional expenses. The amount of these expenses, as decerned for, was £43, 7s.

A charge was given by Stewart upon the extract-decree, but he failed to recover the sum due to him, and he thereupon brought an action concluding that the heritable subjects belonging to the trust-estate should be adjudged from the defenders and all others having or pretending right thereto, and declared to belong to the pursuer, his heirs and assignees, for payment and satisfaction to them of the principal sum of £43, 7s., and interest in respect of it, calling the trustees, Mrs Forbes as an individual, and her husband for his interest and as administrator-in-law for his wife.

Defences were lodged for Moncur and Howie, a majority and quorum of the trustees. On 26th November 1887 the Lord Ordinary (Fraser), in respect of no appearance for the compearing defenders, pronounced decree of adjudication against them with expenses.

No. 72.

Feb. 8, 1888.
Stewart v.
Forbes.

On 30th November following decree in absence was pronounced against Mrs Forbes and her husband by the Lord Ordinary.

On 3d December a reclaiming note by Moncur and Howie against the interlocutor of 26th November was refused after a hearing in the Single Bills.

Mrs Forbes as a trustee and as an individual, and her husband, thereafter tendered defences, and applied to be reponed. After a discussion the Lord Ordinary, on 14th December, recalled the decree in absence of 30th November, and allowed defences to be received. Their defence was that the trust-estate, the fee of which belonged to the defenders' children, could not be carried off by an illegal diligence to meet a debt incurred by the trustees as individuals, in an action in which no defences had been lodged for the children. It was further stated that neither the trustees, nor Mrs Forbes as an individual, had any power to pledge the trust-estate for the expenses of process, and that the only persons liable for these were the trustees and Mrs Forbes as individuals, who had all along been willing to pay the debt out of the rents of the property.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(5) The subjects mentioned in the summons not being in any way subject to or liable for the said sum of £43, 7s., decree of adjudication should not be pronounced.

The Lord Ordinary, on 14th January 1888, repelled the defences, and adjudged, decerned, and declared against Mrs Forbes and her husband conform to the conclusions of the summons.*

The defenders reclaimed, and argued that it was not competent to adjudge a trust-estate for a debt constituted against the trustees personally.[1]

Counsel for the respondent was not called upon.

Lord President.—I do not think there can be any doubt that the Lord Ordinary has taken the right course in this case. The question of importance in such a case is, whether the trustees were really representing the trust-estate in the litigation or not. The fact that they were representing the trust-estate cannot certainly exempt them from personal liability, but that is a different ques-

---

* "Opinion.—The trustees acting under a trust-conveyance and deed of settlement by Mrs Elizabeth West or Forbes, and relative deed of assumption and conveyance, did, in their character as trustees, with the view as they thought of defending the trust-estate, enter into a litigation in which they were unsuccessful, and were found liable in expenses. The question then simply is, whether the creditor for those expenses, who cannot obtain payment of them from the impecunious trustees, is entitled to adjudge the trust-estate which they defended. That estate is held by the trustees in trust for the defender Mrs Elizabeth Forbes in liferent and for her children in fee. The Lord Ordinary was moved to sist the children as defenders in this action, which motion he has not seen any reason for granting. Decree has already been pronounced against the defenders William Moncur and John Howie, who appeared and defended the action. The present compearing defenders Mrs Forbes and her husband did not lodge defences, but after decree was pronounced against her co-trustees she appeared and obtained right to lodge defences as having been decerned against in absence, which the Lord Ordinary allowed; and now that the defences have been seen they come to nothing. There is no averment to the effect that the trustees committed any breach of trust in litigating the case in which they were unsuccessful, and therefore no ground for saying that the debt incurred was a debt for which the trust-estate was not responsible. If the trust-estate instead of consisting of heritage had consisted of furniture held by them, it could surely have been poinded for a debt incurred by the trustees in the administration of the trust, and the case is in no way differentiated when the diligence is not poinding but adjudication."

[1] M'Laren on Wills and Succession, ii. 555; Graham v. Marshall, Nov. 22, 1860, 23 D. 41, 33 Scot. Jur. 21.

No. 72.

Feb. 8, 1888.
Stewart v. Forbes.

tion, and falls to be settled between the trustees and the beneficiaries. In the present case the trustees were bound to come into Court for the purpose of saving the trust-estate from forfeiture. It may no doubt be the fact that the risk of forfeiture was brought about by the previous misconduct of the trustees, but as I have said we have nothing to do with that question here.

Where a pursuer obtains a decree for expenses in an action in which the trust-estate is alone concerned, I apprehend he is quite entitled to recover these expenses from the trust-estate. The remedy of adjudication is no doubt a formidable one, still, if the debt remains unpaid, the pursuer is entitled to adjudge the trust-estate. I think there is no flaw in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD MURE and LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD SHAND was absent.

R. V. Campbell, for the pursuer, moved the Court, with the view of obviating any question as to the non-recording of an abbreviate within sixty days of the decree of 26th November 1887, of new to pronounce decree of adjudication against all the trustees, and referred to the case of Cathcart v. Maclaine, Dec. 18, 1846, 9 D. 305.

THE COURT declined to adjudge of new against Moncur and Howie, who were not parties to the reclaiming note, and against whom, as a majority of the trustees, a final decree had been pronounced, but pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to the interlocutor complained of: Of new adjudge, decern, and declare against the defenders Mrs Elizabeth West or Forbes and Alexander Forbes, conform to the conclusions of the summons," &c.

DAVID COOK, S.S.C.—D. HOWARD SMITH, Solicitor—Agents.

No. 73.

Feb. 8, 1888.*
Guthrie, Craig, Peter, & Co. v. Magistrates of Brechin.

GUTHRIE, CRAIG, PETER, & COMPANY, Pursuers (Respondents).—
D.-F. Mackintosh—C. J. Guthrie.
MAGISTRATES OF BRECHIN, Defenders (Appellants).—Sol.-Gen. Robertson —C. S. Dickson.

Burgh—Drainage—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 101), secs. 77 and 108—Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 75), sec. 7.—A paper manufacturer, whose works were within a burgh and who was liable for drainage assessment, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court, founding on the 77th section of the Public Health Act, 1867, and the 7th section of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, to have the local authority ordained to allow him to empty the drains containing the discharge from his works into the burgh sewers. The defenders, founding on the latter section,[†] stated that the discharge in question would "prejudicially affect"

---

[*] Decided Feb. 3, 1888.

[†] The 7th section of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, enacts,—"Any sanitary or other authority having sewers under their control shall give facilities for enabling manufacturers within their district to carry the liquids proceeding from their factories or manufacturing processes into such sewers provided that this section shall not extend to compel any sanitary or other local authority to admit into their sewers any liquid which would prejudicially affect such sewers or the disposal by sale, application to land, or otherwise, of the sewage matter conveyed along such sewers, or which would, from its temperature or otherwise, be injurious in a sanitary point of view: Provided also that no sanitary authority shall be required to give such facilities

No. 73. their sewers and the quality of their sewage, and unduly increase t of the total discharge in its application to their sewage farm.

Feb. 8, 1888. Guthrie, Craig, Peter, & Co. v. Magistrates of Brechin.

Held, upon a report by men of skill, that the defenders had faile that the quality of the discharge was such as would "prejudicially a sewers or the sewage in any of the particulars of the section founde the term "application to land" was used in a general and not in a spe and that the defenders were bound to receive the discharge into thei provided that their sewage pipes were large enough to carry it.

1st Division. Sheriff of Forfarshire. M.

(Vide ante, Jan. 9, 1885, 12 R. 469.)

Messrs Guthrie, Craig, Peter, & Company were tenants and of the Brechin Paper Mill Manufacturing Works within the Brechin, and as such were liable for sewerage or drainage asses the magistrates and town-council of the burgh, the local autho the Public Health Acts, 1867 and 1871.

In 1884 they presented a petition to the Sheriff, praying him the magistrates to "allow the pursuers to cause the drains of taining the liquid flow from the Brechin Paper Mill Man Works . . . to empty into the sewers of the defenders and to find that the pursuers are entitled to make all proper co tions" between their drains and the sewers belonging to the
"for the purpose aforesaid, on condition of the pursuers compl the defenders' regulations in respect of the mode in which the cations between such drains and sewers are to be made, an to the control of any person who may be appointed by the to superintend the making of such communication." They fo sec. 77 of the Public Health Act, 1867, and sec. 7 of the Riv tion Prevention Act, 1876 (quoted p. 385, note).

The defenders stated in answer that the sewage runnin their drains was now conveyed to a farm before it entered Southesk, and they averred that the discharge from the pursu would prejudicially affect the sewers and the quality of the se would also, they said, unduly increase the volume of the total d

The Sheriff-substitute (Robertson), after proof, on 18th 1884, pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . Finds in fact, liquids issuing from the pursuers' paper-works at Brechin, chemically objectionable and likely to injure sewage or veget three in number, namely, 'black boil,' 'spent bleach,' and 'w Finds that when these three liquids are mixed together and e the action of the air in settling ponds the resultant fluid is harm such as the defenders may safely allow to be introduced into t sewer of Brechin: Finds, that since the raising of the present a pursuers have produced and brought under the notice of the de plan, which forms No. 36 of process, shewing how they are now to form a series of settling ponds in which these three liqui thoroughly mixed and settled before the defenders will be ca to receive the resultant fluid into their sewer: Finds in law, an sound construction of section 7 of the Rivers Pollution Act, an 77 of the Public Health Act, that the defenders are bound to re resultant fluid issuing from said settling ponds into the public Brechin: Remits to Thomas Stevenson, civil engineer, Edinbur failing to Henry D. Littlejohn, M.D., Edinburgh, to see the plan, as aforesaid, where the sewers of such authority are only sufficient quirements of their district, nor where such facilities would interfer order of any Court of competent jurisdiction respecting the sewag authority."

---

No. 73.

Feb. 8, 1888.
Guthrie, Craig, Peter, & Co. v. Magistrates of Brechin.

process, carried out by the pursuers; and thereafter, and on the completion of said plan to the satisfaction of the reporter, ordains the defenders to allow the pursuers to discharge the resultant fluid issuing from the said settling ponds into the public sewer of Brechin, on condition of the pursuers complying with the defenders' regulations as to the mode in which the communication between the pursuers' premises and the public sewer is to be made: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses up to and including the first diet of proof in the case: Finds the defenders liable in expenses from and after that date," &c.*

The defenders appealed to the First Division of the Court of Session, and after repelling an objection to the competency of the appeal (ante, Jan. 9, 1885, 12 R. 469), the Court, on 20th May 1885, pronounced this interlocutor:—" Supersede consideration of the judgment appealed against, and in the meantime (1) allow the pursuers to construct the works delineated and described on the plan No. 36 of process at the sight of Professor Alexander Crum Brown, and Robert Carstairs Reid, civil engineer; and (2) on the completion of the said works to the satisfaction of the reporters, ordain the appellants, at the sight of the reporters, to allow the pursuers, for the purposes of experiment, to discharge the resultant fluid issuing from the said works into the public sewers of Brechin, for such time and under such conditions as the reporters may consider necessary to enable them to report on the effect of such discharge; and appoint the reporters to report quam primum as to the character of the said resultant fluid, and its effect upon the respondents' sewer-pipes and sewage farm."

On 28th January 1888 the reporters submitted their report.†

---

* "NOTE.—The pursuers are ratepayers in the town of Brechin, and are as much entitled to the use of the public sewer as any other members of that community, always provided they are not seeking to introduce 'any liquid which would prejudicially affect such sewer, or sewage matter conveyed along such sewer.' In resisting the pursuers' demand that the liquids from their paper-works be introduced into the public sewer, the defenders must take their stand upon the 7th section of the Rivers Pollution Act, and must shew that their sewer and sewage will be prejudicially affected by such liquids. The question becomes one for chemical experts. With one exception, the eminent chemists who have been examined in the case certify that if certain precautionary measures are taken the fluids from the pursuers' works become innocuous, and may safely be introduced into the public sewer. Their unanimity on this point renders any detailed analysis of the evidence unnecessary. Dr Wallace of Glasgow, who is one of the defenders' own witnesses, explains how the caustic soda contained in the 'black boil,' the lime contained in the 'spent bleach,' and the acid contained in the 'washings,' neutralise each other when they are mixed together and exposed to atmospheric influences. This can readily be done, and a harmless liquid obtained by a series of mixing and settling ponds; and the plan proposed to be carried out by the pursuers Dr Wallace considers to be quite satisfactory. The fact that the objectionable liquids must first pass into these settling ponds and there be neutralised by their chemical action on each other, and by the action of the air on them, is a sufficient safeguard to the defenders. The safety of the sewer is not made to depend on the negligence or carefulness of the pursuers' work people. There is no danger of that sort. It is put out of the power of any careless workman to flood the sewer with a poisonous liquid. The only access to the sewer will be after these settling ponds have done their work. And when Dr Wallace was under examination I was very careful to bring this out. I think Dr Wallace's evidence is conclusive, backed up as he is by all the pursuers' own chemical witnesses. These include the public analyst for the City of Edinburgh, and the professor of chemistry in Dundee University College. . . ."

† The report bore, inter alia;—" . . . The tanks having been completed and receiving the discharges from the pursuers' mill, the resultant liquid or effluent

No. 73.
—
Feb. 8, 1888.
Guthrie, Craig, Peter, & Co. v. Magistrates of Brechin.

The appellants argued;—The sewage of the mill would on the of the reporters double the amount of sewage passing through th

---

from them was admitted to the sewer on 22d April 1886. There are f which are filled alternately, in sets of two at a time, and emptied into a having a capacity of 24,000 gallons, from which the discharge is draw the surface by a floating pipe. The sludge deposited in the bottom of th once a-week, lifted out by chain pumps worked by gearing from the mil on to a prepared bed of ashes, where it is dried sufficiently to admit carted away. We visited the work on the 30th of April, and again o and 28th October 1886, and examined the sewer, when we found, in a the deposit of sand previously noticed, a brownish incrustation in th the water edge. This incrustation was not very firmly adherent, but to be always growing, and it was sufficiently hard to enable it to resist flushing with water. The same incrustation was seen in the tanks at mill and in the pipe leading from them to the public sewer, and al channels for distributing the sewage over the sewage farm. Analysi this incrustation to be nearly pure carbonate of lime, and its presence doubtedly due to the addition of the pursuers' discharges. We have that if matters had gone on in the same way a serious incrustation w been produced in the sewer, which would have prejudicially affected unless removed from time to time by mechanical means.

"In our report to the Lord Ordinary, already referred to, we pointe the discharges from the paper mill as then worked would, when together, be somewhat alkaline, and recommended that acid should be neutralise them. At our various meetings on the ground we explai pursuers or their representatives then present that the incrustation i was due to the alkalinity of the effluent from their tanks, and that only be prevented by adding more acid so as to render it neutral or The pursuers have always used a certain proportion of acid in the manufacturing the paper, but since our inspection in October 1886 used more acid in the paper mill, with the result that the effluent h practically neutral. Since this change in the way of working, by effluent is rendered practically neutral, we examined the sewer on 1 and 6th December 1887, and found that not only was there no increa incrustation but the former incrustation was disappearing and had soft as to be removeable by ordinary flushing. There is no reason t the effluent from the pursuers' work will ever be sensibly acid, as t imply a needless expenditure on their part, and there is thus no risk o being injured by excess of acid.

"The sewer pipe is of sufficient capacity to carry the whole disch the pursuers' works in addition to the ordinary sewage coming from and, indeed, the additional flow will induce greater velocity, and thu scouring the pipe and keeping it clear of ordinary deposit. We are th opinion that the effluent from the pursuers' tanks may be admitted to sewers of Brechin without injury to the sewer pipes by incrustation wise, so long as it remains in its present condition of practical
If the incrustation appears to grow again in the pipes it must to this condition of practical neutrality not having been sufficien tained, and in such circumstances the defenders should have th call upon the pursuers to restore this condition of practical neutra effluent.

"The main sewer discharges at the sewage farm into a settling po the grosser particles subside, and the overflow from this pond is th open carriers to various parts of the farm. The sewage farm has a of 16 acres, of which $1\frac{1}{3}$ acres are occupied by roads, settling pond, & $14\frac{2}{3}$ acres available for receiving sewage. Of the whole available area, acres of the farm are laid off in beds for growing cabbages and man an area of about 6 acres is laid out for irrigation, and on this area It

No. 73.
—
Feb. 8, 1888.
Guthrie, Craig, Peter, & Co. v. Magistrates of Brechin.

and it was very hard that the town should be charged with the disposal of that sewage, while the assessment of the defenders only amounted to £8. The 7th section of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act only applied if no other system could be devised which would obviate the destructive effect of the liquids. All that was affirmed by the reporters grass is grown; the remainder of the farm is alternately cropped with turnips and cereals, but it is not properly laid out for irrigation.

---

"According to gaugings which have been regularly taken by the superintendent of the farm, at 8 A.M., 12 noon, and 5 P.M., it would appear that the dry-weather flow of sewage during the daytime varies from 5000 to 9000 gallons per hour, but it may be estimated to average about 150,000 gallons per day of twenty-four hours in dry weather, and in wet weather the flow is very much greater. When the paper-mill discharges were let into the sewer, the average dry-weather flow as gauged amounted to from 12,500 to 20,000 gallons per hour during the daytime, but reckoning by the time taken to fill the pursuers' tanks, it would seem that their discharge during a working day of twenty-two hours is about 140,000 gallons, so that the addition of the pursuers' discharges practically doubles the volume coming from the sewer in dry weather. Taking these figures as a fair approximation, we find that the flow of sewage in dry weather is equal to 20,000 gallons per day for each acre that has been properly prepared for irrigation, and fully 10,000 gallons per day for each acre of the whole farm, and when the paper-mill discharges are added the above figures will be nearly doubled.

"In the best types of sewage irrigation farms laid off similarly to that portion of this farm which has been properly prepared for sewage, not more than 8000 gallons per day are allowed for each acre on an average throughout the year; so that even if the whole farm of nearly 15 acres were properly laid out for irrigation, it would barely be sufficient to purify the dry-weather sewage of Brechin, not to speak of the much greater volume during wet weather.

"With only 7½ acres properly prepared for irrigation, as at present, it is not to be expected, therefore, that complete purification can be effected; and indeed we found that the effluent from the farm was not completely purified even before the paper-mill discharges were let into the sewer.

"The effluent coming from the pursuers' tanks is much freer from polluting matter than the town sewage, and its addition therefore dilutes the sewage, but owing to the larger volume to be dealt with, the purification effected by the sewage farm cannot be so complete as when the polluting matter is concentrated in the smaller volume of dry-weather sewage.

"By the method of 'downward intermittent filtration' a much larger volume of sewage can be dealt with on a given area of land, and probably if a part of the farm were laid out on this system, it would be possible to deal satisfactorily with the storm water as well as with the increased volume due to the paper-mill discharges. It must be understood, however, that the adoption of this system would involve additional outlay in works, and that the profits derived from the farm would be diminished.

"We found it necessary to continue the experiment over two seasons in order to judge of the effect of the addition of the effluent from the pursuers' tanks on the crops generally grown on the farm, and after careful examination we have come to the conclusion that it exercises no prejudicial effect upon them unless the ground is overcharged, in which case the excess of water of itself would do mischief.

"We have therefore to report our opinion that the resultant fluid or effluent issuing from the pursuers' tanks into the public sewers of Brechin is not of such a character, so long as it is maintained in its present condition of practical neutrality, as to produce any injurious effect on the sewer pipes, or on the crops or soil of the sewage farm, but that the larger volume of liquid to be dealt with necessitates a different mode of working the sewage farm to effect proper purification of the combined discharges from the sewer before they reach the river South Esk."

No. 73.
——
Feb. 8, 1888.
Guthrie, Craig, Peter, & Co. v. Magistrates of Brechin.

was that there was a probability of a possibility that they would not be prejudicial. Here the sewage was certainly prejudicial in its "application to land," because the present sewage farm was too small for the extra amount which would now be discharged.

Argued for the respondents;—The only question under the Act was the capacity of the sewer pipes to carry off the additional sewage, and that had been amply tested. The quality, also, of the sewage had been shewn to be not prejudicial in any of the senses of the Act. The words "application to land" must be held to have a general meaning, and not as referable to any particular subject. The ultimate disposal of the sewage was a matter for the defenders themselves; they were bound to get rid of it.

Lord President.—I think if I had been called upon to dispose of this case on the proof as the Sheriff-substitute did, I should have been very much inclined to take the same view as he did. The result of the evidence is that the town of Brechin is under an obligation in virtue of the statute to dispose of the whole sewage of the district, including that of the mill in question. There is nothing in the evidence to shew the impossibility of their discharging that duty. But when the case came here it was suggested that an experiment might be made for the purpose of seeing how far the sewers were adequate for the reception of the sewage of the mill, and how far it could be disposed of by the town under the present sewage arrangements. Accordingly a remit was made to Professor Crum Brown and Mr Reid, C.E., and the pursuers were allowed to construct works proper for the purpose at the sight of these two persons, and on completion of the works to the satisfaction of the reporters, the defenders were ordained, "at the sight of the reporters, to allow the pursuers, for the purposes of experiment, to discharge the resultant fluid issuing from the said works into the public sewers of Brechin, for such time and under such conditions as the reporters may consider necessary to enable them to report on the effect of such discharge"; and the reporters were appointed to report quam primum as to the character of the said resultant fluid, and its effect upon the respondents' sewer-pipes and sewage-farm.

All that has now been done. The connection between the paper-works and the sewers has been made, and the discharge of the resultant fluids has been going on for a considerable time. So that there has now been enough of experiment to shew how far the discharge from the paper-works may be allowed to proceed without affecting the existing scheme of sewage for the town.

We have now to dispose of the question whether the petitioners are entitled to have the order which is asked in the original petition presented in the Sheriff Court, which was, "To ordain the defenders to allow the pursuers to cause the drains of and containing the liquid flow from the Brechin Paper Mill Manufacturing Works . . . to empty into the sewers of the defenders . . . and to find that the pursuers are entitled to make all proper communications" between their drains and the sewers belonging to the defenders.

That claim is founded on the 77th section of the Public Health Act, and the 7th section of the Rivers Pollution Act. It is necessary in the first place to observe that the town of Brechin, like every other town and burgh in Scotland, is under an obligation to drain itself. And apart even from any common law obligation on this point the Commissioners are under a direct obligation by the 186th section of the General Police and Improvement Act of 1862, which, among other things, provides that commissioners acting under the Act "shall from time to time," "subject to the restrictions herein contained, . . . cause to be made under the streets, public or private, or elsewhere, such main or other sewers as shall be necessary for the effectual draining of the burgh, and shall also, if necessary for such drainage, deepen, divert, or cover over any burn or any ditch made use of as a common sewer, or any ditch into which sewage flows, and shall also cause to be made all such reservoirs, sluices, engines, and other works as shall be necessary for cleansing such sewers, and if needful they may carry such sewers through and across all underground cellars and vaults," &c.

Thus there is a statutory obligation on the defenders to drain the town of Brechin, and the paper-mills are situated within the town of Brechin, and therefore the obligation comprehends the sewage discharge of the paper-mills, unless some reason can be shewn why it should not be admitted into the pipes.

But by section 77 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, it is enacted that "any owner or occupier of premises within the district of a local authority, liable for general or special sewerage or drainage assessment, shall be entitled to cause his drains to empty into the sewers of such local authority on condition of his giving twenty days' previous notice of his intention so to do to the local authority, and of complying with their regulations in respect of the mode in which the communications between such drains and sewers are to be made, and subject to the control of any person who may be appointed by the local authority to superintend the making of such communications." Now, this confers an absolute right on any owner or occupier of premises in the district to use the sewers, provided he be liable to assessment for sewage.

Again, the 7th section of the Rivers Pollution Act of 1876, provides that "every sanitary or other local authority having sewers under their control shall give facilities for enabling manufacturers within their district to carry the liquids proceeding from their factories or manufacturing processes into such sewers." Now, unless some reason can be shewn to the contrary, the Public Health Act is made more directly imperative by the Rivers Pollution Act in the case of premises occupied for manufacturing purposes, and comprehends such a manufactory as we are here dealing with. Certain provisoes are, however, appended to the 7th section of the Rivers Pollution Act, and the object of the defenders has been to shew that some of these apply to this case, and that therefore they are entitled to say they are not obliged to receive the sewage from the paper-mills into their pipes.

The first proviso is, that "this section shall not extend to compel any sanitary or local authority to admit into their sewers any liquid which would prejudicially affect such sewers." This was one of the matters on which the reporters specially reported, and they have taken particular pains about it, but they are satisfied that the sewers will not be prejudicially affected by the discharge from the mill. But to prevent a prejudicial effect, means must be taken to see that a due admixture be made in the ponds so as to make the resultant fluids neutral, i.e., to allow the acids and alkalies to neutralise each other, as otherwise if one or other of them remained, damage might follow to the pipes. It has been rightly suggested that in our judgment we ought to make it a condition that due attention must be paid to this matter.

The next proviso is, that the liquid shall not prejudicially affect "the disposal by sale, application to land, or otherwise of the sewage matter conveyed along such sewers." The meaning of this is that the sewage matter conveyed into the sewers must not be destroyed as a subject of sale or as manure for land. That is not meant as applicable to any particular case, but merely generall sewage shall not be so poisoned as to be unfit for sale or for use as m do not think it can be said here that the resultant fluid by passing sewers will bring about this result, and therefore this proviso does no

No. 73.
Feb. 8, 1888.
Guthrie, Craig, Peter, & Co. v. Magistrates of Brechin.

The third proviso is, that the local authority shall not be required into their sewers anything "which would from its temperature or oth injurious in a sanitary point of view." This was not here alleged, therefore be passed over.

The fourth proviso is, "that no sanitary authority shall be requir such facilities as aforesaid where the sewers of such authority are only for the requirements of their district." Now, if the sewers were enough to admit the fluid from the settling ponds in addition to th sewage of Brechin, then the defenders would not be under an obligat ceive it. But the measurement of capacity referred to in the Act ability of the town to dispose of the sewage after it has passed through but the capacity of the pipes to receive it. Now, it was not prove pipes were not large enough, and the only point is that they mus enough to receive the fluid in addition to the ordinary sewage of the

The last proviso is, that "no sanitary authority shall be required to facilities as aforesaid . . . where such facilities would interfere order of any Court of competent jurisdiction respecting the sewage of s rity." This again is not alleged, and may be passed over.

Hence it appears that the defenders have no proviso upon which th to interfere with the unquestioned right of the pursuers to have th carried away from their works in the sewage pipes of the defender fore, I think, we must give judgment in favour of the pursuers, and m the town to allow the pursuers to use the sewers for their fluid.

The defenders seem to have difficulty as to the disposal of the sew is not a question under the statute; they are bound by law to dispose they can empty it into the river so much the better for them, but th in a position to do this, for the proprietors of the salmon-fishing o have objected. They are, however, under an obligation to dispose of way or other, and they have been doing so by means of a sewage far say that their only difficulty is that the farm is not large enough to the sewage augmented by the discharge from the paper-mill. Then find some other way of disposing of it, for they are bound by law to it. If I thought there was any great hardship or difficulty from th they were undertaking this for the first time, we might have allowed to improve or amend their scheme. But we see from the report th charge from the paper-mill has gone on for two years, and no harm done by it. The defenders may be right in saying the farm is not lar but then they must enlarge it, or adopt some new method. But for t there is no difficulty, for there have been no evil results up to now.

Therefore I think our judgment should be the same as that of t with this addition—that the discharge from the mill shall be so treated that the resultant fluid shall be neutral in the sense of the rep

Lord Mure concurred.

Lord Adam.—The pursuers are proprietors of property situated district of the defenders, who are the local authority for the burgh o

No. 73.

Feb. 8, 1888.
Guthrie, Craig, Peter, & Co. v. Magistrates of Brechin.

They pay drainage and sewage assessment, and they are entitled to have their drains connected with the sewers of the defenders. The obligation upon the defenders to receive the sewage, provided it be innocuous, is only limited by the carrying capacity of the sewage pipes. There is no other limitation as to the amount of the sewage they are to be entitled to discharge into the defenders' pipes. But the liquid must be innocuous. The 7th section of the Rivers Pollution Act makes provision regarding this. No local authority is to be compelled to admit into their sewers "any liquid which would prejudicially affect such sewers, or the disposal by sale, application to land, or otherwise, of the sewage matter." No objection is stated to the effect that the sale of the sewage would be prejudiced. But it has been argued that it "would prejudicially affect" its application to the land. The question is whether the term "land" refers to "any land" generally, or whether it refers to "a particular piece of land." If it means "prejudicial to land in general," then it is the character of the sewage which must be considered. If it means "prejudicial to a particular piece of land" that involves the consideration not only of the quality but also of the quantity of the sewage. I think we must read the words of the Act as applicable to land generally. The sewage must be noxious in its character, and not merely objectionable because the quantity is too great for the limited space on which it is to be put. As I think the liquid in the present case is innocuous, I think no other course is open to us than to hold that the defenders must receive it and dispose of it as they best can.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor, which was signed on 28th February:—"Having resumed consideration of the cause, with the joint report by Professor Crum Brown and Robert Carstairs Reid, C.E., No. 58 of process, and heard counsel thereon, recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 18th December 1884 appealed against: Find, in point of fact, that the liquids now proceeding from the Brechin Paper Manufacturing Works, belonging to the respondents, will not prejudicially affect the sewers within and for the burgh of Brechin, or the disposal by sale, application to land, or otherwise, of the sewage matters conveyed along such sewers: Find further, that the said sewers will be sufficient for the requirements of the appellants' district after receiving the said liquids: Find further, that the communications between the drains conveying the said liquids from the respondents' works and the appellants' sewers have been already made, and that the mode in which such communications have been made is not objected to; therefore find and declare that the appellants are bound to receive the resultant liquid issuing from the respondents' settling ponds into the public sewers of Brechin, so long as the said liquid is such that it will not prejudicially affect such sewers, or the disposal by sale, application to land, or otherwise, of the sewage matter conveyed along such sewers, or is not injurious from its temperature or otherwise in a sanitary point of view: Decern and ordain the appellants to allow the respondents to discharge the resultant liquid issuing from foresaid settling ponds into the public sewers of Brechin so long as aforesaid: Reserving to the appellants their right to apply to any competent Court in the event of any change in circumstances," &c.

W. & J. BURNESS, W.S.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 74.

Feb. 8, 1888.

Lyon v. Lyon.

DAVID LYON, First Party.—James Reid.
ROBERT LYON, Second Party.—John Wilson.

Succession—Condition—Substitution—Protected substitution.—A testator, in 1841, disponed his whole estates, including heritage, to his two sisters, Ann and Margaret. In 1842 he, by codicil, on the narrative that his sister Ann was at present provided for, in so far altered his disposition as to dispone his whole property to his sister Margaret should Ann be still provided for at his death, but under condition that if Margaret should "marry or predecease my sister Ann, then, in the first case, she, Ann Lyon, shall receive the half, and in the second, the whole property, &c.; provided always that if both die without marrying, the property shall go in equal shares to my two brothers, George and David, or their heirs and successors." Both sisters survived the testator but died unmarried, Ann being the predeceaser, and Margaret leaving a settlement disposing, inter alia, of the whole heritable property of which she might die possessed. In a competition between the heirs under Margaret's settlement and the representatives of the testator's brothers, George and David, held that an absolute and indefeasible fee in the heritable properties left by the testator was conferred on Margaret, with a simple destination in favour of the testator's brothers, George and David, their heirs and successors, which had been evacuated by Margaret's settlement.

2D DIVISION.
I.

JOHN LYON, classical master in the High School of Leith, died on 18th March 1847, leaving a settlement, dated 13th November 1841, with codicil thereto, dated 19th August 1842. By the settlement he disponed to his sisters, Ann Lyon and Margaret Lyon, and the survivor of them, and the heirs and assignees of the survivor, his whole estate, heritable and moveable, and particularly a dwelling-house in Vanburgh Place, Leith, and a dwelling-house at 45 Lothian Street, Edinburgh, as therein described, and he also thereby nominated his said disponees his sole executors. No trustees were appointed under said settlement, and no legacies or directions were mentioned therein.

The codicil was in these terms:—"Whereas upon the 13th November 1841 I disponed all my property to my two sisters Ann and Margaret Lyon, yet upon considering that my sister Ann is at present provided for, and that my aunt Margaret Brown is entirely dependent, I so far alter my foresaid disposition as to grant, assign, and dispone the whole which I may possess at my death to my sister Margaret if my sister Ann is still provided for as she is at present, or otherwise by marriage, under the condition that she, Margaret, shall support her aunt, Margaret Brown, all the days of her natural life, and if she, Margaret Lyon, do marry or predecease my sister Ann, then in the first case she, Ann Lyon, shall receive the half, and in the second, the whole property, &c.; provided always that if both die without marrying, the property shall go in equal shares to my two brothers, George and David, or their heirs and successors. This codicil I write on the 19th day of August 1842 years. (Signed) JOHN LYON."

On 18th January 1849 an instrument of sasine was expede and recorded in the New Particular Register of Sasines, &c., for the sheriffdom of Edinburgh, on behalf of Ann and Margaret Lyon, as regards the Vanburgh Place property, and on 12th August 1850 an instrument of sasine was expede and recorded in the said register as regards the property in Lothian Street. In both instruments of sasine the settlement and codicil were narrated, and sasine was given in the following terms:—"In virtue of which precept I hereby give sasine to the said Ann Lyon and Margaret Lyon, and the survivor of them, of the subjects and others above described, but always under burden of the codicil and addition and

No. 74.

Feb. 8, 1888.
Lyon v. Lyon.

alteration and provisions and declarations and conditions thereof before specified"; those being the conditions mentioned in the codicil.

Ann Lyon died unmarried on 24th February 1886. The two sisters had executed a mutual settlement on or about 29th June 1874, by which they conveyed their moveable estate to the survivor, but no disposition was made of heritage. Margaret Lyon died on 14th February 1887 unmarried, leaving a settlement dated 5th May 1886, by which she left to her nephew, David Lyon, son of her late brother David Lyon, whom failing, his issue equally, inter alia, the whole heritable property of which she might die possessed.

After the death of Margaret Lyon a special case was presented, to which the parties were (1) David Lyon, who was the eldest son and heir-at-law of the deceased David Lyon mentioned in the codicil, and (2) Robert Lyon, the eldest son and heir-at-law of the deceased George Lyon, also mentioned in the codicil, to whom and their heirs the testator directed that his heritable properties should go in the event of his sisters both dying without being married. David Lyon the elder and George Lyon both predeceased Ann Lyon and Margaret Lyon.

The foregoing facts were stated in the case.

It was maintained by the first party that his aunt, the said Margaret Lyon, was fiar of the heritable properties, and as such entitled to dispose of the same by deed inter vivos or mortis causa, and that having by her settlement conveyed the same to him solely, he was entitled thereto to the exclusion of his cousin the second party; while the latter maintained that the codicil validly imposed a limitation on the absolute fee conferred by the prior settlement on Ann and Margaret Lyon, which limitation was duly engrossed in the sasines expede by them; that Margaret Lyon was therefore not entitled to, and could not, defeat his right of succession, and that he was entitled to an equal pro indiviso share of both properties with the first party, in terms of the codicil.

The questions of law were, first, Do said heritable properties belong equally to the first and second parties to this case? Or, second, do they belong solely to the first party?

Argued for the first party;—Margaret Lyon, under the codicil, had an absolute right of fee subject only to two conditions,—that she should not marry, and that she should not predecease her sister Ann, and she had neither married nor predeceased her sister. The clause beginning "provided always," fairly read, only applied in the event of Margaret predeceasing Ann, and did not import a third independent condition. If George and David Lyon, their heirs and successors, were to be taken as conditional institutes, then Margaret by succeeding had evacuated the institution; if they were substitutes then her settlement had evacuated the substitution, the substitutes' right being unprotected.

Argued for the second party;—(1) This was a case of protected substitution, which was good in law against the voluntary acts of the institute.[1] Such a restricted right in the institute was, looking to the words of the codicil, expressed therein, but in any case such a restriction might be implied,[2] and was here implied. (2) The alternative view which the second party maintained was, that this was a case of a fee in Margaret Lyon, but subject to defeasance in the event which happened of her death unmarried.[3]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have had little difficulty in this case. I think there

---

[1] Ersk. iii. 8, 22.

[2] Dyer v. Carruthers, May 27, 1874, 1 R. 943.

[3] M'Lay v. Borland, July 19, 1876, 3 R. 1124.

No. 74.
Feb. 8, 1888.
Lyon v. Lyon.

is here an unfenced destination merely, in favour of the substitutes, David Lyon, their heirs and successors, and that the institute Mar was free to dispose of the heritable property if she chose and as s
She did dispose of it in favour of the first party, who is consequen opinion, entitled to prevail.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur. I think that the intention of the to give Margaret Lyon a fee in the whole heritable property, which to dispose of it if she chose, though if she did not dispose of it it wen and David Lyon as substitutes.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—This is about as plain a case as imagine. It is nothing else than a case of simple substitution i George and David Lyon, and it is quite clear that Margaret Lyon, th has evacuated that substitution.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Ha counsel for the parties on the special case, answer the f questions therein stated in the negative, and the secon in the affirmative: Find and declare accordingly, and de

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—JAMES AYTON, Solicitor—Agents

No. 75.
Feb. 9, 1888.
Magistrates of Irvine v. Muir.

PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND TOWN-COUNCIL OF THE ROYAL B IRVINE, First Parties.—Macfarlane.
JAMES MUIR, Second Party.—Ure.

Succession—Charitable Bequest—Uncertainty.—A person born i burgh of Irvine died in 1859 leaving a testament dated in the sa which he bequeathed a sum "to the Magistrates and Town-Council to be applied toward the support of aged poor persons "natives Held that the bequest was not limited to persons born in the roy Irvine, but extended to those born within the parliamentary burgh a in 1859.

1ST DIVISION.
B.

ROBERT RANKINE HOLMES, writer in Glasgow, died on 17th
By his testament dated the previous day he left £1100 to his f for their liferent alimentary use, and directed his executors on of the longest liver of them to pay £500 thereof "to the Magis Town-Council of Irvine, to be applied by them in such way a as they shall deem proper towards the maintenance and suppo poor persons, natives of Irvine, not receiving parochial aid, a adequately to support themselves."

The last survivor of the testator's sisters died on 6th October thereafter the £500 was paid over to the Provost, Magistrates, a Council of Irvine.

This special case was presented by the Provost, Magistrates, a Council of Irvine, and by James Muir residing in and a nativ way, a suburb of Irvine, for the opinion and judgment of the Co following questions:—"1. Is the term 'natives of Irvine' to be as at the date of the testator's death, or as at the date of the las of the testator's sisters, when the bequest became operative ?
the persons entitled to the benefits of the bequest falling to b stered by the first parties be natives of the old royal burgh of at most of the parish of Irvine ? or Are the terms of the bequ construed so as to include either (1) natives of the parliament

No. 75.
Feb. 9, 1888.
Magistrates of Irvine v. Muir.

of Irvine, as defined by the Act 2 and 3 William IV. chapter 65; or (2) natives of the burgh of Irvine, as defined by the Irvine Burgh Act, 1881?"

The following facts were stated:—The testator was born in 1807 in the old royal burgh, and brought up there. The royal burgh of Irvine, as defined by its old crown charters, lay within the parish of Irvine on the east side of the river Irvine, except that part of it, containing a number of dwelling-houses, and called the Harbour of Irvine, which lay on the other or west side of the Irvine, and within the parish of Dundonald.

A large suburb known as the Halfway or Fullarton lay between the royal burgh and the harbour on the west side of the river Irvine, and in the parish of Dundonald. It was connected with the old royal burgh by a bridge.

By the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1832, the parliamentary burgh of Irvine was so defined as to include both the old royal burgh and the Halfway or Fullarton.

By the Irvine Burgh Act, 1881, the boundaries of the burgh were further extended so as to include territory beyond the limits of the parliamentary burgh, both in the parish of Irvine and the parish of Dundonald, and by that Act the jurisdiction of the Magistrates, till then confined to the old royal burgh, was extended so as to include the whole of the extended burgh, and thus for the first time was made to include the Halfway or Fullarton.

The Magistrates of Irvine (first parties) contended that in the construction of the testament of Mr Holmes the expression "natives of Irvine" meant natives of the old royal burgh as it existed at the testator's death in 1859, or at most of the parish of Irvine.

James Muir, the second party, who resided in and was a native of Halfway or Fullarton, and was otherwise a suitable object for the benefit of the gift if he could be described as a "native of Irvine" in the sense of the testament, contended that the expression fell to be construed as in 1859, the date of Mr Holmes' death, and that "natives of Irvine" meant natives of the parliamentary burgh as defined by the Act of 1832; or alternatively, that if the expression fell to be construed as at the death of the surviving sister of Mr Holmes in 1886, it meant natives of Irvine as extended and defined by the Irvine Burgh Act, 1881.

Argued for the first parties;—It was not necessary to go outside the testament itself for the meaning of "Irvine," for the bequest was to the Magistrates and Town-Council of "Irvine," and for behoof of natives of "Irvine." Since therefore the old royal burgh was the only "Irvine" having Magistrates and Town-Council when the testator died, the charity must be confined to the royal burgh. It was impossible to give effect to the contention that the burgh as affected by the Act of 1881 could be included in the charity, as the testator could not be supposed to have contemplated that extension. With regard to the cases quoted on the other side, that of the "Afton"[1] turned on a construction of the Greenock Harbour Act, while in Bogie's Trustees[2] the decision that the "Mars" training-ship came under the category of ragged schools in Dundee was arrived at because the ship lay in Dundee Harbour.

Argued for the second party;—The testament must be construed as at the testator's death in 1859. By that time the parliamentary burgh had

---

[1] Owners of "Afton" v. Northern Marine Insurance Co., March 4, 1887, 14 R. 545.

[2] Bogie's Trustees v. Swanston, Feb. 5, 1878, 5 R. 634.

No. 75.
Feb. 9, 1888.
Magistrates of Irvine v. Muir.

long been formed, and the expression "natives of Irvine" meant natives of that burgh. The Magistrates and Town-Council of Irvine had been appointed managers of the charity not with any regard to the limits of their jurisdiction, but as a continuing local body fitted to manage the fund. There was therefore nothing in the objection that the second party's reading would give "Irvine" two meanings in the same sentence. The cases of the "Afton"[1] and Bogie's Trustees v. Swanston[2] were analogous instances of the way in which such expressions defining a place were interpreted. In the former the meaning of the expression "Port of Greenock" was considered. In the latter a training-ship moored in the Tay and on the Fifeshire side of it and outside the burgh, though within the harbour of Dundee, was held to come within the expression in a bequest "ragged schools in Dundee."

LORD PRESIDENT.—The direction in the will is "to the Magistrates and Town-Council of Irvine, to be applied by them in such way and manner as they shall deem proper towards the maintenance and support of aged poor persons, natives of Irvine, not receiving parochial aid, and unable adequately to support themselves."

The ambiguous term in this direction is the term "natives of Irvine."

The testator was born in the year 1807 in the old burgh of Irvine, within the ancient royalty of the burgh, and was brought up there. He seems to have been a writer in Glasgow, and to have had property there; but he had no connection in the way of property with the town of Irvine.

The question raised is this—in using the term "natives of Irvine," did he mean natives of Irvine in terms of the old charter, or in the more popular sense of natives of the town as defined for the purpose of parliamentary elections by the Act of 1832?

There is nothing technical in the use of the term natives of Irvine, one man might use it in one sense, and another man in another, and it comes to be just a balance of probabilities as to which he meant.

As was observed by Lord Adam during the argument the name "Irvine" is used twice, once as applied to "the Magistrates and Town-Council of Irvine" and once to "the natives of Irvine," and there may be some difficulty in construing the two meanings differently.

I am not much moved in my own opinion by the testator's using the expression "Magistrates and Town-Council," for he could use no other term as applied to that body. He had no choice in the matter, as he was but giving to them their legal name, and in giving it to them he was not referring to the purpose of his trust, but merely to the agents for carrying out that trust. But when he goes on to speak of the natives of Irvine he is then speaking of the object of the trust.

If one puts one's self in the position of a man who is making a will in the year 1859, and who has only a general idea as to the boundaries of the town, it seems to me that he would naturally mean the town of Irvine in its larger sense,—Irvine as it then existed,—that is to say, Irvine as defined for the purposes of parliamentary elections, and therefore I prefer this rendering of the term.

No effect can be given to the widening of the parliamentary boundaries by the

---

[1] Owners of "Afton" v. Northern Marine Insurance Co., March 4, 1887, 14 R. 545.

[2] Bogie's Trustees v. Swanston, Feb. 5, 1878, 5 R. 634.

No. 75.

Feb. 9, 1888.
Magistrates of Irvine v. Muir.

Act of 1881, for it could not have been foreseen by the testator that such boundaries were likely to be adopted.

Therefore I hold that the meaning of the term "Irvine" as used by the testator is the town of Irvine as defined by the Act of 1832 for the purpose of parliamentary elections.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD ADAM.—The question before us is what the testator meant by the expression "natives of Irvine." Apparently there are four explanations. The first is limited to natives of the royal burgh. The second includes natives of the parliamentary burgh, as defined by the Act of 1832. The third is extended to include the area defined by the Act of 1881; and the fourth includes natives of the parish of Irvine.

Very little can be said in favour of the fourth view. The next question is whether it was intended to include the area mapped out in 1881. This was done subsequently to the death of the testator, and therefore does not apply, and there are no physical features owing to which it is to be presumed the testator intended that it should be included. The testator cannot be supposed to have foreseen this change.

I have no doubt that, there being no words in the settlement to confine the term "natives of Irvine" to the royal burgh, the testator must have meant the natives residing within the parliamentary limits.

There is nothing to distinguish that part of the town of Irvine within the royal burgh from that within the parliamentary burgh. The houses and streets are continuous, and the testator probably did not know where the boundaries between the two lay. I think, therefore, it must be taken that he meant by the expression "natives of Irvine" all within the parliamentary boundaries.

As to the use of the words "Magistrates and Town-Council of Irvine" as the trustees of the gift, I take them to be only descriptive of the persons who were to administer the gift, and not restrictive of the persons who were to be the beneficiaries.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find and declare that the term 'natives of Irvine' in the settlement of the testator must be construed to mean natives of the parliamentary burgh of Irvine, as existing at the dates of the testator's settlement and of his death as fixed by the Act 2 and 3 William IV. cap. 65, and decern."

MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—DOVE & LOCKHART, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 76.

Feb. 9, 1888.
Hunter's Trustees v. Hunter.

WILLIAM HUGH HUNTER AND OTHERS (Trustees of Thomas Oliphant Hunter), Pursuers.
MARY BELL HUNTER AND OTHERS (Trustees of Thomas Oliphant Hunter secundus), Claimants (Reclaimers).—Gloag—Strachan.
ISABELLA HUNTER OR DOWNIE, Claimant (Respondent).—Ure.
WILLIAM HUGH HUNTER AND OTHERS, Claimants (Respondents).—D.-F. Mackintosh—A. G. Murray.

Succession—Vesting—Term of payment.—A truster directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate into two equal portions, and to hold one of these

No. 76.

Feb. 9, 1888.
Hunter's Trustees v. Hunter.

for behoof of his sister, whom failing, of four nephews "absolutely," and of tw nieces and their issue "in liferent and fee," and to divide the other half int sixteen equal parts, and "to hold three of the sixteenth parts for each of th four nephews absolutely, and two of the sixteenth parts for each of the tw nieces in liferent, and of their issue, per stirpes, in fee." The said shares o residue were to be payable as follows, viz.:—"The one half falling to my said siste if she survive me, also the three-sixteenth parts falling to each of my sai nephews (as well those shares destined to them, failing my said sister, if sh shall fail, as those shares directly destined to themselves), at the first term o Whitsunday or Martinmas that shall occur after the expiry of six months afte my death; and my trustees shall retain and invest" the shares falling to each o the two nieces in liferent and their issue in fee, and make payment of the in terest or annual produce half-yearly at Whitsunday and Martinmas, "beginnin the first payment at the first of these terms that shall occur after the expiry o six months after my death," the fee of these shares to be paid to the issue of th nieces at the first term after the death of their respective parents, "and if any o my said nephews . . . shall die without leaving lawful issue, the share of residue effeiring to such predeceasers shall go, descend, and belong to thei surviving brothers and sisters, and the issue of sisters absolutely, or in liferen and fee, according to the provisions before written . . . but if an of my said nephews shall so predecease leaving lawful issue, then such issue, equally among them, shall come in place of, and receive the share o their predeceasing parent." Then followed similar provisions applicab to the cases of nieces dying without or with issue, "and the interest i the said residue, whether in fee or liferent, of my said nephews and nieces and their issue, shall not vest in them till the term of payment shall have arrived; further, declaring that in case any of my said nephews or nieces, or their issue, shall be pupils, or minors and unmarried, at the time of my death, or when their interest in my means falls to be paid under the provisions of these presents, then the share of such pupils or unmarried minors shall be retained by my trustees till they shall successively become major or be married, whichever event shall first happen, the annual proceeds being, in the meantime, in the exclusive discretion of my trustees, either added to the principal and accumulated, or such interest, or a part, or even the whole of the fee or principal effeiring to such pupils or unmarried minors shall, in the exclusive discretion of my trustees, be applied as my trustees shall in their judgment deem best for the support and education of such pupils or unmarried minors, and that although the said fee or principal should not then have vested in such pupils or unmarried minors." The trustees were directed to exercise their discretion as to the time of realising the estate.

Held (1) that the declaration by the truster that the shares of residue destined to nephews should not vest till the time of payment should have arrived implied a declaration that vesting should then take place; (2) that by the time of payment the testator meant the time when the residue fell to be divided, viz., the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas six months after his death; and (3) that the direction that the shares of pupils and of unmarried minors should be retained till their marriage or majority did not suspend vesting.

1st Division.
Lord Fraser.
M.

THOMAS OLIPHANT HUNTER died on 10th September 1877, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 31st October 1876, by which he conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees for certain purposes. The deed bore:—"In the eighth place, I direct my trustees to divide the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate, heritable and moveable, into two equal portions, and to hold the first of these halves or portions for behoof of my sister, the said Ann Hunter, whom failing, of my said nephews, William Hugh Hunter, Alexander Deas Hunter, Francis Hunter, and Thomas Oliphant Hunter (second), absolutely, and of my said nieces, Emma Hay Hunter and Isabella Hunter, and their issue, in liferent and fee, and in the proportions and otherwise subject to the conditions as to the succession of nephews or nieces dying with or without issue, and as to nephews and nieces, or their issue, being pupils or minors, and unmarried, and to the other conditions hereinafter written applicable to nephews and nieces, and their issue; and my trustees shall divide the second of the said halves or portions of said residue into sixteen equal parts, and they shall hold three of the said sixteenth parts of residue for behoof of each of my nephews, the said William Hugh Hunter, Alexander Deas Hunter, Francis Hunter, and Thomas Oliphant Hunter (second), absolutely; and my trustees shall hold two of the said sixteenth parts of residue for behoof of each of my nieces, the said Emma Hay Hunter, and Isabella Hunter, in liferent for the liferent alimentary use allenarly of them respectively, exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of their respective husbands, and declaring that the same shall not be assignable by my said nieces, or liable to or attachable for the debts or deeds of them or their husbands, and for behoof of the lawful issue of my said two nieces, equally among them, per stirpes, in fee, and the said shares of residue shall be payable as follows, viz.:—The one half falling to my said sister if she shall survive me, also the three-sixteenth parts falling to each of my said nephews (as well those shares destined to them failing my said sister, if she shall fail, as those shares directly destined to themselves), at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas that shall occur after the expiry of six months after my death; and my trustees shall retain and invest, in the way hereinafter provided, the said two-sixteenth parts falling to each of my said two nieces, in liferent, and their issue in fee (as well those shares destined to them failing my said sister, if she shall fail, as those shares directly destined to themselves), and my trustees shall make payment to my said two nieces of the interest or annual produce of the parts or shares effeiring to them respectively, at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, beginning the first payment at the first of these terms that shall occur after the expiry of six months after my death, and the next payment at the following term, and so termly during their lives respectively, and the fee of the said shares of residue last mentioned shall be paid to the lawful issue of my said two nieces, equally among them, per stirpes, at the first of said terms that shall occur after the deaths of their respective parents . . . and if any of my said nephews, sons of my said brother William, shall die without leaving lawful issue, the shares of residue effeiring to such predeceasers shall go, descend, and belong to their surviving brothers and sisters, and the issue of sisters, absolutely, or in liferent and fee, according to the provisions before written, and in the proportions as respects the shares effeiring to males and females, and otherwise, in the terms before specified; but if any of my said nephews shall so predecease leaving lawful issue, then such issue, equally among them, shall come in place of and receive the share of their predeceasing parent, and if my said two nieces, Emma Hay Hunter and Isabella Hunter, or either of them, shall die without leaving lawful issue, then the fee of the share of residue effeiring to them in liferent shall go, descend, and belong to their surviving brothers and sisters absolutely, or in liferent and fee, according to the provisions before written, and in the proportions as respects the shares effeiring to males and females before specified, and, if any of the issue of my said two nieces last mentioned, interested in the fee of the residue of my estate, shall die before the term of payment of the fee, without leaving lawful issue, then the share or shares effeiring to such predeceasers shall go, descend, and be paid to their surviving brothers and sisters, if any, equally among them, if more than one, per stirpes, and, failing brothers or sisters of such predeceasers, then the share or shares

No. 76.
Feb. 9, 1888.
Hunter's Trustees v. Hunter.

effeiring to such predeceasers shall go, descend, and belong to my surviving nephews and nieces before named in this article, children of my said brother William, and their issue per stirpes in fee absolutely or in liferent or fee, according to the provisions before written, and in the proportions as respects the shares effeiring to males and females before specified; but if any of the issue of my said nieces shall so predecease, leaving lawful issue, then such last-mentioned issue, equally among them, per stirpes, shall come in place of and receive the shares of their predeceasing parents, and the interest in the said residue, whether in fee or liferent of my said nephews and nieces, and their issue shall not vest in them till the term of payment shall have arrived; further declaring that in case any of my said nephews or nieces, or their issue, shall be pupils or minors and unmarried at the time of my death, or when their interest in my means falls to be paid under the provisions of these presents, then the share of such pupils or unmarried minors shall be retained by my trustees till they shall successively become major or be married, whichever event shall first happen, the annual proceeds being in the meantime in the exclusive discretion of my trustees, either added to the principal and accumulated, or such interest, or a part, or even the whole of the fee or principal effeiring to such pupils or unmarried minors shall, in the exclusive discretion of my trustees, be applied as my trustees shall in their judgment deem best for the support and education of such pupils or unmarried minors, and that although the said fee or principal should not then have vested in such pupils or unmarried minors; and, subject to the powers of postponement after conferred, my trustees shall proceed after my death to realise my estate with all convenient speed, but in so doing they shall have regard to the state or position of the same, and they shall be the sole judges of the mode and time of realising the same, and shall not be bound to do so more quickly than may in their judgment be advantageous, keeping in view the complete and satisfactory recovery of the same, and if necessary with this view, they shall be entitled to postpone the periods of laying aside and of payment of the said various interests or shares in my estate, both for liferent and fee, and no interest shall be chargeable upon such shares till my trustees shall find themselves in a position to lay aside or make payment of the same, but declaring that my trustees shall be entitled to make partial payments or distribution of realised funds from time to time as they may see fit."

The testator was survived by his sister Miss Ann Hunter and by all his nephews and nieces.

Thomas Oliphant Hunter secundus, one of the nephews, died in minority on 26th February 1887. The trustees had in virtue of their powers to that effect made payments on his account, but at the time of his death they held three-sixteenths of the residue for him subject to deduction of these payments. He left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 12th February 1887, conveying his whole estate to trustees for certain purposes.

In a multiplepoinding brought by the trustees of Mr Thomas Oliphant Hunter primus, the trustees of Mr Thomas Oliphant Hunter secundus claimed the three-sixteenths of the share of residue on the ground that it had vested in him and had passed to them under his settlement.

The surviving nephews and nieces (his brothers and sisters) claimed his three-sixteenths on the ground that they had never vested in him, and fell to them under the survivorship clause.

The Lord Ordinary (Fraser) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the share of the succession destined to Thomas Oliphant Hunter secundus did not vest in him, and therefore repels the claim of his trustees: Sustains the whole other claims," &c.*

The trustees of Thomas Oliphant Hunter secundus reclaimed, and argued;—There were here all the elements of vesting. In the first place, there was a gift to the nephews "absolutely." In the next place, a time was fixed at which the shares were to be payable, viz., "the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas that shall occur after the expiry of six months after my death." Further, the power to make advances to a beneficiary which was here given was always an element favourable to vesting. The clause of survivorship did not apply to the case that had occurred of a nephew surviving the period of payment. The deed did not shew it to have been in the truster's mind that no right should be enjoyed till the shares were actually in the hands of the beneficiaries. Their shares might be divided from the others and held for them. Every presumption was in favour of vesting as early as possible. There was no authority exactly in point, but Lord Young's opinion in the case of Peacock,[1] quoted on the other side, was really favourable to vesting; also the case of Byars' Trustees.[2]

Argued for respondents;—The deed spoke of more than one term of payment. Thus the term of payment of the shares for nieces' children was not the first term after the truster's death, but the first term "that shall occur after the deaths of their respective parents." There being thus various terms of payment, the term in the case of minors was their attaining majority or being married. The absolute gift to the nephews and nieces was qualified by the clause of survivorship. It was a clause of survivorship which related to a term different from the mors testatoris as the term of distribution, and the vesting must be in those who were alive at that period of distribution.[3]

---

* "OPINION.—The testator intended the shares of the residue of his nephews to vest as at the date of payment; but there is a marked distinction drawn as to what is the term of payment when the legatee has attained majority and when he is still a minor. In the former case the term of payment is the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas happening six months after the testator's death, and the vesting does not take place till that term, simply because there is a clause of survivorship which prevents it vesting as at the death of the testator.

"In regard to legatees in minority there is a special and distinct clause in the following terms:—'Further declaring that in case any of my said nephews or nieces, or their issue, shall be pupils or minors and unmarried at the time of my death,' &c. This clause fixes the day of payment of the children who are minors. It says that the share of such minors 'shall be retained by my trustees till they shall successively become major or be married,'—the words are implied after this sentence, 'and it shall then be paid.' Now, it is quite clear that the testator had it in his mind that nothing should vest in these minor children until their term of payment had arrived, because he has allowed the trustees in their discretion to deal with the 'annual' proceeds of the estate in the interim, 'although the said fee or principal should not then have vested in such pupils or unmarried minors'; or, to put it in other words, 'notwithstanding that the said fee or principal has not vested in such minors.' Moreover, when he speaks of annual proceeds, he cannot mean the number of months up to the first term of Whitsunday after the testator's death, which was the term of vesting for the adult nephews. He applies the same rule to the case of minors as he does to adults in fixing the term of payment as the term of vesting; but the terms of payment are different. The result is that the claim for the trustees of Thomas Oliphant Hunter secundus must be refused."

[1] Peacock's Trustees v. Peacock, March 20, 1885, 12 R. 878.

[2] Byars' Trustees v. Hay, July 19, 1887, 14 R. 1034.

[3] Donaldson's Trustees v. Richardson, July 20, 1860, 22 D. 1527, rev. 24 D. (H. L.) 1; Peacock's Trustees, supra.

No. 76.

Feb. 9, 1888.
Hunter's
Trustees v.
Hunter.

If the fee vested in a minor nephew at the term of payment s the other side, there was no meaning in the clause providing th might be made to the nephews for maintenance and education, the said fee or principal should not then have vested in suc unmarried minors."

At advising,—

Lord President.—The Lord Ordinary has found that the shar cession destined to Thomas Oliphant Hunter secundus in his uncle did not vest in him, and has therefore repelled the claim of his trus reason which the Lord Ordinary assigns in support of this interlo Thomas Oliphant Hunter died in minority, and therefore, according of the settlement, the share destined to him had not vested in hin of his death.

In considering this question it is necessary, I think, in the f attend to the terms of the gift. It is a gift of the residue of th occurs in the 8th head of the trust-deed. The deceased truste trustees "to divide the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate, h moveable, into two equal portions, and to hold the first of these h tions for behoof of my sister the said Ann Hunter, whom failing, nephews, of whom this Thomas Oliphant Hunter secundus is one, and of my said nieces, Emma Hay Hunter and Isabella Hunter, an in liferent and fee, and in the proportions, and otherwise subject ditions as to the succession of nephews or nieces dying with or w and as to nephews or nieces or their issue being pupils or minors an and to the other conditions hereinafter written applicable to nephew and their issue, and my trustees shall divide the second of the said h tions of said residue into sixteen equal parts, and they shall hold said sixteenth parts of residue for behoof of each of" his four neph Oliphant Hunter secundus again being one, "absolutely, and my t hold two of the said sixteenth parts of residue for behoof of each of his in liferent for the liferent alimentary use allenarly of them respective of the jus mariti and right of administration of their respective h
"declaring that the same shall not be assignable by my said nieces, or attachable for the debts or deeds of them or their husbands, and of the lawful issue of my said two nieces equally among them p fee."

Now, there is no difficulty of construction there in so far as the r concerned. It is a gift in fee absolutely, and what they take is, place, an additional right, failing the testator's sister, to one-half o fee of the estate, and independently of that, to 12-16th parts of the the estate, the other 4-16th parts of that half being given to the nie

Now, in this clause of gift we have one expression which I think to construe in passing. The first half of the estate is given to th sister, whom failing, to the nephews. Now, by that expression I un testator to mean that in the event of his sister failing before the estate has vested in her it is to go to his nephews and nieces in sister.

There is also another clause in the deed in which a similar expressi the clause of survivorship as among the nephews, which is thus e
"And if any of my said nephews, sons of my brother William, shall leaving lawful issue, the share of residue effeiring to such predeceasers shall go, descend, and belong to their surviving brothers and sisters." Now, here in like manner I construe the words "shall die" as meaning "shall die before their shares have vested," and I apprehend that there can be no question that that is the meaning of such an expression in a deed like the present.

It therefore becomes of the greatest possible importance to ascertain what is the term of vesting in this deed. And we have an express declaration upon that subject by the testator himself, which, I think, leads to a very clear and obvious conclusion. He says,—"The interest in the said residue, whether in fee or liferent of my said nephews and nieces, and their issue, shall not vest in them till the term of payment shall have arrived." That, I apprehend, implies quite clearly that these interests shall vest when the term of payment arrives. Therefore the next question to be considered is, what does the testator mean by the term of payment?

Now, we have to go back to another part of the deed in order to ascertain that, and I think he expresses himself very clearly here also. He says,—"The shares of residue shall be payable as follows, viz., the one half falling to my said sister if she shall survive me, also the three-sixteenth parts falling to each of my said nephews (as well those shares destined to them failing my said sister, if she shall fail, as those shares directly destined to themselves) at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas that shall occur after the expiry of six months after my death, and my trustees shall retain and invest in the way hereinafter provided the said two-sixteenth parts falling to each of my said two nieces in liferent and their issue in fee . . . And my trustees shall make payment to my said two nieces of the interest or annual produce of the parts or shares effeiring to them respectively," and on their death shall pay the fee to their children.

Now, I think it must be quite apparent that when the testator says that the shares of the residue shall be payable at a certain time after his death he means that this residue shall then be divisible. He could not effectually, at all events, provide that the residue should be in whole payable at that particular time, because the residue of his estate is of such a nature that it really does not become payable all at once, and certainly not within such a short time as he has here prescribed after his death. There is heritable estate to realise, there are debts to be recovered, there are various contingencies that may make the realisation and payment of the residue a thing to be done by instalments, and therefore the word "payable" here occurring must, I apprehend, be construed to mean the term of division of the residue of the estate, and taking it in that sense I think the testator has made it very clear that he intends the term of division to be the first "term of Whitsunday or Martinmas that shall occur after the expiry of six months after my death."

What is to be done then? In the first place, the absolute gifts are to be at once paid, in so far as they can be paid, and in so far as they cannot be paid, actual payment must be postponed. But the division must be made, and it must be made to this effect, among others, that the shares of the nieces have to be separated and set apart from the shares of the nephews, and are to be held by the trustees after the period of division for the benefit of the nieces in liferent and of their children in fee. These shares are to be cut off and separately held from the rest of the residue of the estate, and are to be held by the trustees according to the directions of the truster for the nieces in liferent and their issue

No. 76.
Feb. 9, 1888.
Hunter's
Trustees v.
Hunter.

in fee. And in like manner the shares or portions of the residue of which belong to the nephews are to be held by the trustees, so far as t be actually paid, from and after that date for behoof of the nephews t
These trustees from that date become trustees for them, holding a c tion of the residue for each of these nephews. This will be further I think, when we come to consider the particular clauses of whic heard so much in argument. But up to this point I think the exa the deed has made out pretty clearly that vesting is not to take pl term of division, and that that term of division is the first term of or Martinmas that shall happen six months after the death of the te

Now we come to the words which I am about to read. They fo diately after the clause bearing that the interests shall not vest till payment has arrived, meaning also and implying that they shall ve term of payment has arrived. The words are these—“Declaring t any of my said nephews or nieces, or their issue, shall be pupils and unmarried at the time of my death, or when their interest in falls to be paid under the provisions of these presents, then t such pupils or unmarried minors shall be retained . . . .”
is the meaning of these words so far as we have gone? One alterna the period contemplated has arrived when “their interest in my m be paid.” And what is to be done then? Well, it is not to be paid which, again, shews conclusively what the testator meant when term of payment before as being really the term of division, becau prescribes here is division although not payment,—the shares are to
They are to be retained as separated shares set apart for the nephe who are unmarried minors or pupils, and from that time forth, I app trustees hold these shares, not as part of the undistributed estate shares set apart for the particular nephews or nieces. And they retained “till they shall successively become major or be married event shall first happen, the annual proceeds being in the meant exclusive discretion of my trustees, either added to the principal a lated, or such interest, or a part, or even the whole of the fee effeiring to such pupils or unmarried minors shall, in the exclusive my trustees, be applied as my trustees shall in their judgment deem support and education of such pupils or unmarried minors.”

Now, without going further, or saying anything in the meantim clause upon which the greatest amount of argument has been expend the effect of these words? Do they not demonstrate most clearly tha of these unmarried minors or pupils, if there be an undivided port residue of the estate, have become appropriated, because the trustee with the fullest powers to apply the whole shares, principal and they think fit, for the support and education of these minors to belong. I can hardly conceive of any arrangement more reasonabl than that the shares having become appropriated were to be devote clusive interests of those to whom they were appointed to belong.

Now, if that be so, what shall be said as to the effect of the words
On the one hand it is said that they derogate from the effect of w just read; and on the other it is contended that they add considerab effect to the construction I have put upon the preceding clause. I with the latter suggestion, I must say. The words are these,—

No. 76.

Feb. 9, 1888.
Hunter's Trustees v. Hunter.

although"—and that applies to the entire power of the trustees to dispose of the share of each pupil or unmarried minor for his benefit—"the said fee or principal should not then have vested in such pupils or unmarried minors."

Now, if the fee or principal has not vested in such pupils or unmarried minors, that must be because the term of division has not arrived, for it is already impliedly but distinctly provided that when the term of division has arrived it does vest, and therefore I apprehend the meaning of the words is simply this, "although the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas that shall occur after the expiry of six months after my death has not arrived." And it was quite natural to provide for that, because eleven months might elapse from the death of the testator and the arrival of the period of division, and during that period it might be of the greatest possible consequence that the minors should be provided with support and education, and that a considerable sum of money should be expended for the purpose of setting them up in life. One can easily understand these things occurring to the mind of the testator, and they fully account for the words which I have just read. The words mean that if it should so happen that an opportunity or a necessity occurs for expending the share of one of the unmarried minors or pupils for his advancement in life or for his education or anything else in the interval between the testator's death and the arrival of the period of division, then the trustees shall have full power to use their discretion in the matter, and to advance money, although during that interval the provision has not in terms vested. To read that clause we are now construing in the way that the Lord Ordinary has done seems to me just to substitute one set of words and expressions for another set of words and expressions having an opposite meaning. Now, that is not interpretation, and interpretation is all that we are entitled to do in the case of a deed of this kind. I confess I do not entertain much difficulty in arriving at the conclusion I have just expressed. It may be that the clauses might have been expressed with a little more precision, but I think they are not susceptible of any construction except that which I have assigned to them.

I am therefore for recalling the interlocutor, and remitting to the Lord Ordinary to rank the reclaimers, the trustees of the deceased minor, in terms of their claim.

LORD MURE.—I agree, and have little to add to what your Lordship has said. In the first part of the eighth purpose of the settlement there is, in the view I take of it, a clear and express gift of certain portions or shares of residue to the testator's sister, to his nephews in fee, and to his nieces in liferent, and to their issue in fee, without distinct mention of any period of payment. It is simply a gift to the persons named, the nephews taking under it absolutely in fee, while the nieces are to take in liferent, and their issue in fee. Now, in the ordinary case of such a clear and distinct gift, with no mention of any period of payment, the usual presumption is in favour of vesting a morte testatoris, and if the clause had stopped there, that rule would, as I conceive, have applied. But the testator has not left this matter to presumption, for in the second part of the clause he goes on to declare that "the shares shall be payable, the one half falling to my said sister if she shall survive me, also the three-sixteenth parts falling to each of my said nephews (as well those shares destined to them failing my said sister, if she shall fail, as those shares directly destined to themselves), at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas that shall occur at

No. 76.

Feb. 9, 1888.
Hunter's Trustees v. Hunter.

the expiry of six months after my death." He is thus distinct as to the period of payment of the portion falling to his sister, whom failing, to the nephews, and of the shares falling to the nephews in their own right. Then, as to the interest of the portion which the nieces are to have in liferent, it is provided that they shall receive it in equal portions, beginning at the first term happening six months after the testator's death. Taking these clauses together, I find no difficulty in the construction of the deed. I think the term of payment must be held to be the term of vesting. There can, I conceive, be no doubt about this as regards the half portion gifted to the sister, or as to the first half year's interest provided in liferent to the nieces. As to these the period of payment is the same, and very express, and I can see no reason why the same rule should not be applied in the case of shares gifted absolutely to the nephews, as to which the clause is equally express.

As I understood the argument in support of the interlocutor, the respondents' view is based upon the clause of survivorship, and the provision as to the disposal of the shares of a beneficiary in minority. But I agree with your Lordship as to both the clauses. I do not think that the survivorship clause can be held to weaken the effect of the express declaration as to the period of payment in the earlier part of the deed. As regards the administration of the share of a nephew or niece who might be a pupil or a minor and unmarried at the testator's death, I see no difficulty. I think the mode of administration which the testator provides is a fair one, and not inconsistent with the construction I have put upon the earlier clauses.

Lord Adam.—Early in the discussion I thought that it would be hard to support the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. I remain of that opinion now, and on the grounds stated by your Lordship I concur.

Lord Shand was absent.

The Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and remitted to him "to rank and prefer the reclaimers in terms of their claim."

Smith & Mason, S.S.C.—Andrew Newlands, S.S.C.—Fodd, Simpson, & Marwick, W.S.—Thomas M'Naught, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 77.

Feb. 10, 1888.
Dominion Bank v. Anderson & Co.

The Dominion Bank and Mandatories, Pursuers (Respondents).—Balfour—Ure.

William Anderson & Company, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Asher—G. W. Burnet.

Bill—Payment and discharge—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 61), sec. 63—Cancellation by mistake, or without authority.—The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, sec. 63, subsec. 3, enacts that "A cancellation made unintentionally, or under a mistake, or without the authority of the holder, is inoperative; but where a bill or any signature thereon appears to have been cancelled, the burden of proof lies on the party who alleges that the cancellation was made unintentionally, or under a mistake, or without authority."

In an action upon a bill, on which the acceptor's name had been cancelled, the pursuer proved that the bank-agent to whom the bill had been sent for collection had taken payment from the acceptor, and had allowed him to cancel his signature; that the latter had paid the bill in the belief that the holder had agreed to a condition which he, the acceptor, had intimated to the bank-agents, viz., that payment of the bill should extinguish all claim by the holder for interest and expenses; that the holder had not agreed to that condition, or authorised the bank agent to take payment on that condition, and that the holder had accordingly returned the money to the acceptor, and recovered the bill.

No. 77.

Feb. 10, 1888.
Dominion Bank v. Anderson & Co.

Held that the bank-agent had no authority to agree to the payment and cancellation on the condition stated, and that if he believed that he had such authority the cancellation had been made under a mistake, and that in either view the cancellation was inoperative.

1st Division.
Lord Fraser.
M.

On 28th September 1886 a bill for £2939, 9s. 6d. was drawn by The M'Arthur Brothers Company, Limited, of Toronto, upon William Anderson & Company, Grangemouth, in payment of the price of a cargo of timber purchased by the latter. Messrs Anderson accepted the bill at 180 days' sight from 5th November following, making it payable at the Bank of Scotland, London, on 7th May 1887.

The drawers of the bill endorsed it to the Dominion Bank of Toronto, who transmitted it for collection to the National Bank of Scotland, Limited, in London. On 7th May 1887 it was presented at the Bank of Scotland, London, but payment was refused, a dispute having arisen between Messrs Anderson and The M'Arthur Brothers in regard to the state of the cargo on its arrival.

The dispute having been settled, Mr Mackenzie, the agent of the Bank of Scotland, Grangemouth, wrote to the National Bank, London, on 21st May 1887,—"With reference to my letter of 16th inst., if the bill p. £2939, 9s. 6d. be sent on here for collection, it will in all likelihood be paid, but not the expenses, as the fault was not on Messrs W. Anderson & Coy.'s side—at least so they say."

On 28th May following the Messrs Anderson wrote to Mackenzie as follows:—"Confirming our former instructions to you, it just now occurs to us that immediate payment might be made provided the National Bank, London, gave a guarantee to hand over the bill to you on its return, and hold us scathless in event of its miscarriage in any way whatever, also freeing us of all expenses and interest. On hearing you have received such guarantee, we will instruct you to pay." That letter was on the day of receipt forwarded to the National Bank, London.

On 7th June the National Bank, London, wrote to Mackenzie as follows,—"Referring to your letter of 21st ulto., we now enclose for collection and remittance through your London office (bill being accepted payable in London) Anderson £2939, 9s. 6d. Should the acceptors decline to pay protest charges, 12s. 6d., please return protest to us. Acceptors will of course pay the remitting charge.

"We presented the bill to-day at your London office, but they state that they are still without instructions regarding it."

On 9th June Messrs Anderson wrote to Mackenzie,—"We have yours stating the National Bank, London, will take payment of this bill, but we would like you to get a letter from them freeing us of interest and expenses as asked in ours of 28th ulto. The way we have been treated in the past is our excuse for being somewhat particular now." That letter was enclosed by Mackenzie to the National Bank in the following letter, dated 9th June,—"With reference to your letter of 7th inst., I enclose herewith a communication received from W. Anderson & Company, from which you will observe that they would pay the 12s. 6d., together with the remitting charge, re the bill, on condition that they were held free of further responsibility. Please favour me with your instructions.

"P.S.—As Mr Anderson is presently living at Callander, and may not be here till Monday morning, we retain the bill till that day if we have not contrary instructions from you."

No. 77.
—
Feb. 10, 1888.
Dominion
Bank v. Anderson & Co.

On 13th June Mr Anderson called at the bank, and paid the 12s. 6d. of charges, in return for which the bill was handed to thereupon cancelled it by deleting the signature of his firm quently on the same day Messrs Anderson wrote to Mackenzie Sir,—Confirming our former respects, we hand you payment o on the distinct understanding that we are freed from all respons interest, expenses, &c."

That letter was enclosed by Mackenzie to the National Ban letter written to them by him,—" Dear Sir,—I beg to enclose £2940, 2s., being amount of W. Anderson & Company's a referred to in your letter of 7th inst., with 12s. 6d. of protest ch

" Of course you distinctly understand, in accordance wi Anderson & Company's letter herewith enclosed, that so far as is concerned the draft is accepted by you in settlement of the tr without any reservation."

On 18th June 1887 the National Bank wrote to Mackenzie,– friends have not authorised us to take payment of the acceptan conditions tendered, we return your draft £2940, 2s., and shall t to send us the bill, with protest attached." Mackenzie then got bill from the Messrs Anderson, and repaid the sum which had to him.

The Messrs Anderson having afterwards refused to pay the s the bill and the noting and protest charges, under reservati other claims, this action was brought against them by the Bank and mandataries for payment of the sum contained in with interest from 7th May 1887, or for £2939, 9s. 6d., with int that date. Action for any other claims competent to them, and al the Bank of Scotland for parting with the bill, was reserved.

With regard to the transaction of the 13th June the pursuers
—" The deletion of the defenders' signature was made under hension and mistake, and without the authority of the pur holders of said bill. The said repayment and return of the made by all parties on the footing that they should be restor position they were in before the bill was given to the defende bank."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The defenders being resting owing to the pursuers the said The Dominion Bank of T the sum contained in said bill, decree should be pronounced as for, with expenses. (3) The alleged cancellation having been m mistake and without the authority of the pursuers, the same is against them. (4) The amount of the bill having been repaid fenders, and the bill returned by them to the pursuers, the defe still liable therefor.

The defenders stated, inter alia ;—" On hearing that the bill returned for collection, as aforesaid, the defenders wrote to the Ban land the letter dated 9th June 1887, and the agent of the Bank of at Grangemouth thereupon intimated to the said National Bank defenders would pay the bill on being held free of further resp and asked instructions, stating that he would accept payment ac failing instructions to the contrary on or before 13th June 1 contrary instructions were sent, and the amount of the bill, wi charges and dues of remittance, were duly paid by the defend Bank of Scotland, and forwarded by them to the National Ba about 13th June 1887, and the bill marked paid and given up t fenders." They pleaded, inter alia ;—(2) The pursuers having payment of the sum contained in the said bill, and the same ha duly cancelled, are not entitled to found upon the same, and the action ought to be dismissed, with expenses.

At the proof the above letters, inter alia, were produced, and the evidence of Mr Basil Mackenzie, agent of the Bank of Scotland at Grangemouth, is given below.*

No. 77.

Feb. 10, 1888.
Dominion Bank v. Anderson & Co.

---

* From Mr Mackenzie's evidence it appeared that the Messrs Anderson were customers of his branch bank; that after the settlement of the dispute between them and the sellers of the cargo he had, on 16th May 1887, communicated with the National Bank in London (as shewn in the opinion of the Lord President, infra). Mackenzie further deponed,—"I kept Anderson posted up on every point. I shewed him every telegram and letter I received from the National Bank. Mr Anderson lives in Glasgow, and carries on business in Grangemouth, and he is in Grangemouth three or four times a-week. . . . I wrote the letter of 16th May 1887 to the National Bank (quoted in the opinion of the Lord President infra), because Mr Anderson asked me to communicate with the National Bank for the purpose of preserving his credit. . . . On 9th June, when I wrote to the National Bank, I enclosed Mr Anderson's memorandum asking me to get a letter from the bank freeing him of all interest and expenses. I never got such a letter from the bank; the only letter was the letter of 7th June, in which they laid down their conditions. The only instructions I had were those in that letter. The next step in the matter was that on the 13th of June Mr Anderson called and asked me what were the conditions on which the bill was to be given up. I said, in a jocular way,—'Here is the bill of fare,' referring to the letter of 7th June, and let him judge of it for himself. He said he thought he should not pay the 12s. 6d. of protest charges, because the bank stated that even if he objected to pay the protest charges the bill might be given up, and because he thought the shippers had been at fault. I advised him to pay it, and he accordingly paid the 12s. 6d., the remitting charges, and the principal in notes, which were received by the teller. The bill was then perforated 'paid,' and Mr Anderson lifted it up and put the pen through his signature. This happened about twelve or one o'clock. I have told all that passed as precisely as I recollect. About an hour afterwards he brought up the letter (quoted above), which I attached to the bank draft. He remarked that if there had been any interest or expenses he would not have paid them. I said, 'There is the National Bank's letter, and it speaks for itself.' There had been not the slightest stipulation about conditions when the money was paid. . . . By the Court.—(Q.) Were you acting as agent for the National Bank in this transaction? (A.) Not except in this way, that they send forward documents for negotiation and collection through us, and they state their conditions. The National Bank has no branch in Grangemouth. . . . . Examination continued.— . . . . (A.) I say distinctly that the bill was not cancelled in error. (Q.) Why? (A.) When he paid the money the bill was cancelled as is usually done, and Mr Anderson put the pen through his signature. At that time he had not imposed his conditions. (Q.) Then is it your view that at the time the bill was cancelled Mr Anderson intended an unconditional payment? (A.) I certainly understood that if I had said to him 'there is £15 or £20 of interest and so much for telegrams,' he would not have paid the bill. I understood it was a payment of the bill under the conditions of the letter of 7th June. . . . (Q.) Is it your view that Mr Anderson sought to impose fresh conditions afterwards? (A.) An hour afterwards, when he gave me the letter I have referred to. So far as I know, he has never agreed to dispense with those conditions, and to treat the payment as one free of those conditions. (Q.) You only forwarded on the payment subject to the condition expressed by Mr Anderson? (A.) Yes; when he came up an hour after the bill had been paid and perforated, I attached his letter to the bank draft. . . . Cross.—(Q.) When Mr Anderson gave you the letter of 13th June, did that appear to you at the time to be anything more than putting in writing the footing on which you had taken payment of the bill? (A.) I said to Mr Anderson that the thing was nonsense—the bill was paid—and I did not see any reason to send any such letter, but out of courtesy I would send it on. (Q.) Was there anything in that letter other than an expression in writing of the footing on which he had paid the bill? (A.) Certainly not, because when he paid the bill he said he would be very glad to get rid of every other bill on the same conditions. . . . . Re-examined.—If I had known that the bank did not agree to the conditions expressed in my letter of the 9th, I would certainly not have given up the bill."

The Lord Ordinary (Fraser), on 14th December 1887, decerned against the defenders in terms of the first conclusion of the summons.*

---

* "Opinion.—A bill for £2939, 9s. 6d., dated 28th September 1886, was drawn by the M'Arthur Brothers Company, Limited, of Toronto, upon the defenders, William Anderson & Company, merchants, Grangemouth, payable at 180 days after sight, at the Bank of Scotland in London. The drawers of the bill endorsed it to the Dominion Bank of Toronto, Canada, who transmitted it for collection to the National Bank of Scotland, Limited, in London. It fell due on the 7th of May 1887, and was dishonoured.

"The National Bank of Scotland in London, not obtaining payment at the place of payment mentioned in the bill, sent it, on 7th June 1887, for collection to the Bank of Scotland at Grangemouth (where the defenders carry on business), by a letter, in the following terms,—'Referring to your letter of 21st ulto., we now enclose for collection and remittance through your London office (bill being accepted payable in London) Anderson £2939, 9s. 6d. Should the acceptors decline to pay protest charges, 12s. 6d., please return protest to us. Acceptors will of course pay the remitting charge. We presented the bill to-day at your London office, but they state that they are still without instructions regarding it.' By this letter the Bank of Scotland at Grangemouth were authorised to deliver up the bill to the acceptors, upon payment of the protest charges, and the charge of remitting the money to London, which was 1s. per cent. The agent for the Bank of Scotland at Grangemouth, in answer to this letter, wrote to the National Bank of Scotland, London, a letter on the 9th of June, which is in the following terms,—'With reference to your letter of 7th inst., I enclose herewith a communication received from Messrs Anderson & Company, from which you will observe that they would pay the 12s. 6d., together with the remitting charge, re the bill, on condition that they were held free of further responsibility. Please favour me with your instructions. P.S.—As Mr Anderson is presently living at Callander, and may not be here till Monday morning, we retain the bill till that day, if we have not contrary instructions from you.' The last sentence of this letter implies that they were to keep the bill till Monday, unless instructions were sent to return it to London; and the letter from the defenders, which accompanied the bank-agent's letter, is as follows,—'We have yours stating the National Bank, London, will take payment of this bill, but we would like you to get from them a letter freeing us of interest and expenses, as asked in ours of 28th ulto. The way we have been treated in the past is our excuse for being somewhat particular now.' This was a new condition attached by the acceptors to payment of their bill. They wanted a letter of indemnity from the holders freeing them from liability for interest and expenses, and the Grangemouth bank-agent stated that he waited for instructions. Now, the National Bank were not themselves the holders of the bill, but were merely the agents of the holders, the Dominion Bank of Toronto, and, as considerable expenses had been incurred in consequence of the dishonour of the bill, they considered that they had no power to grant such a letter of indemnity without the authority of their principals. In consequence of the dishonour of the bill, it had been sent back to Canada, and the National Bank having obtained an assurance that the bill would be paid, cabled to Toronto that the bill should be returned to London, which was done. When the new condition of the letter of indemnity against responsibility for expenses and interest was imposed by the defenders, the National Bank cabled on the 10th of June to Canada making inquiry whether such a letter of indemnity could be given, and having got no answer they cabled again on the 14th, and on the 18th of June they wrote to

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—On the 13th June the bill was in the hands of the Bank of Scotland for collection, and payment of it was taken on that day by the bank's agent, and the bill cancelled with the mutual consent of the holder and acceptor. So far as regarded the intention of Mackenzie (the bank's agent) and Anderson, there was thus a completed bona fide settlement of the transaction. The National Bank having allowed Mackenzie to proceed upon the footing of his letter to them of 9th June,—to which they sent no reply,—he was acting within the scope of his authority in accepting payment as he did. This was not a case of cancellation in error or mistake, because when Messrs Anderson paid the money their view was that they were paying it in extinguishment of the bill. It was not a case of want of authority, because the National Bank's letter of the 7th June authorised the settlement, which had taken place. There was no relation between the pursuers of this action and the defenders, except that the former were holders of the bill.

---

the Bank of Scotland at Grangemouth to the effect that 'our friends have not authorised us to take payment of the acceptance on the conditions tendered.'

"But matters had proceeded at Grangemouth in such a way that the whole situation was changed. Without waiting for instructions from the National Bank, the Bank of Scotland's agent at Grangemouth, on the 13th of June, saw Mr Anderson, the defender, in the bank office, and had there a conversation with him as to the payment of the bill. Mr Anderson then reiterated his determination not to pay the bill unless upon the condition stated, that he should not be liable for interest and expenses. Now, plainly the bank-agent had no authority from the letter of the 7th of June, which accompanied the bill for collection, to agree to any such conditions. It was his plain duty to await instructions. He knew that the National Bank were merely the agents of the onerous holders, and he knew, or ought to have known, that that bank required, before agreeing to this new condition, to cable to their constituents in Canada. But he did not wait for any communication, and took payment from Anderson on the 13th of June upon the footing that the conditions were agreed to. The bill was marked paid and handed to Anderson, who scored out his own signature as acceptor, and it is now a cancelled document. To make matters more distinct, Anderson, an hour after he had paid the bill, and got possession of it, wrote the following note to the bank-agent at Grangemouth,—'Confirming our former respects, we hand you payment of this bill on the distinct understanding that we are freed from all responsibility for interest and expenses, &c.' This note was sent on to the National Bank along with a letter from the bank-agent, and a bank draft for £2940, 2s. The National Bank not being authorised to agree to the conditions, demanded from the bank-agent at Grangemouth a return of the bill, and at the same time sent back the bank draft for £2940, 2s., which they had not negotiated. The bill was got back from Anderson by the bank-agent, who, on the 23d of June 1887, sent it to London, and he handed the bank draft for £2940, 2s. to Mr Anderson, who obtained cash therefor. The bill thus remains unpaid, and the defenders have got possession of the timber for which the bill was granted, and they refuse now to pay the bill because, as they say, it is cancelled. This defence is founded upon the 63d section of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which is divided into three sections. The first section declares that where a bill 'is intentionally cancelled by the holder or his agent, and the cancellation is apparent thereon, the bill is discharged.' This is not the section applicable to the circumstances that here appear. It is the third section, which is as follows:—'A cancellation made unintentionally, or under a mistake, or without the authority of the holder, is inoperative.' The cancellation here was made intentionally, but the Lord Ordinary holds that it was made without the authority of the holder. The bank-agent at Grangemouth had no authority to agree to conditions proposed by Mr Anderson and accepted by him, and consequently the bill is not inoperative, and the pursuers are entitled to decree in their favour."

But the bill being cancelled, they could not sue upon it. And it was not proved that there was any debt resting owing except upon the bill.

The respondents' argument sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Court.

Lord President.—This is an action by the onerous holders of a bill of exchange, and the peculiarity of the case is that the acceptors' signature upon the bill is cancelled. We are instructed upon this subject by a provision in the Bills of Exchange Act of 1882 (sec. 63, subsec. 3), which says that "a cancellation made unintentionally, or under a mistake, or without the authority of the holder, is inoperative; but where a bill or any signature thereon appears to have been cancelled, the burden of proof lies on the party who alleges that the cancellation was made unintentionally, or under a mistake, or without authority." The allegation on the part of the pursuers is that the cancellation was made by mistake, and also without the authority of the holder, and therefore that it is inoperative, and they have undertaken to prove that allegation. The question is, Have they succeeded?

The bill itself was granted for the price of a cargo of timber bought by Messrs William Anderson & Company from a Canadian firm, and it was discounted or acquired for value by the Dominion Bank of Toronto. When presented for acceptance it was protested for non-acceptance. It was afterwards accepted, but when it came to maturity payment of it could not be got at the place of payment mentioned in the bill, and the pursuers having failed to make anything of it, had had it returned to Canada that they might preserve their recourse against the drawers. But after the bill was returned to Canada Messrs Anderson, whose place of business is at Grangemouth, appear to have consulted their banker, Mr Mackenzie, about the bill, and that they were on very confidential terms appears from the letters which have been produced. One thing which is very clear from the correspondence is that until the 7th June Mackenzie had no authority from anyone to collect the bill. Up to that date he was acting entirely as Messrs Anderson's agent.

The first letter which is produced is dated 16th May 1887, from the Bank of Scotland, Grangemouth, to the National Bank of Scotland, London,—"An acceptance of Messrs Wm. Anderson & Co. of this town p. £2939, 9s. 6d. was presented at our London office, and payment refused on account of there being a dispute between the merchants who drew the bill and themselves. If the matter be now adjusted, you might send forward the document for collection." The answer to that is that the National Bank are not in a condition to send it, as it "was returned to our friends, the Dominion Bank, Toronto, on 10th inst.; but if you remit us the amount and charges we shall have pleasure in recalling the bill by cablegram." It is plain that the National Bank understood Mackenzie, who very commonly acted as their agent, to be the mouthpiece or adviser of the acceptors of the bill. Mackenzie writes again on the 21st to the National Bank,—"With reference to my letter of 16th inst., if the bill p. £2939, 9s. 6d. be sent on here for collection, it will in all likelihood be paid, but not the expenses, as the fault was not on Messrs W. Anderson & Coy.'s side—at least so they say." That is an intimation at a pretty early period that Messrs Anderson are to attach a condition to the payment of the bill. Then there is a letter, dated 28th May 1887, from Messrs Anderson to the Bank of Scotland. Mr Mackenzie is called the Bank of Scotland, but it is in reality to Mr Mackenzie that the letter is written. Messrs Anderson write,—"Confirming our former instructions to you, it just now occurs to us that immediate payment might be made provided the National Bank, London, gave a guarantee to hand over the bill to you on its return, and hold us scathless in event of its miscarriage in any way whatever, also freeing us of all expenses and interest. On hearing you have received such guarantee, we will instruct you to pay." That certainly is the letter of a client to his agent—so far as a banker may properly be called an agent—telling him that in conformity with previous instructions he may intimate to the National Bank in London that the bill will be paid upon certain conditions. Mackenzie writes enclosing that letter to the National Bank on the 28th May, and mentions that Messrs Anderson think they have been harshly treated; and he states the position they take up. The answer from the National Bank to that letter is dated the 31st May, and they say,—"As we cabled recall of the bill on 23d inst. it will probably be here in a few days, and immediately on its receipt we shall re-present it at its London domicile for payment." That is certainly not an instruction to Mackenzie to collect the bill on behalf of the National Bank. They say, on the contrary, that they are to collect it again at the place of payment mentioned in the bill. Between the 31st May and the 7th June a change seems to come over the relation of the parties, because the National Bank write to the Bank of Scotland, Grangemouth, on the latter date, that they "enclose for collection and remittance through your London office (bill being accepted payable in London) Anderson £2939, 9s. 6d. Should the acceptors decline to pay protest charges, 12s. 6d., please return protest to us. Acceptors will of course pay the remitting charge. We presented the bill to-day at your London office, but they state that they are still without instructions regarding it."

From that time I apprehend that Mackenzie was acting for both parties. He did not give up the position of acting for the acceptors, but he undertook the additional duty of collecting for the National Bank, and in that character he goes on to correspond with the National Bank. And having received a letter from Messrs Anderson, dated the 9th June, to this effect,—"We have yours stating the National Bank, London, will take payment of this bill, but we would like you to get a letter from them freeing us of interest and expenses as asked in ours of 28th ulto. The way we have been treated in the past is our excuse for being somewhat particular now,"—he then writes to the National Bank, enclosing Messrs Anderson's letter, in the following terms:—"With reference to your letter of 7th inst., I enclose herewith a communication received from W. Anderson & Company, from which you will observe that they would pay the 12s. 6d., together with the remitting charge, re the bill, on condition that they were held free of further responsibility. Please favour me with your instructions. P.S.—As Mr Anderson is presently living at Callander, and may not be here till Monday morning, we retain the bill till that day if we have not contrary instructions from you." I understand that letter to the National Bank to mean "Will you entertain Messrs Anderson's proposal?" He did not receive any instructions in answer to that letter, and it is not surprising that he did not. It would have been very strange if it had been otherwise. The National Bank could not have answered affirmatively unless they got instructions from their principals, and I daresay they hesitated to suggest that such a guarantee as was asked should be given.

So standing matters upon the 9th June, the whole question was brought to a

No. 77.
Feb. 10, 1888.
Dominion Bank v. Anderson & Co.

conclusion upon the 13th June, and it is very important to observe what happened. Mr Mackenzie and the Messrs Anderson being on confidential relations, proceeded, the one to pay, and the other to receive, the contents of the bill, and Mackenzie intimated to the National Bank what they had done. Mackenzie says in his evidence that he took payment of the bill from Anderson and delivered it up to him without any conditions, and that it was only after the lapse of an hour from the time that the money was paid and the signature cancelled by Anderson himself that Anderson brought him the letter of that date. It was from the Messrs Anderson to the Bank of Scotland, Grangemouth, and was to the following effect:—"Dear Sir,—Confirming our former respects, we hand you payment of this bill on the distinct understanding that we are freed from all responsibility for interest, expenses, &c." This letter was then attached by Mackenzie to the draft on London, which he forwarded to the National Bank, thereby intending to unite both together and to make the conditions binding on the bank, if they accepted payment. To make the matter more distinct, Mackenzie wrote, along with the draft, saying that he enclosed it, and adding,—"Of course you distinctly understand, in accordance with Messrs Anderson & Company's letter herewith enclosed, that so far as that firm is concerned the draft is accepted by you in settlement of the transaction without any reservation." The expression "without any reservation" would be somewhat vague if it were not for the words which precede it, making reference to the "letter herewith enclosed," which make its explanation clear.

Mackenzie, acting for both parties, sent the draft accompanied and intended to be affected by Anderson's letter of the 13th June, taken in conjunction with the statement in his own letter. Thereupon the National Bank very properly declined to accept such a settlement. One thing is very clear upon the evidence, and that is, that neither the National Bank, nor anyone else entitled to represent the pursuers, ever agreed to the conditions imposed by the Messrs Anderson. And Mackenzie may say what he pleases as to his not being in error, but that there was error, and very serious error, or mistake on his part in supposing that he had any authority to assent to such conditions, or to undertake such a liability for them, is undoubted. Notwithstanding the very clever way in which Mr Mackenzie has given his evidence, he has made this admission,—"If I had known that the bank did not agree to the conditions expressed in my letter of the 9th, I would certainly not have given up the bill." If he did not know that the bank agreed to these conditions, he was under a very great mistake in giving up the bill, because most certainly the bank had not so agreed, and if he knew that they did not agree, then he was acting plainly without any authority in giving up the bill. He either committed a gross mistake or he was acting entirely without any authority, and on either ground I am clearly of opinion that the cancellation cannot receive any effect.

For these reasons, I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD ADAM.—I think the limits of Mr Mackenzie's authority to give up the bill in question are to be found in the letter addressed to him by the National Bank on 7th June 1887, and that beyond these limits he had no power to go. He was certainly not authorised by that letter to assume that the Dominion Bank would guarantee that Messrs Anderson should be freed from interest and expenses.

No. 77.

Feb. 10, 1888.
Dominion Bank v. Anderson & Co.

That letter of the 7th June being the limit of Mackenzie's authority, so long as he kept within that, he had authority to give up the bill. If we were to shut our eyes to everything that took place both before and after the transaction on the 13th of June—and were to look only to Mr Mackenzie's evidence of what then occurred, there might be some ground for the defence. But I am clearly of opinion that when the bill was given up and cancelled on the 13th June it was quite understood between Mackenzie and Anderson that the latter was to be freed from interest and expenses. Thus Messrs Anderson writing to the Bank of Scotland on that day say,—"We hand you payment of this bill on the distinct understanding that we are freed from all responsibility for interest, expenses, &c." This does not refer to anything that had previously taken place, but clearly implies that in return for payment of the bill they (Messrs Anderson) were to get the bill handed to them over the counter. That letter was adopted by Mackenzie, and was sent on by him to the National Bank as a true representation of what had occurred. He sends it on to them and says,—"Of course you distinctly understand, in accordance with Messrs Anderson & Company's letter herewith enclosed, that so far as that firm is concerned the draft is accepted by you in settlement of the transaction without any reservation." That was the representation which was made by Mr Mackenzie at the time the bill was paid. It was understood all along between them that that was to be the footing on which the bill was to be paid. But Mackenzie had clearly no authority to take payment of the bill on these terms, and I think that in these circumstances, in terms of the Bills of Exchange Act of 1882, the cancellation must be held to be bad.

Lord Shand was absent.

The Court adhered.

J. & J. Ross, W.S.—William B. Rainnie, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 78.

Feb. 10, 1888.
Binnie v. Binnie's Trustees.

William Binnie and Others, Pursuers (Respondents).—Shaw—A. S. D. Thomson.

David Broom and Others (Binnie's Trustees), Defenders (Reclaimers).—D.-F. Mackintosh—C. S. Dickson.

Trust—Management—Trustees borrowing without sanction in deed—Liability.—The proprietor of house property in Glasgow of the value of £42,000 died in October 1857 leaving a settlement, in which he directed his trustees to pay his debts and to pay certain shares of the income of the free residue of his estate to his widow and children, and to make such further advances for the maintenance and education of his children as the trustees should consider expedient. He gave the trustees power to sell on his youngest child, then three years of age, attaining the age of thirty. The Western Bank of Scotland, Glasgow, suspended payment on 9th November 1857, and a commercial depression followed which greatly reduced the value of the heritable property. The trustees, in the expectation that the property would recover its value in a few years, borrowed £26,000 to pay debts. After the first year the revenue of the estate was insufficient to pay the interest on the borrowed money, but the trustees made payments to the widow and children necessary for their support, to the amount of £3000, till August 1867, when the estate was sequestrated. In the sequestration the estate, after paying the trustee's commission of £1217 and other expenses, proved insufficient, to the extent of £1337, to meet debts. The heritable property when sold in 1870 realised £41,900. In 1862 it was valued at £36,748, and in 1865 at £41,225.

No. 78.
Feb. 10, 1888.
Binnie v.
Binnie's
Trustees.

In 1885 an action was raised by some of the truster's children for damages alleged to have been sustained by them from the actings of the trustees. Held that while the trustees had acted ultra vires in borrowing money to pay debt the pursuers had sustained no loss, as if the heritage had been realised at an earlier date it would have been insufficient to pay the truster's debts. Defenders assoilzied.

1st Division.
Lord M'Laren.
M.

William Binnie, builder in Glasgow, died on 7th October 1857, survived by his wife Mrs Jane M'Dougall or Binnie, and by four sons, William, Louis, John and George, and by one daughter, the eldest being nine years of age and the youngest three.

He left a trust-disposition and settlement whereby he conveyed his estate to David Broom and others as trustees. He directed his trustees, in the first place, to make "payment of all my just and lawful debts, deathbed and funeral expenses, and the expense of executing this trust." He further directed his trustees to pay the income of "the free residue" of his estate "after paying all annuities, legacies, or other charges and burdens," as follows:—During the first three years one-fourth part to his widow and a fourth to his children; during the next seven years one-third to his widow and one-third to his children; from the end of the seven years "until the sale or division of my heritable property as after provided for," one-half to his widow if she remained unmarried, and one-third if she married, and one-half to his children. He then assigned to his wife directly "the liferent of the whole household furniture." He directed the provision to his children to be paid to their mother for their aliment, education, and upbringing so long as she remained unmarried, and they remained in family with her, "declaring that the said respective provisions to them shall continue to be paid to them, or for their behoof, until my youngest child shall attain the age of thirty years": Declaring that the trustees should have power within the first five years after his death, or during the minority of his youngest child, "to increase the allowances to my said children for their aliment and education, or for their outfit and advancement in the world in such manner as shall be deemed beneficial." "I earnestly recommend to the said Mrs Jane Macdougall or Binnie and my children, after the respective shares of the free residue of my estate shall be apportioned as before directed, that any residue beyond what may be reasonably required for their proper support should be accumulated and applied to the reduction and discharge of any debt affecting my estate." He then recommended his trustees to bring up two of his sons "for clerical orders in the Established Church, and other two for the bar of England or Scotland, or" one or more as an engineer or civil engineer. The deed further bore:—"I authorise and empower my said trustees and the survivors or survivor of them, so soon as my youngest child shall attain the age of thirty years complete, to sell and dispose of the lands." The deed contained no other power of sale, and no power to borrow.

The estate consisted mainly of house property in Glasgow, which was burdened to the extent of £12,000, and was greatly diminished in value after the failure of the Western Bank on 9th November 1857. He also left a large amount of personal debt, which more than exhausted his personal estate. The rents formed the whole revenue received by the trustees from the estate. During the period from 7th October 1857, the date of the testator's death, to Martinmas 1858, the surplus, after paying interest and other payments from revenue, amounted to £574, 3s. 6d. Of this the trustees paid to the widow for herself and children £402, 11s., and for board to children not living with her £23, 12s. 6d. In subsequent years there was no surplus revenue, but the trustees continued to make payments for the widow and children till August 1867. To enable them to pay the interest on the heritable debts and to make these payments, the trustees borrowed £26,000 from the Royal Bank of Scotland on the security of the heritable property. The trust-estate was sequestrated on 7th August 1867 on a petition by the trustees, with concurrence of a creditor. A dividend of 8s. 6d. per pound was paid on the unsecured debts due by the deceased, which amounted to £1525, the dividend being £648, 10s., and on £800 due to the law-agents of the trustees the dividend being £340.

No. 78.

Feb. 10, 1888.
Binnie v. Binnie's Trustees.

In November 1886 the truster's sons, William, George, and Louis, raised an action against the trustees concluding for an accounting, or otherwise for payment of £20,000.

The pursuers averred that the free residue of the estate at the date of the truster's death, after providing for debts, amounted to £17,000; that the trustees, in place of paying off debts, as directed, by realising portions of the estate necessary for this purpose, had wrongfully borrowed money on the security of the heritage at exorbitant rates for the purpose; that they had made large payments to Mrs Binnie in excess not only of what was necessary for her support, but of the provisions in the settlement, and had made payments to her and the children when there was no surplus revenue. The trustees had applied for sequestration to secure their own discharge. In it the trustee, after paying £31,927 to preferable creditors, had paid to himself £921 of commission and £650 to his law-agents "(which two sums together amounted to more than the said truster's debts at the date of sequestration), and divided £988, 10s. among Mrs Aitken's trustees, Mr Muir, and Mr Binnie's trustees' law-agents, as creditors."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(4) The trustees having acted wrongfully, in disregard of the terms of the trust-deed, and in contravention of their duty as trustees, all as condescended on, are bound to make good to the pursuers the loss occasioned thereby.

The defenders averred that the truster left no funds sufficient for the payment of debts without realising or borrowing; that they had acted on the opinion of counsel that the terms of the trust-deed necessarily implied a power to borrow, that the trust-deed gave them no power of sale till the youngest child attained the age of thirty years, and that when they attempted to sell the title was objected to by intending purchasers, and that the only way the property could be realised was through a sequestration. That the bulk of the property was sold in 1870, when it realised a much larger sum than it would have done if sold sooner, a great commercial depression having existed for several years after the Western Bank suspended payment on 9th November 1857. By the settlement the trustees had full power to increase the allowances to the children, and to pay these to their mother so long as they remained with her and she remained unmarried. No payments were made except such as were necessary for the widow and children, the latter being at the date of the testator's death all under ten years of age; the trustees honestly believed the circumstances of the trust warranted them in making these payments. In 1861, on the truster's widow marrying again, they compromised for £400 her claim under a postnuptial contract to an annuity of £100, and her claims under the settlement. This was a favourable settlement for the trust. In borrowing the money they had acted for the good of the trust-estate, and in the circumstances of the case the beneficiaries had not suffered by their actings in the management of the trust. Further, that it was necessary, to carry out the instructions of the truster as to the allowance to the widow, and education of the children, to act as they had done.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant.

No. 78.

Feb. 10, 1888.
Binnie v.
Binnie's
Trustees.

(4) The pursuers' claims are excluded by mora and taciturnity trustees having acted within their powers, and separatim havin bona fide and under advice of counsel in the transactions con on, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

On 16th February 1887 the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) allowe

The defenders reclaimed to the First Division.

On 3d March 1887 the Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's tor, and remitted to Mr J. A. Robertson, C.A., "to inquir amount of the trust-estate from the date of the truster's amount of debts due by the truster and paid by the trustee yearly income and expenditure of the trust, and to report."

The accountant in his report stated that at the date of the death the moveable estate (including furniture valued at £5 was of the value of £1135, 18s. 10d., and the heritage of th £41,900,—together, £43,035, 18s. 10d. That the amount of d the deceased and paid by the trustees was £32,685, 17s. 2d.

---

* "OPINION.—This is an action instituted by beneficiaries agains and the representatives of other trustees, claiming compensation for the trust-estate, which they say was caused by the trustees first a interest of debt to accumulate at bank discount rates, and then t estate into sequestration and allowing it to be sacrificed with a vi own exoneration from the personal responsibility which they had the banks.

"It is with some reluctance that I have decided to make an order because the sequestration was applied for in 1867; and when a cl kind is made twenty years after the event it is natural to suppose th not much substance in it. Lapse of time, however, is not an absolu action for enforcing accountability; it is a circumstance to be wei with the other elements of fact, when these have been ascertained.

"In the argument on relevancy it was contended with much behalf of the trustees, that from the nature of the instructions received from the truster, they could not do otherwise than borro banks, and continue borrowing from year to year to make up deficits. Under such a mode of administration bankruptcy is of co table, and the period of its occurrence can be calculated in advance w able certainty. Nevertheless, the thing must be done, because it is the truster; this is the proposition that is masked by the eloquen addressed to me in defence of the trustees' administrations. Now, I very likely that the trustees may be able to shew that they were borrowing from the banks to pay off unsecured debts; but it could n administration to retain the heritable property and to continue the borrowing after it became clear that the interest of debt and necessa were permanently in excess of the rents. Their duty under such ci would be to realise the estate, and to invest whatever residue it migh the truster's family.

"I have difficulty in accepting the statement that it was imposs trustees to sell until the estate became insolvent. Under such circu I have supposed, the trustees might have obtained a declarator affirming their power of sale; at all events, they might have tri modes of solving the difficulty may be suggested. And it may be when the trustees wanted to sell a part of the property they did so (intervention of an heritable creditor) without raising any questio their powers.

"Therefore, while very sensible of the inconvenience of such an i proposed after such an interval of time, I cannot say that, on the fact the action of the trustees is so clearly right as to render all inquiry The evidence, I suppose, will be mainly documentary, and all the pleas are of course reserved entire."

No. 78.

Feb. 10, 1888.
Binnie v.
Binnie's
Trustees.

income of the trust-estate to May 1870 was £17,518, and the total expenditure £22,165.[*] [1]

At advising,—

Lord President.—When this case first came before us on a reclaiming note against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 16th February 1887, we so far shared his reluctance to make an order for proof that we remitted to an accountant to report on the trust, and his report now enables us to decide the case without a proof.

The action relates to the testamentary deed of Mr William Binnie, who was a builder of some standing in Glasgow. The deed was executed on 24th October 1856, and he died on the 7th of October 1857.

The estate consisted chiefly of house property and there was a large debt on it.

The provisions with regard to his family were somewhat peculiar. In the first place, he dealt with what he expected to be the income of the estate; and with regard to that, he provided that during the first three years after his death one-fourth part should be paid to his wife and one-fourth part to his children, during the next seven years one-third part to his wife and one-third part to his children; and he provided that, after ten years had elapsed from the date of his death, one-half of the income should be paid to his wife and one-half to his children, and the balance of the income during these ten years was to go towards reducing the debt.

---

[*] The reporter stated that the heritable subjects had been valued in 1857 at £42,980, but the trustees pointed out that these valuations were on the face of them prospective in character, and were obtained for the purpose of a loan, and were based upon increased rentals expected to be obtained after considerable outlay for improvements. They were again valued in March 1862 at £36,748, and in June 1865 at £41,225, and that when sold in 1870 they realised £41,900. It appeared that the rents received in 1862 amounted to £1156, and that in 1869 they were £1451.

The whole revenue of the trust-estate, amounting to £17,518, was derived from rents, and with the exception of the years 1858, 1868, 1869, and 1870, the interest payable exceeded the rents. The payments to the widow for herself and children (down to Martinmas 1861) amounted to £1583, 12s. 5d., and payments for the children not living with their mother to the date of sequestration amounted to £1468, 12s. 9d. The payments of interest to Whitsunday 1870 amounted to £18,702, 19s. 6d. Miscellaneous payments, £410, 1s. 6d., including £307, 8s. 4d. retained as commission by the trustee on the sequestrated estate in addition to the commission of £910 allowed him by the commissioners, in all, £22,165, 6s. 2d.

The reporter gave this summary,—

Amount of estate, ...		£43,035 18 10
Debts paid by trustees, . . .	£32,685 17 2
Debts due by truster paid by trustee in sequestration, . . .	2,398 10 0
Inventory, &c., . . .	819 7 1
		35,903 14 3
	Surplus,	£7,132 4 7
Thus disposed of,—
Excess of expenditure over income, .	£4,646 7 0
Expenses in sequestration, . .	1,583 9 0
Dividend on trustees' agents' account, £800,	340 0 0
Furniture, ...	562 8 7

[1] Pursuers' Authorities.—Henderson v. Somerville, June 22, 1841, 3 D. 1049; Ker, March 3, 1855, 17 D. 565; White, March 7, 1855, 17 D. 599; Erskine's Trustees v. Wemyss, May 13, 1829, 7 Sh. 594.

No. 78.

Feb. 10, 1888.
Binnie v.
Binnie's
Trustees.

It is obvious that he expected the income to be sufficient to keep his family independent, for he recommended that his sons should be educated for the church, the bar, and the profession of engineering.

Now, this was in any view a sanguine settlement, but unfortunately the condition of the estate was seriously affected by the stoppage of the Western Bank, which took place soon after the death of the testator. This materially reduced the market value of house property in Glasgow. Another circumstance which embarrassed the trustees in their management was that no power was given to them in the trust-deed either to sell or to borrow on the security of the trust-estate. Under these circumstances the trust ought to have been managed in a very careful manner.

We can easily see now that the best course the trustees could have adopted would have been not to accept the trust at all, but to have allowed the estate to be wound up under the Sequestration Statute. This is a course which I am surprised not to see more frequently adopted. It seems to be thought that the winding up of a trust-estate under the Sequestration Statute involves a kind of confession of bankruptcy. That is not so at all. It is not the least necessary that an estate should be bankrupt or insolvent to enable it to be wound up under the Sequestration Statute. The proceeding is one to be recommended, because it saves gratuitous trustees from the risk of being rendered personally liable, while at the same time it secures that the management be of a statutory kind, and also that the trustee in the sequestration may be guided by the decision of the Court if difficulty arises in the management of the trust.

Here the trustees took a different view, for they seem to have thought that at the sacrifice of all other interests they were bound to provide for the widow and children as the testator had directed.

They were met by the further difficulty that having no power of sale under the deed they were unable to find a purchaser for part even of the estate; but I think, considering the state the property was in at the time, that the trustees ought to have come to the Court, for it was a matter of necessity to the carrying on of the trust that some part of the estate should be sold. They might not have been able to obtain leave by means of a petition, but they certainly could have brought a declaratory action as in the case of Henderson v. Somervill.[1] However, instead of coming to the Court, the trustees adopted another course, for which they had no authority under the deed, and for which they could certainly have obtained no authority from the Court,—that is to say, they borrowed money on the security of the estate.

Any more imprudent course to be adopted by trustees under a deed of this kind I am unable to conceive. The conduct of trustees in borrowing money under any circumstances is highly imprudent. If it turns out to be a mistake it subjects the trustees to personal liability. But they did not stop here. They had very simple instructions under the deed to give one-fourth of the income to the widow and one-fourth to the children for three years, and for the next seven years one-third to the widow and one-third to the children. They not only gave the whole income to the widow and children, but they gave more than the income, and made up the deficiency by borrowing money at the ruinous rate of five per cent.

Now, these are the facts alleged against the trustees, and that they are of a grave character must be admitted.

In order, however, that the pursuers should be successful in rendering the

---

[1] June 22, 1841, 3 D. 1049.

No. 78.

Feb. 10, 1888.
Binnie v. Binnie's Trustees.

present defenders personally liable, something more is necessary than merely to shew that the trustees were grossly negligent; the pursuers must shew that they themselves have suffered loss by the actings of these trustees. It is upon this part of the case that the report of the accountant comes to be so valuable as shewing whether, if this estate had been managed in the most prudent manner possible, the result would have been in any way different so far as the present pursuers are concerned.

If we turn to the accountant's report we find that he brings out a balance, which at first sight seems highly favourable to the pursuers, of £7132, and the pursuers say that is the measure of the loss they have sustained through the trustees' mismanagement. But this balance will not stand the test of further examination into facts, which are fortunately supplied by the reporter. The value of the moveable estate is stated by him to be £1135, 18s. 10d., but in this is included the sum of £562, 8s. 7d., which is the estimated value of the furniture. The furniture was liferented by the widow. She removed it to London, and there pledged it for advances made to her; in short, it was lost to the estate, but I do not see what the trustees could have done, because they were not in a position to have prevented her from acting as she did. Hence we must deduct the price of the furniture from the value of the moveable estate, which leaves a sum of £573, 10s. 3d.

Again, the heritable estate is taken by the accountant at the value of £41,900, which he fixes as the value of the property at the date of the truster's death in 1857. I do not consider that it is fair to adopt that as the real value of the estate. For the value of property was seriously affected by the failure of the Western Bank, and, indeed, in many cases it became unsaleable. After a time house property recovered its value somewhat, and the trustees obtained a fresh valuation with a view to a sale. This was in 1862, and the estimate then formed of its value was £36,748. This I consider a much fairer valuation, and one which I am prepared to take for the purposes of the present case, and for this reason, that, looking to the state of the property market in consequence of the failure of the Western Bank, this house property could not have been sold sooner than 1862, nor would it have fetched more than the amount of this valuation. Now, if we add these two sums together, the personal estate, £573, and the estimated value of the heritage, £36,748, we have £37,321 instead of the figure brought out by the accountant.

The valuation being thus reduced, let us turn now to the other side of the account. We there find that the total amount of debts brought out by the accountant is £35,903, 14s. 3d. I do not think, however, that this embraces the whole liabilities of the trust-estate. The accountant has taken the unsecured debts as paid in the sequestration, and he has estimated them at this amount as at the date of the truster's death. It appears to me, however, to be necessary to add to the amount of debt brought out by the accountant the sum of £877, 7s. 8d., being the difference between the amounts due to W. H. Muir and Aitken's trustees, and the dividends which they actually received. Then there was a heavy agent's account due by the trustees, which they compounded for £340, and against which account no objection was taken that the disbursements had been unnecessary. There was also the widow's annuity of £100, which undoubtedly was a debt due by the trust-estate, though it was constituted only by a postnuptial contract of marriage. This debt was also compromised, and upon terms most favourable to the trust-estate, for the trustees succeeded in buying off Mrs Binnie for a sum of £400, a sum very far below the actuarial value of such an annuity. Both these two last sums must be taken into account in estimating the amount of the debts due by the trust-estate.

No. 78.

Feb. 10, 1888.
Binnie v. Binnie's Trustees.

Now, placing the sums I mentioned first on the credit side of the account, and adding to the amount of the debt, as shewn by the accountant's report, the sums I have just mentioned, we find that the total amount of the estate was £37,321, 10s. 3d., and that the debt amounted to £37,521, 1s. 11d., the result of which is that at the time when this trust commenced there was an absolute deficiency of £199, 11s. 8d. If this was the true position of the trust-estate when the trustees entered upon their management, it seems to me impossible that any action upon their part could have produced a surplus for the benefit of the beneficiaries. Therefore, while condemning the management of the trustees in the most emphatic terms, I do not see that even if their management had been of the most strictly legal and prudent character the result would have been different so far as the pursuers are concerned. It follows therefore that the pursuers have failed to establish their grounds of action, inasmuch as they have established only one of the two propositions upon which their case was founded, first, that there was mismanagement, and, second, that the mismanagement resulted in loss to them which could have been avoided if the management had been otherwise. Upon these grounds I think the defenders must be assoilzied.

Lord Mure concurred.

Lord Adam.—I concur, and desire to make only a single remark regarding the value of the heritable property here. The accountant in his report says,—"The accountant is of opinion that by taking the sums realised from time to time for the different properties, no injustice is done either to the pursuers or defenders"; and the sum which he does take is £41,900, which nearly corresponds with the valuation of the property at the commencement of the trust. What would have been realised if the trustees had sold this estate in 1862 can best be seen by the rent-sheet given in the accountant's report. In 1870, when the property was sold, the rental was £1576, and it is idle to suppose that this property in 1862, with a rental of only £1156, would have brought anything like what it realised in 1870 when the rental had been increased by more than a third.

Lord Shand was absent.

The Court assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the summons.

Marcus J. Brown, S.S.C.—Henry & Scott, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 79.

Feb. 10, 1888.*
Lord Advocate v. Stirling.

The Lord Advocate, Pursuer (Respondent).—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—H. Johnston.

Patrick Stirling, Defender (Reclaimer).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Low.

Teinds—Valuation—Cumulo or several—Division.—In a decree of valuation of, inter alia, the teinds of the lands and barony of K, comprehending the lands of A, B, C, D, and E, with the pertinents, the rent, stock, and teind of these lands was declared to be £157, 6s. $0\frac{4}{12}$d. sterling, the fifth part whereof being £31, 9s. $2\frac{5}{12}$d., was declared to be teind, and the usual decerniture followed. In the extract of the decree, which was in the old form, it was set forth that the decerniture proceeded upon a report by the Lord Ordinary, and conform to a

---

* Decided Jan. 27, 1888.

No. 79.

Feb. 10, 1888.
Lord Advocate v. Stirling.

particular scheme of the rental, stock, and teind of the lands, and this scheme was narrated ad longum. From this scheme it was possible to ascertain the rental, and the particular deductions, and so to arrive accurately at the teind of each separate parcel of land making up the lands and barony of K. In a question arising as to the surplus teinds of D and E,—two of these several parcels,—which had been disjoined and erected into a new parish quoad omnia, held that, as regarded the lands and barony of K, the valuation was a cumulo valuation, and that it was not competent to look beyond the decerniture for the purpose of ascertaining the several valuation of the teinds of D and E.

Teinds—Cumulo valuation—Disjunction quoad omnia of part of lands—Surplus teind.—The teinds of the lands of K, in the parish of X, comprehending the lands of A, B, C, D, and E, with the pertinents, were valued in cumulo. D and E were afterwards disjoined, and erected into the parish of Y quoad omnia. In the locality of Y the teinds of D and E, as ascertained for the purposes of the locality, from data contained in the extract of the old decree of valuation, without process of division of the cumulo valuation, were exhausted. In consequence of the stipend having been modified in a year when the fiars' prices were abnormally low, the heritor's subsequent payments from these teinds to the minister of Y considerably exceeded the valued teind on which the locality proceeded. He continued, however, to pay without surrendering to the minister of Y. In the parish of X, on the assumption that the teinds of the lands of A, B, and C were severally ascertained on the same basis, there was surplus teind. Held that the valuation of the teinds of the lands of K being a cumulo valuation, and no formal process of division having been brought, the titular was only entitled to claim surplus teind from the whole lands of K, after deducting the stipend paid in both the parishes of X and Y, and was not entitled to claim the surplus teind of the lands of A, B, and C, parts of the lands of K remaining in the parish of X, after deducting only the stipend paid to the minister of the parish of X.

1st Division.
Lord Fraser.
M.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, on behalf of Her Majesty's Commissioners of Woods, Forests, &c., raised this action against Patrick Stirling of Kippendavie, to recover the sum of £91, 17s. $5\frac{2}{12}$d., as surplus teinds for the years 1853 to 1881 of the lands of Easter and Wester Kinbuck, Mill of Kinbuck, Craigton, and Whitestone, in the parish of Dunblane, of which the Crown, as coming in place of the Bishop of Dunblane, was titular.

Mr Stirling admitted a surplus on these years of £18, 18s. 2d., but quoad ultra resisted the demand.

The lands above mentioned, the teinds of which were in question, were part of the barony of Kinbuck, and in 1773 the lands and barony of Kinbuck, comprehending the lands of Corscaplie, Nether Cambushinnie, Craigtoun, Wester Kinbuck, Easter Kinbuck, Whitestoun, and Middle Cambushinnie, with the pertinents lying in the parish of Dunblane, were valued, stock and teind, at £157, 6s. $0\frac{4}{12}$d. sterling, the fifth part whereof, being £31, 9s. $2\frac{5}{12}$d., was declared to be teind, parsonage and vicarage. Prior to 1853 the barony of Kinbuck was wholly situated in the parish of Dunblane, and was localled on for the stipend of the minister of Dunbane. In 1853 parts of Muthill, Dunblane, and Blackford parishes were disjoined quoad omnia, and erected into the parish of Ardoch, and it was provided that the old stipend derived from the lands disjoined should continue to be paid to the ministers of the three parishes as before, and that the remaining portion of the teinds of these lands only should be localled on for the stipend of the minister of the new parish. Part of the barony of Kinbuck thereafter fell within the boundaries of the new parish of Ardoch, and was clearly defined, although there was nothing in the decree of disjunction to identify the portion disjoined with any of the lands enumerated in the decree of valuation. In the subsequent locality of Ardoch the teinds were dealt with on the footing that the disjoined lands were Nether and Middle Cambushinnie, including Andrew Eddie's croft,

No. 79.

—

Feb. 10, 1888.
Lord Advocate v. Stirling.

and stipend was localled and paid accordingly. There were assumed to be data within the decree of valuation for ascertaining the teinds of the several lands comprising the barony of Kinbuck, and on these data the free teind of the two Cambushinnies was ascertained to be £5, 15s. $4\frac{6}{10}$d. Following the statutory procedure, this amount of free teind was converted into victual, as follows:—

MEAL.					BARLEY.
B.	F.	P.	L,		B.	F.	P.	L.
3	1	1	$0\frac{4}{8}$	and	3	1	1	$0\frac{4}{8}$

The whole of this victual was then allocated as stipend to the minister of Ardoch, and the teinds were thus exhausted. The victual stipend thus allocated was reconverted year by year according to the fiars' prices, and paid by Mr Stirling to the minister of Ardoch. It happened that in the year 1853, when the allocation was made, the fiars' prices were abnormally low; accordingly the victual conversion of the free teind was abnormally large. The fiars' prices from 1853 to 1881 were on the average considerably higher than those of 1853, and therefore the stipend actually paid by Mr Stirling to the minister of Ardoch, on reconversion year by year of the victual stipend into money, exceeded the valued free teind.

The claim of the Crown was stated on the footing that the teinds of Mr Stirling's lands remaining in the parish of Dunblane after disjunction were bound to bear only the stipend of the minister of Dunblane, and that the surplus teind was due to the Crown, without deduction for any excess of payments, which Mr Stirling might have made from the teinds of his lands disjoined from Dunblane and erected into the parish of Ardoch, and from which excess he might have got relief by surrendering his teinds to the minister. On this footing the sum claimed by the Crown was admittedly due.

Mr Stirling maintained his right in accounting with the Crown to have his teind both in Dunblane and Ardoch stated as a cumulo sum, and his full payments for stipend both in Dunblane and Ardoch deducted from it. On this footing the surplus teind was the £18, 18s. 2d. admitted by him.

The decree of approbation and valuation of 3d February 1773, so far as applicable to the teinds of the barony of Kinbuck, was as follows:—(After a narrative of the summons and procedure given in extenso, as was usual in extracts of decrees of that date)—"The Lords of Council and Session, commissioners aforesaid, have ratified, allowed, and approved, and hereby, &c., the reports of the subcommissioners of the Presbyteries of Muthill and Dunkeld, in so far as concerns the valuation of the pursuers, their respective lands libelled, lying in the parishes of Muthill, &c., . . . and have interponed, and hereby, &c., their decreet and authority thereto, and in terms thereof have found and declared, and hereby, &c., the just worth and constant yearly avail of the pursuers their respective lands libelled, in stock and teind, parsonage and vicarage, to be now, and in all time coming, the particular quantities of victual and sums of money following, viz., the lands following, pertaining at the time of the valuation to the Earl of Perth, now annexed to the Crown, lying in the parish of Comrie and shire of Perth, to wit: . . . And the rent, stock, and teind of the lands and barony of Kinbuck, comprehending the lands of Corsecaple, Nether Cambushinnie, Craigtoun, Wester Kinbuck, Easter Kinbuck, Whitestoun, and Middle Cambushinnie, with the pertinents, lying in the parish of Dunblane, £157, 6s. $0\frac{4}{12}$d. sterling; the fifth part whereof, being £31, 9s. $2\frac{5}{12}$d. money foresaid, they declare to be teind, parsonage and vicarage; which quantities of victual of the qualities foresaid and sums of money above set down the said Lords decern and ordain to stand, continue, and endure, and to be repute and holden the just worth and constant yearly avail of the stock and teind, parsonage and vicarage, of the said pursuers their respective lands above mentioned in all time coming: . . . The amount of this probation is that the yearly rent, stock, and teind of the pursuers, their respective lands libelled, lying in the parishes after mentioned, extended to the particular sums of money following, viz.: . . . The rent, stock, and teind of their lands, lying in the parish of Dunblane (after deduction of the annual rent of money advanced by the pursuers for enclosing, the rents of the mill of Kinbuck, and of a cot-house, and the rents of several pieces of grounds now planted with firs and bearing no rent), £157, 6s. $0\frac{4}{12}$d. sterling; the fifth part whereof, for teind, parsonage and vicarage, is £31, 9s. $2\frac{5}{12}$d. money foresaid: All conform to a particular scheme thereof, signed by the Lord Ordinary of that date, with the which the Lord Ordinary made avizandum to the Lords, as a report duly subscribed by the said Lord Alva, Ordinary, extant in process bears: Follows the scheme to which the foregoing prepared state relates—scheme of the valuation of the lands and estate of Perth, belonging to the commissioners of annexed estates lying in the parishes of Callander, Port Killin, Balquidder, Struan, and Dunblane. . . .

No. 79.
Feb. 10, 1888.
Lord Advocate v. Stirling.

"Parish of Dunblane.—Lands and barony of Kinbuck, comprehending the lands following, viz.:—That part of the lands of Corsecaple possest by James Dunn, £16, 17s. 10d. of money rent, £8, 2s. 8d. of @rent of money advanced by the commissioners; that part thereof possest by James Dawson, £16, 17s. 10d. of money, £5, 12s. @rent of money advanced; that part of Nether Cambusshinnie possest by John Graham, £8, 1s. 6d. of money rent, 9s. $0\frac{4}{12}$d. of minister's stipend, 18s. 6d. of money advanced; that part thereof possest by James Dow, £8, 1s. 6d. of money rent, 9s. $0\frac{4}{12}$d. of minister's stipend, £1, 9s. of money advanced; that part thereof possest by William Finlayson, £8, 1s. 6d. of money rent, 9s. $0\frac{4}{12}$d. of minister's stipend, 16s. of @rent of money advanced; that part thereof possest by John Reid, £4, 0s. 9d. of money rent, 4s. $6\frac{2}{12}$d. of minister's stipend, 10s. money advanced; that part thereof possest by James Reid, £4, 0s. 9d. of money rent, 4s. $6\frac{2}{12}$d. of minister's stipend, 10s. of @rent of money advanced; the lands of Craigtoun and Limestone Quarry, possest by Alexander Cairns, £11, 3s. 8d. of money rent, 6s. 8d. of minister's stipend, £1, 6s. @rent of money advanced; that part of the lands of Wester Kinbuck possest by George Miller, £6, 13s. 4d. of money rent, 6s. 8d. of minister's stipend, £2, 4s. @rent of money advanced; that part thereof possest by James Paterson, £6, 13s. 4d. of money rent, 6s. 8d. of minister's stipend, £1, 18s. @rent of money advanced; the mill of Kinbuck, possest by George Miller and James Paterson, £3 money rent; that part of the lands of Whitestoun possest by John Reid, £7, 15s. 10d. of money rent, 8s. 4d. of minister's stipend, £1, 16s. @rent of money advanced; that part thereof possest by John Dawson, £7, 15s. 10d. of money rent, 8s. 4d. of minister's stipend, £2, 10s. @rent of money advanced; that part thereof possest by James Dawson, £7, 15s. 10d. of money rent, 8s. 4d. of minister's stipend, £1, 11s. @rent of money advanced; that part of the lands of Easter Kinbuck possest by Henry Stirling, £6, 13s. 4d. of money rent, 6s. 8d. of minister's stipend, £1, 19s. @rent of money advanced; that part thereof possest by James Paterson, £6, 13s. 4d. of money rent, 6s. 8d. of minister's stipend, £2, 3s. @rent of money advanced; that part of the lands of Middle Cambushinnie possest by Patrick Meiklejohn, £14, 3s. of money rent, 17s. 6d. of minister's stipend, £3, 18s. 6d. @rent of money advanced; that part thereof possest by John M'Ewan, £7, 1s. 6d. of money rent, 8s. 9d. of minister's stipend,

No. 79.
—
Feb. 10, 1888.
Lord Advocate v. Stirling.

£1, 8s. 6d. @rent of money advanced; that part thereof possest by Matthew Stirling, £7, 1s. 6d. of money rent, 8s. 9d. of minister's stipend, £1, 7s. 6d. @rent of money advanced; that piece of ground and cottary possest by Andrew Eddie, £1, 2s. 4d. of money rent. Sum is £159, 14s. 6d. sterling of money rent, £6, 9s. $5\frac{4}{12}$d. sterling of minister's stipend, and £39, 19s. 8d. sterling @rent of money advanced by the commissioners. Money rent as above, £159, 14s. 6d., minister's stipend, £6, 9s. $5\frac{4}{12}$d., @rent of money advanced by the commissioners, £39, 19s. 8d. Gross rent is £206, 3s. $7\frac{4}{12}$d. Deductions.—the @rent of money advanced by the pursuers towards enclosing, £39, 19s. 8d. The rent of the mill of Kinbuck, £3. The rent of the house possest by Andrew Eddie, cottar, 3s. 4d. The rent of the following pieces of ground taken from the tenants aftermentioned, and planted—that part of Henry Stirling's possession of Easter Kinbuck, £2, 17s.; that part of Widow Paterson's possession thereof, £1, 15s. 7d.; that part of John Dawson's possession of Whitestoun, £1, 2s.—Together, £5, 14s. 7d. Total deductions, £48, 17s. 7d.—Remains of free rent £157, 6s. $0\frac{4}{12}$d.; the fifth part whereof for teind, parsonage and vicarage, is £31, 9s. $2\frac{5}{12}$d. sterling." *

---

* Of the state for teind of the parish of Dunblane embodied in the above excerpt from decree of approbation and valuation, the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Woods and Forests laid before the Court an analysis, concluding with the following summary:—

	Rent.	Interest on Money Advanced.	Stipend.
Corsecaplie, ...	£33 15 8	£13 14 8	...
Nether Cambushinnie, .	32 6 0	4 3 6	£1 16 1^4
Craigtoun,.	11 3 8	1 6 0	0 6 8
Wester Kinbuck, . .	13 6 8	4 2 0	0 13 4
Mill of Kinbuck, . .	3 0 0	...	...
Whitestoun, . . .	23 7 6	5 17 0	1 5 0
Easter Kinbuck, . .	13 6 8	4 2 0	0 13 4
Middle Cambushinnie, .	28 6 0	6 14 6	1 15 0
Eddie's Ground and Cottary,	1 2 4	...	...
	£159 14 6	£39 19 8	£6 9 5^4

" RESULT.

" Total money rent, ...			£159 14 6
„ annual rent of money advanced,. . .			39 19 8
„ minister's stipend, ...			6 9 5^4
Gross rent, ...			£206 3 7^4
" Deductions,—
Annual rent of money advanced, .		£39 19 8
Rent of Mill of Kinbuck, . .		3 0 0
Rent of house (Andrew Eddie), .		0 3 4
Rent of part of East Kinbuck, planted (Henry Stirling), .	£2 17 0
Ditto (Widow Paterson),	1 15 7
Rent of part of Whitestoun, planted (John Dawson),	1 2 0
		5 14 7
			48 17 7
" Remains of free rent, ...			£157 6 0^4
" One-fifth whereof for teind, ...			£31 9 $2\frac{5}{12}$"

No. 79.

Feb. 10, 1888.
Lord Advocate v. Stirling.

The questions upon which the decision of the case depended were (1) whether this valuation was a cumulo or a several valuation of the teinds of the lands and barony of Kinbuck; and (2) whether, assuming the valuation to be in form a cumulo valuation, it was not also a several valuation, or, at anyrate, afforded materials for ascertaining the teind of the several parcels of land comprised in the cumulo valuation.

The Crown founded upon the manner in which the decree had been made use of by the defender himself in connection with the preparation of the scheme of locality of Ardoch Parish.

The defender's free teind in Ardoch had been thus ascertained:—

The cumulo teind of the lands and barony of Kinbuck, as per valuation, was	£31	9	$2\frac{6}{12}$
Deduct for the lands of Corsecaplie, sold by the defender's predecessor, one-fifth of £33, 15s. 8d., being rent, as per state embodied in valuation,*	6	15	$1\frac{6}{10}$
Remains as teind of lands still belonging to defender,	£24	14	$0\frac{9}{10}$

In the Dunblane locality of 1860-62 the defender stated the teinds of his lands of Cambushinnie as £13, 0s. $5\frac{2}{10}$d., and of his lands of Kinbuck as £11, 13s. $7\frac{7}{10}$d. The teind so stated as the teind of Cambushinnie was arrived at by taking from the state embodied in the decree of valuation.*

Nether Cambushinnie, rent, . . .				£32	6	0
Stipend, . . .				1	16	$1\frac{4}{12}$
Middle Cambushinnie, rent, . . .				28	6	0
Stipend, . . .				1	15	0
Eddie's ground and cottary, .	£1	2	4
Less rent of house, . .	0	3	4
				0	19	0
				£65	2	$1\frac{4}{12}$
One-fifth whereof for teind was, as above, .				13	0	$5\frac{2}{10}$

And the teind so stated as the teind of Kinbuck was similarly arrived at by taking from the said state one-fifth of the rent and stipend of Craigton, Wester Kinbuck, Mill of Kinbuck, Whitestoun, and Easter Kinbuck, and giving effect to the deductions specified in the state.

The teind so stated as the teind of Cambushinnie and Kinbuck, when added together made up the total teind of the lands still belonging to the defender, as stated above, £24, 14s. $0\frac{9}{10}$d.

Proceeding on these data, the rectified state of teinds in the Dunblane locality of 1860-62 shewed as old stipend payable to the minister of

		B.	F.	P.	L.
Dunblane for the Cambushinnies, . .	Barley,	4	0	2	$1\frac{1}{8}$
	Meal,	4	0	1	$1\frac{2}{10}$

Turning to the locality of Ardoch, the re-rectified state of teinds shewed teinds of Cambushinnie, ... £13 0 $5\frac{2}{10}$

Deduct old stipend to Dunblane—

Victual.					Money Conversion.
Barley,	4	0	2	$1\frac{1}{8}$	£3	19	$10\frac{9}{10}$
Meal,	4	0	1	$1\frac{2}{10}$	3	5	$1\frac{5}{10}$
								7	5	$0\frac{4}{10}$
					Balance, being free teind,			£5	15	$4\frac{8}{10}$

---

* Vide Analysis, p. 428, note.

No. 79.
—
Feb. 10, 1888.
Lord Advocate
v. Stirling.

This amount of free teind so ascertained was for the purposes of the locality of Ardoch reconverted into victual in terms of the statute, at the fiars prices of 1853, and gave

BARLEY.				MEAL.
B.	F.	P.	L.	B.	F.	P.	L.
3	1	1	0$\frac{4}{8}$	3	1	1	0$\frac{4}{8}$

and this amount was localled as stipend to the minister of Ardoch, thus exhausting the teind of the defender's lands in the parish of Ardoch.

It was the reconversion of this victual stipend at the higher fiars price of the years subsequent to 1853 which caused the defender to pay to the minister of Ardoch more than his £5, 15s. 4d. of free teind in that parish. The defender had not surrendered his teind in the parish of Ardoch.

The Lord Ordinary (Fraser), on 23d June 1887, decerned against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

---

* "OPINION.— . . . The whole of the teinds of the parish of Ardoch are exhausted, and there is no surplus payable to the titular (the Crown); but it is averred that there is a surplus of teinds in the parish of Dunblane, which the Crown now claim under this action. The defender produces a state whereby he shews that, combining the payments which he has made of ministers' stipend to the two ministers of Ardoch and Dunblane from the year 1853 down to 1881, he has paid of valued teind the whole amount that could be claimed, with the exception of £18, 18s. 2d., which he offered to pay to the Crown before this action was raised, and which he is still willing to pay.

"According to the rectified state of teinds of the parish of Ardoch, after paying the old stipend to Dunblane, the balance amounted to £5, 15s. 4$^{6}/_{10}$d. Now, the Act of Parliament, 48 Geo. III., cap. 138, sec. 8, enacts that 'every stipend which shall be augmented after the passing of this Act shall be wholly modified in grain or victual, even although part or the whole thereof shall have been previously modified in money.' Therefore in the year 1853 the £5, 15s. 4$^{6}/_{10}$d. required to be converted into grain or victual, and it was so converted, and at that time the fiars prices happened to be very low. The conversion was into 3 b. 1 f. 1 p. 0$^{4}/_{8}$ l. of meal, and 3 b. 1 f. 1 p. 0$^{4}/_{8}$ l. of barley. This grain upon being reconverted into money according to the fiars' prices of each year of payment (which is the measure of the minister's right), exceeded the free teind of £5, 15s. 4$^{6}/_{10}$d. applicable to Ardoch, seeing that these fiars prices were higher during every year than they were in 1853, and consequently the defender has been overpaying to the minister of Ardoch more than the free teind.

"He naturally now desires to have this matter adjusted, and the mode that he proposes is to slump together the payments that he has made for stipend of the two parishes of Dunblane and Ardoch, and to deduct the combined sum from the valued teind of the whole barony. This is resisted by the Crown upon the ground that the two parishes are perfectly distinct; the valuations of the lands in both, it is said, are distinct and separate, and the only remedy that the defender has against being called upon to make overpayments is to surrender his teinds to the minister.

"Now, this question depends upon the construction to be put upon the decree of approbation and valuation of 1773. The pursuer contends that that decree contains a valuation of each separate portion of land composing the barony of Kinbuck, and therefore that each separate portion must be looked to by itself, and its teinds dealt with accordingly. On the other hand, the defender maintains that the valuation is a cumulo valuation, and as there has been no division of the valuation, his mode of stating the principle of accounting is correct. It is laid down by Connell as follows:—'In valuing teinds, whole estates, or several parcels of land belonging to the same landholder, were generally estimated by a cumulo valuation; and when the lands which have been valued together come to be divided among different proprietors it becomes necessary to proportion the cumulo valuation of the tithes among the different parcels of land, and this is done by a suit before the Commissioners of Teinds'

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary had not the advantage of seeing the decree of valuation in Macvicar v. Tweedie,[1] and

---

(1 Connell on Tithes, p. 221). Undoubtedly there has been no division under any suit before the Commissioners, and therefore, if this be a cumulo valuation, the law, as laid down in the case of Macvicar v. Tweedie (12th July 1866, 4 Macph. 1058) will apply. The rubric of that case is in the following terms:—'In a process of locality a heritor lodged a minute of surrender of his teinds. In the decree of valuation on which he founded, the teinds of his lands and of lands not belonging to him, and in part situated in a different parish, were valued in cumulo. The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Barcaple) refused to sustain the surrender, in respect the amount of the heritor's teind was not ascertained by the decree of valuation founded on, and could not be ascertained without a process of division of the cumulo valuation contained in said decree of valuation.' There is no authority, so far as the Lord Ordinary can see, defining what is to be held as a cumulo valuation. The extract decree is a very long document, and requires to be carefully considered. It narrates the whole of the proceedings in the action, as was the usual practice at its date. The first material part that needs to be referred to is where the Court interponed authority to the reports of the subcommissioners, and 'found and declared, and hereby,' &c."—(His Lordship quoted the decerniture as printed supra, p. 426.) "Then follows the 'scheme of the valuation,' and it is in this scheme that there is found the particular values put upon the specific portions of land constituting the barony of Kinbuck, and it is from what is to be found in this scheme that the pursuer derives support for his contention. In regard to the parish of Dunblane the extract decree thus proceeds:—'Parish of Dunblane.—The lands and barony of Kinbuck, comprehending the lands following, viz.'"—(His Lordship then quoted the scheme of valuation as printed supra, p. 427.) "Then the decree narrates that the Court having taken the scheme into consideration, 'found and declared the just worth and constant yearly avail of the pursuers' lands libelled, in stock and teind, parsonage and vicarage, to be then and in all time coming the particular sums of money following, viz.: . . . And the rent, stock, and teind of their lands lying in the parish of Dunblane £157, 6s. $0^4/_{12}$d. sterling. The fifth part whereof, being £31, 9s. $2^5/_{12}$d. money foresaid, they declared to be teind, parsonage and vicarage, and decerned in the valuation accordingly.'

"It is in these circumstances that the Court is required to decide whether the present case comes within the rule laid down in Macvicar v. Tweedie. Is this a cumulo valuation entitling the defender to say that there are no materials for separating the teinds of the lands which were disjoined from Dunblane and annexed to the new parish of Ardoch, and that consequently he is entitled to blend together the payments that he has made to both ministers? The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that this contention is not well founded. In the case of Macvicar v. Tweedie a number of lands were joined together, and the teinds were valued together, and the separate valuation of each was not ascertained by the Court, but only by minute of agreement between the parties to whom the separate lands were conveyed. The correctness of this agreement was denied. The facts appear more particularly in the report in the Jurist (vol. xxxviii. p. 590), but still more clearly in the Session Papers which the Lord Ordinary has examined. Now, that is not the case with reference to the circumstances with which we have here to deal. Every portion of the teinds of the lands that were annexed to Ardoch was separately valued. No doubt in the final judgment of the Court the whole of the separate valuations of the particular teinds are added up, and the total is declared to be the value of the teinds of the barony of Kinbuck; but this does not take away anything from the fact that we have got a valuation of the teinds of each portion of the barony. That valuation so standing, the defender is entitled to surrender his teinds to the [1] Macvicar v. Tweedie (Parish of Manor), July 12, 1866, 4 Macph. 1058, 38 Scot. Jur. 590.

---

No. 79.
—
Feb. 10, 1888.
Lord Advocate v. Stirling.

had fallen into error in thinking that the circumstances in that case were different from those in the present, and that the judgment in that case did not rule the present. An examination of the decree of valuation in that case, production of which had now been obtained,* shewed that with a little calculation it was just as possible as in the present to approximate to the teind of the several parcels of land, and just as impossible to ascertain it with absolute accuracy. If the cothouses disturbed the calculation in the one case, Andrew Eddie's croft did so equally in the other. Quomodo constat, as alleged by the Crown, that Andrew Eddie's croft was part of the Cambushinnies or was in the parish of Ardoch? Indeed, quomodo constat that the Cambushinnies themselves were in Ardoch? For the purpose of the locality it had been assumed that they were. But the minister of Dunblane had a word to say to that. There was at present plenty of surplus teind in Dunblane and he had no interest to object. But the moment his teinds were exhausted he would be entitled to open the question whether the assumption on which the localities had proceeded was correct.[1] The defender could make no surrender in Ardoch without a process of division of the cumulo teind, and in any process of division the minister of Dunblane must be called as well as the minister of Ardoch.

---

minister, and get rid of all future liability. To decide otherwise would be to elevate the formal sentence of the Court to a position which was never intended, and to ignore altogether another portion of the valuation which had reference to the several parts of which the sum total is composed.

"The result is that the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the contention of the pursuer in this case is right, and that judgment must be given for the Crown."

* The decree of valuation at the instance of Burnet of Barnes of the teinds of his lands in the parishes of Peebles and Manor, dated 16th July 1729, was as follows:—". . . The Lords of Council and Session, commissioners aforesaid, have found and declared, and hereby find and declare, the just worth and constant yearly availl of the stock and teind, parsonage and vicarage, of the pursuer's lands underwritten, to be yearly the sums of moneys and quantitys of victuall after specified, viz., his lands of Barns, Haswellsycks, two-thirds of Overglack, one quarter of Woodhouse, the lands of Hallmeadow, Templehouse, town of Mannor, two-thirds of Bonningtoun and lands of Woodgriveingtoun, £1532, 13s. 4d. Scots money, and 8 bolls meall, the fifth part whereof, being £306, 10s. 8d., and 1 boll 2 firlotts 1 peck 2 lippies and two-fifths of a lippy meall, they declare to be teind, parsonage and vicarage. Item, his lands of Glenrath, &c., . . . which sums of money above written, and quantitys of victuall above sett down of the quantity forsaid, the said Lords decerns and ordains to stand, continue, and endure, and to be requite and holden as the just worth and constant yearly availl of the stock and teind, parsonage and vicarage, of the pursuer's respective lands above written, in all time coming . . . In obedience to which remitt the said Lord Minto having considered the Act, with the depositions of the witnesses adduced by the pursuer, interloq^r circumducing the term against the defenders, and remitt, Fand that the pursuer adduced the witnesses underwritten, who deponed as follows, viz.: Imprimis John Keddie, servitor to Major Cochran, and deponed that the lands of Barns, before the present heritor took any part of it, paid and was worth £286, 13s. 4d., besides £2, 10s. paid to the minister for vicarage. Deponed that the lands of Haswellsycks pays, and may pay, £233, 6s. 8d. Scots and £2, 10s. of vicarage. That the two-thirds of Overglack pays £120 and £4 for vicarage . . . And further deponed that on the lands of Barns, Haswellsycks, Overglack, Woodhouse and Hallmeadow, Town of Mannor, and Bonningtoun, there are fourteen cotthouses upheld in timber by the heretor, and that the ordinary rate of a cotthouse in that country is from £4 to 10 merks each, causa scientiæ, the deponent possest a part of the lands for many years, was assisting to Barns in getting tenants, was present at setting the lands and uplifting the rents . . ."

[1] Simpson v. Ewing, &c. (Locality of Bonhill) Dec. 8, 1882, 10 R. 313.

No. 79.
Feb. 10, 1888.
Lord Advocate v. Stirling.

There was nothing therefore to distinguish the present case from that of Macvicar v. Tweedie. The valuation was a cumulo valuation, notwithstanding that the details were, as was usual in extracts of old decrees, given with great fulness, and shewed, as the process itself if examined would have shewn, how the cumulo valuation had been arrived at. It was not competent to use these details as a shorthand method of arriving at a division without calling the parties who were entitled to be represented in a process of division.

Argued for the Crown;—(1) A titular was entitled (unless the heritor had a heritable right to his teinds, or there was some other exceptional circumstance) to the whole teind under burden of the minister's stipend. The heritor might plead as set-off what he had paid to the minister, but only what he had properly paid. Now, in Ardoch the defender's teinds were exhausted, and he had gone on nevertheless paying in excess. But he could not plead that against the Crown as titular. The Crown was not responsible. The defender could have surrendered had he pleased and brought to an end the excess payments. But he had not chosen to do so, he had chosen rather to do what, if his contention were to be given effect to, was in effect to pay part of the free teind belonging to the Crown in the parish of Dunblane to the minister of Ardoch. And on the same ground he must be entitled to continue to do so, for the Crown could neither surrender for him, nor compel him to surrender. (2) It was maintained that as there had been no process of division of the cumulo valued teind[1] of the defender's lands, it was impossible to ascertain with any certainty what proportion of the defender's teind was payable in Ardoch and what proportion in Dunblane. But the defender was barred in a question with the Crown as titular from stating this plea. The minister of Ardoch, or the minister of Dunblane, were the case the same as that of Macvicar v. Tweedie, supra, which it was not, might possibly have done so, and put the defender to raise a process of division. But the defender had found no difficulty either in the locality of Dunblane or in that of Ardoch in dividing his teind, the material for doing so being contained in the valuation of 1771. That having been done in a process of locality to which the Crown was a party, the defender could not now turn round and refuse to be bound by that division so long as that locality lasted. Here again the defender's contention would enable him to prevent at will the Crown obtaining the surplus revenue which was due from the teinds of the parish of Dunblane, for as the Crown as titular could not surrender on behalf of the defender, neither could it bring an action of division.[2] (3) But the case was not the same as Macvicar v. Tweedie, supra. From the report and session papers in the case it was not clear how far the decree of valuation had been before the Court, nor did it appear what the grounds of judgment were. But the defender had recovered and produced the decree of valuation in this process, and it would be seen that it differed materially from that of the parish of Dunblane. In the first place, instead of proceeding upon and approving a prepared state reported by the Lord Ordinary in which the separate rent and separate deductions of every parcel of land were entered, the decree in the Manor case proceeded upon the mere evidence of the witnesses. In the second place, on the lands valued there were fourteen cothouses which were neither distinctly valued for deduction, nor localised on any one or more of the particular parcels of land. This alone made it impossible to interpret the evidence on which the decree proceeded as separately valuing the separate parcels. But in the Dunblane case, not only was it unnecessary to go back upon the evidence, but the prepared state on which the decree proceeded was free from all such disturbing elements as the cothouses in the Manor valuation. Much had been made of the entry "that piece of ground and cottary possest by Andrew Eddie, £1, 2s. 4d. of money rent." And it was attempted to make out that it was in the same position as the cothouses in the Manor case. But the prepared state (p. 428) shewed that it was as much a separate subject as Corscaplie or Kinbuck. The rent of £1, 2s. 4d. was given and the deduction of 3s. 4d. for the house was given, and the balance of 19s. was the teindable rental. That its whereabouts was uncertain was also pleaded. But that it was in the parish of Ardoch the defender admitted when he stated his teind in the localities of Dunblane and Ardoch, for the rental of the two Cambushinnies alone was short by 19s. of the sum on which the defender allowed himself to be localled in Ardoch. The difference between the prepared state in the case of Dunblane and the evidence in the case of Manor was that in the former case every deduction as well as every rent was applicable to a definite separate subject, while in the latter it was not. In fact there could be no doubt that the real valuation in the Dunblane case was in the Lord Ordinary's prepared state, and that what was called the grand decerniture was merely an arithmetical result deduced from that valuation and stated in words. To such a case the decision in Macvicar v. Tweedie did not apply, and a separate process of valuation was not required.

---

[1] Connell, i. 221-2; Campbell v. Maclachlan, Feb. 6, 1822, Shaw's Teind Ca. 19.

[2] Juridical Styles, 2d edit. vol. iii. 483; University of Glasgow v. Pollock, May 27, 1868, 6 Macph. 878, L. J.-C. Patton at p. 882, Lord Cowan at p. 883.

At advising,—

Lord Adam.—The Crown is titular of the teinds of the lands and barony of Kinbuck. The barony comprehends the lands of Corscaplie, Nether Cambushinnie, Craigtoun, Wester Kinbuck, Easter Kinbuck, Whitestoun, and Middle Cambushinnie. These lands in 1853 belonged to the defender's predecessor with the exception of Corscaplie, which had been previously sold, and they all lay in the parish of Dunblane.

In that year a summons of disjunction and erection was instituted for the purpose of having a new parish erected out of the parishes of Muthill, Dunblane, and Blackford, and in this action decree was pronounced in 1855, by which the parish of Ardoch was erected into a parish quoad omnia, on the footing that the ministers of these three parishes should respectively continue to draw the stipends from the disjoined lands which they drew at the date of disjunction.

The lands of Cambushinnie were by the decree disjoined from the parish of Dunblane and included in the parish of Ardoch. The teinds of these lands were consequently liable for the stipends of the ministers of both parishes, and have been since localled on accordingly.

By decree of valuation, dated 3d February 1773, the lands and barony of Kinbuck comprehending as aforesaid the lands of Corscaplie, Nether Cambushinnie, Craigtoun, Wester Kinbuck, Easter Kinbuck, Whitestoun, and Middle Cambushinnie, with the pertinents, were valued at £157, 6s. $0\frac{4}{12}$d., one-fifth whereof being £31, 9s. $2\frac{5}{12}$d. was declared to be teind.

The Crown as titular of the teinds of Craigtoun, Easter and Wester Kinbuck, and Whitestoun, being the parts of the barony belonging to the defender still remaining in the parish of Dunblane, now sues for a sum of £91, 17s. $5\frac{2}{12}$d. which is alleged to be the surplus teind of these lands, after deduction of the stipend paid to the minister, for crops and years from 1853 to 1881 inclusive.

No. 79.

Feb. 10, 1888.
Lord Advocate v. Stirling.

It is averred by the Crown that these lands were severally valued by the decree of valuation, and that the sum sued for is the amount of surplus teind due by the defender, after deducting the amount paid to the minister from the amount of the several valuations of the lands.

The defender denies that these lands were severally valued. He maintains that all the lands comprehended in the barony were valued in cumulo, that, consequently, he is entitled to bring into the account the stipend paid by him out of the lands of Cambushinnie, now in the parish of Ardoch; that the whole sum paid by him in both parishes should be deducted from the amount of the cumulo valuations, and that, if this be done, the surplus teind amounts to the sum of £18, 18s. 2d. only, which he offers to pay to the Crown.

There is no question of figures at issue between the parties. If the pursuer is right in his contention, then the amount sued for is due; if he is not right, then the sum offered by the defender is the proper amount.

The question therefore at issue between the parties is, whether the defender's lands in the parishes of Dunblane and Ardoch have been valued severally or in cumulo by the decree of valuation?

The Lord Ordinary quite correctly says that this depends upon the construction of the decree of valuation, and, so construing it, he comes to the conclusion that the lands have been severally valued. I cannot agree with him in this conclusion, for I think it is quite clear that the several lands comprehended in the barony have been valued in cumulo.

The decree of valuation has been produced, and, as was generally or uniformly the case in these old valuations, it proceeds by setting out and narrating at length the summons and its conclusions, and then the decerniture follows. I may here mention that it is both a decree of approbation and of valuation, because some of the lands included in it had been previously valued by the Sub-Commissioners, and these lands are set forth, but it appears that other lands included in the decree had never been valued, and the lands in question,—the barony of Kinbuck,—were in the latter position, and therefore, as regards these lands, it was a valuation for the first time. After narrating the summons, the extract goes on as follows:—"The Lords of Council and Session, . . . have found and declared, and hereby find and declare . . . the just worth and constant yearly avail of the pursuers their respective 'lands libelled in stock and teind, parsonage and vicarage, to be now and in all time coming the particular quantities of victual and sums of money following, viz., the lands following, pertaining at the time of the valuation to the Earl of Perth, now annexed to the Crown, lying in the parish of Comrie and shire of Perth, to wit . . . and the rent, stock and teind, of the lands and barony of Kinbuck, comprehending the lands of Corsecaple, Nether Cambushinnie, Craigtoun, Wester Kinbuck, Easter Kinbuck, Whitestoun, and Middle Cambushinnie, with the pertinents lying in the parish of Dunblane, £157, 6s. $0\frac{4}{12}$d. sterling, the fifth part whereof, being £31, 9s. $2\frac{4}{12}$d. money foresaid, they declare to be teind, parsonage and vicarage, which quantities of victual, of the qualities aforesaid, and sums of money above set down, the said Lords decern and ordain to stand, continue, and endure, and to be repute and holden the just worth and constant yearly avail of the stock and teind, parsonage and vicarage, of the said pursuers their respective lands above mentioned in all time coming. . . ."

Now, that is the decerniture, and the only decerniture, with reference to the teinds of the lands in question, to be found in the extract, and that, in my humble opinion, constitutes a decree of valuation of these lands, and is the decree of valuation of these lands. And if that be so, it is quite clear that that is a cumulo valuation of these lands. There is no valuation of each separate subject, but the whole is valued at one sum of £157, 6s. $0\frac{4}{12}$d.—£31, 9s. $2\frac{5}{12}$d. of that being the teind thereof. I have no doubt that, if you were to send to-morrow for an extract of this decree under the forms of extract now in use, you would get an extract of this decerniture and nothing else. That is all you would get.

But, according to the old form of these extracts, this extract goes on to set out the whole procedure in the case, and the materials on which the Court proceeded in pronouncing their decree. The pursuer was allowed a proof of the value of his lands, and he led proof accordingly, and after the proof was reported to the Court, the Court in the usual form pronounced an interlocutor on 17th June 1772, remitting to Lord Alva to prepare the cause. That was not a remit to the Lord Ordinary empowering him to decide anything in the cause; it was merely a remit to prepare the cause, and accordingly the process goes to the Lord Ordinary, who prepares a scheme of valuation, and it is this scheme which the Lord Ordinary holds to be a decree of valuation of the several subjects embraced in it. But that is in my humble opinion not in the least the character of this scheme. No doubt upon reading that scheme, which is printed in the print of documents for the Lord Advocate, you do find all the different subjects set forth separately or severally, and you do find the values of them opposite each respective subject, and you also find the whole summed up. But this scheme is nothing but a summary of the proof. That is all that it is, and it is prepared by the Lord Ordinary, in terms of the remit to him, to assist the Court in coming to a conclusion and to enable them to pronounce their decree of valuation. That is the nature of the scheme, and accordingly Lord Alva does not find that the sums set forth in it are valuations of the teinds of the respective lands; there is nothing of that sort. What he does is that he makes avizandum with the scheme to the Lords. And accordingly the scheme being before the Lords, they consider it, and they pronounce the decree of valuation which we now have here.

Now, if that is the nature of this scheme, it is of course not a decree of valuation at all; and it is perhaps worthy of observation that in pronouncing decree the Lords did not follow in terminis this scheme. You will see that by this scheme, as is very plainly shewn in the analysis of it prepared by the pursuer, the whole lands are separately set forth and the values set against them respectively; now, there is therein set forth, as a distinct and separate subject, a piece of ground belonging to Andrew Eddie, with a rent amounting to £1, 2s. 4d., and deducting from that the sum of 3s. 4d. set forth as the rent of Eddie's house, there is left 19s. as the rent of this separate subject. But you will observe that that sum of 19s. is included in the £157 making up the value of the barony; but when you come to look at the decree of valuation you do not find this piece of ground belonging to Andrew Eddie valued as a separate subject. It is only valued as a pertinent, and the result of that is simply this, that nobody now knows or can tell where this piece of ground of Andrew Eddie worth 19s. now is. Nobody knows in what parish it is. Nobody can tell that, and if that be so, it will be observed that that puts this case in exactly the same position as in the case of Macvicar, because in that case nobody knew where the fourteen cothouses there in question were, and nobody could tell the value of the particular subjects. It is exactly the same here. Nobody knows where this piece of ground of Andrew Eddie is, or whether it is attached to one or other of the subjects. I mention this merely to shew that this valuation was truly a valuation in cumulo of these lands. I do not think it would have been of any consequence in this case if Andrew Eddie's piece of ground had appeared as a separate subject in the decree of valuation.

No. 79.

Feb. 10, 1888.
Lord Advocate v. Stirling.

Upon these grounds I have no hesitation in coming to the opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be reversed, and that the defender ought to be assoilzied.

LORD MURE.—I am quite satisfied with the explanations which Lord Adam has given about this decree of approbation and valuation.

It appears to me to be plain that the sum tendered by the defender in his defences is all that the Crown is entitled to, because there is no doubt of the fact that for the last twenty-five years the defender has paid away, either to the minister of Dunblane, or to the minister of Ardoch, which parish consists partly of what was at one time part of the old parish of Dunblane, the whole valued teinds of his lands, with the exception of the small amount of £18, brought out in the state referred to in his defences, and which the defender has tendered to the Crown.

The fact that the valued teind has been all paid away with the exception of this surplus of £18 is not disputed. But then it is said that this is a mistaken payment, as the payment so made to the minister of Ardoch was made out of the teinds of the defender's lands still left in the parish of Dunblane. That is the ground on which the Crown claims the sum now sued for in this action; but I agree with Lord Adam in thinking that this depends entirely upon whether the valuation is a cumulo valuation or not; and for the reasons stated by Lord Adam I think that it is a cumulo valuation, and that the defender is entitled to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion. I think this is a decree of valuation in cumulo, and nothing else.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Decern against the defender for payment to the Crown-receiver of the sum of £18, 18s. 2d. sterling: Quoad ultra assoilzie the defender from the conclusion of the summons, and decern: Find the defender entitled to expenses," &c.

DONALD BEITH, W.S.—DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—Agents.

No. 80.

Feb. 11, 1888.
Milne.

JESSIE RANKINE OR MILNE, Petitioner.—Murray.

Minor and Pupil—Aliment and education out of capital—Nobile officium.—Circumstances in which the Court allowed a mother as tutor to her pupil children to repay to herself out of the capital belonging to them a sum expended by her on their maintenance and education, and further, to take an additional sum annually until the majority of the eldest child for their maintenance and education.

2D DIVISION.
M.

IN June 1887 Miss Jessie Rankine or Milne, widow of the late Nicol Milne, residing at Blainslie, Juniper Green, Edinburgh, presented a petition to the Court stating that her husband died on the 25th day of April 1882, survived by the petitioner and by three children, viz., Robert

No. 80.
—
Feb. 11, 1888.
Milne.

Milne, born 30th March 1875, James Rankine Milne, born 12th December 1876, and Jessie Catherine Milne, born 31st March 1881, all of whom were therefore still in pupillarity, and who, upon the death of their father, became entitled to the share of residue of the estate of Miss Hunter, their father's aunt, which had been liferented by him.

That her husband had left a trust-disposition and settlement, by which he made certain provisions in favour of the petitioner and said children; but that after paying the whole debts due by him, and fulfilling the whole obligations prestable by him at his death, there only remained the reversionary interest in the house presently occupied by the petitioner and her said children at Juniper Green, which was, in terms of her said husband's settlement, liferented by the petitioner. The house in question was in course of erection at the time of Mr Nicol Milne's death, and for the purposes of its completion, and paying debts, and otherwise fulfilling the primary purposes of his settlement, it had been necessary to borrow upon the security thereof a sum of £400.

The petitioner further stated,—" One of the petitioner's children, the said Robert Milne, was last year elected a foundationer of Daniel Stewart's Institution, Edinburgh, and as such will now receive, until he is fifteen years of age, a free education, and an allowance on account of board, &c., of £20 per annum, but, with this addition, the only means available for educating and upbringing the children is their share of the residue of Miss Hunter's estate—the income from which, since the death of their father, has been about £40 per annum."

That Miss Hunter's trustee had conveyed to the petitioner as tutor to her children their share of the residue, viz.—(1st) Six shares of the Edinburgh Gas-Light Company, which had since been sold by the petitioner for the sum of £420; (2d) £168 Consolidated Preference Stock No. 1 of the Caledonian Railway Company; (3) £358, 15s. Consolidated Preference Stock No. 2 of the North British Railway Company; and (4) £120 Consolidated Lien Stock of the North British Railway Company.

" Since the date of her husband's death the petitioner has maintained the children from the interest of their said share of Miss Hunter's estate, so far as it would avail for this purpose, but she has been under the necessity of expending a considerable sum from capital belonging to herself, as she has been very desirous of affording her children as liberal an education as was within her power, and as the children advance the cost of maintenance and education is materially increased.

" Before obtaining delivery of the funds and estate already mentioned, she had expended on behalf of the children a sum of not less than £250, or at the rate of £50 per annum from the date of their father's death, in such maintenance and education, over and above the income from the children's funds. The whole income which for the future will be available from the balance of the children's funds amounts, after repayment of the advances so made by the petitioner, to not more than from £32 to £35, and as this sum is totally inadequate to meet the cost of their maintenance alone," the petitioner prayed the Court to authorise her to make repayment out of the capital held by her as tutor for her children of the advances, amounting to £250 or thereby, made by her for their maintenance and education; and further, to authorise her, out of the remaining capital, to apply towards the maintenance, education, and advancement in life of said children, or one or more of them, from time to time, such sum or sums, not exceeding in the whole in any one year the sum of £75, as may be necessary.

The Court remitted to Mr Martin, Principal Clerk of Session, to report on the petition.

No. 80.

Feb. 11, 1888.
Milne.

Mr Martin reported,—That besides the liferent of the house and furniture mentioned in the petition, which were burdened with a debt of £400, and a feu-duty of £5, 18s. 9d., "the petitioner's means consisted of an annuity of £20, which, after her husband's death, she sold for £365, 5s., and out of that sum expended the £250, of which she now claims payment. . . . These children have no means of their own except the house and furniture at Juniper Green, liferented by their mother, and a share of the residue of the estate of an aunt of their father, the income of which share is said to be about £40 per annum.

"In these circumstances it appears to me that the petitioner did not act prudently in expending £250, or rather taking into account the income of £40—£450 on her children during the five years that have elapsed since the death of her husband." The reporter, after stating the facts as to the children mentioned in the petition, continued—"The family being thus situated, I do not think that the petitioner would be warranted in expending £75 a-year on her three children. The eldest is in great part provided for for some years to come, and the others are still very young, the one being eleven and the other six years of age."

Thereafter counsel was heard on Mr Martin's report, but the Court pronounced no order, suggesting, however, to the petitioner to lodge a minute containing a particular statement of the expenditure already made by her from her own funds, and applied for the use and benefit of the children.

The petitioner lodged a minute setting forth that she had "maintained and educated her children hitherto in such manner as to fit them for earning their own livelihood when they arrive at the years of maturity. The income available did not admit of this, and she conceived that the money which she has expended, and desires for the future to expend on their behalf, could not be more judiciously applied in their interest than in affording them a comfortable home and a liberal education. To deny them these advantages when young, and place in their hands when they come of age a few hundred pounds, would—especially if they were insufficiently educated—almost certainly have other than a beneficial result.

"The petitioner possessed in her own right an annuity of £20, and this sum, together with the annual income, amounting to about £40, arising upon the estate coming to the children from Miss Hunter, formed the only means for the maintenance of the petitioner and her mother, who is an old lady entirely dependent upon her, and for the maintenance and education of the children." Further, she gave detailed statements of the expenditure for each year, from 1882 to 1887.*

"The petitioner's total expenditure on account of the children has thus been				£513	7	9
which has been met by the income derived from the children's share of Miss Hunter's estate to the extent of	£240	0	0
Carry forward,	£240	0	0	£513	7	9

---

* The year 1884 may be taken as a specimen—

"School fees and books, ...	£9	5	6
Railway season tickets, ...	5	0	0
Clothing and boots, ...	11	15	9
Medical attendance and medicine, ...	5	5	0
Proportion of servant's wages and board, . .	11	0	0
Board and proportion of feu-duty, interest, and taxes,	46	0	0
	£88	6	3"

No. 80.

Feb. 11, 1888.
Milne.

Brought forward,	£240	0	0	£513	7	9
and allowance during the last year from Daniel Stewart's Hospital for Robert Milne,	20	0	0
				260	0	0
leaving of over-expenditure, ...				£253	7	9"

This sum of £253, 7s. 9d. the petitioner "has paid out of the proceeds, amounting to £365, 5s., realised from the sale of her annuity, and as that fund forms the only source out of which the future wants of herself and her mother can be met, she has no alternative to the present application. The children have always been and still are of delicate constitution, and the expenditure upon them was absolutely necessary; and further, as already stated, the petitioner has had in view that the children will ultimately have to earn their own subsistence, and that the money now belonging to them can be best applied in giving them such an education and upbringing as will enable them efficiently to do so."

The Court then heard counsel on the report and minute.[1] In consequence of doubt being felt by the Court whether the petitioner ought to be authorised to obtain repayment of the £250, as craved in the petition, and whether the annual sum of £75 she sought authority to expend in future was not too large, considering the amount of the children's estate the petitioner lodged another minute, craving leave to amend the prayer, to the effect that she should be authorised to repay to herself the £250 in annual instalments of £50, and to expend an additional sum of £50 annually for the children till the eldest child should attain majority.

> The Court thereupon pronounced this interlocutor:—"Authorise the petitioner out of the capital funds of the estate to repay to herself the sum of £250 sterling by half-yearly instalments each of £50, commencing the first payment as at the date of this deliverance: Further authorise her to expend out of the said funds an additional sum of £50 annually for the aliment, maintenance, and education of her children, but that only until the eldest child attains majority, and decern."

Thomas Dalgleish, S.S.C., Agent.

No. 81.

Feb. 24, 1888.
Magistrates of Greenock v. Commissioners on Educational Endowments.

The Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of Greenock, First Parties.—Sir Charles Pearson—C. S. Dickson.

The Commissioners on Educational Endowments, Second Parties.—Darling—C. N. Johnston.

Trust—School—Superior and Vassal—Educational Endowments Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 59)—Scope of Act.—A superior by feu-contract sold and disponed to certain persons described as "Bailies, Treasurer, and Counsellors" of the town of Greenock, "and to their successors in office, for the purposes after mentioned," a piece of ground. The contract proceeded,—"It is hereby expressly declared and agreed to between the parties that the piece of ground is given for the sole and express purpose of building accommodations for charitable institutions." The disponees bound themselves to pay in name of feu-duty £2, 0s. 8d. yearly, "so long as the said piece of ground, with the erections made thereon, shall be used for charitable purposes. But in the event, at any future period, the said Bailies and Council shall make use of and dispose of the said ground or erections for any other purpose, then, and in that event,

---

[1] Hamilton, July 20, 1859, 21 D. 1379, 31 Scot. Jur. 760, and May 23, 1860, 22 D. 1095, 32 Scot. Jur. 497; Fraser on Parent and Child, 233.

No. 81.

Feb. 24, 1888.
Magistrates of Greenock v Commissioners on Educational Endowments.

they oblige themselves and their successors in office, in place of the feu-duty above mentioned, to pay the sum of £18, 6s. sterling of yearly feu-duty, and that at the first term of Martinmas after the said occupation, and so forth yearly thereafter in all time coming."

The ground so feued was covered with buildings which were used as charity schools, built out of burgh funds, and repaired partly out of these, and partly out of voluntary subscriptions for fifty-nine years. Thereafter, on the passing of the Education Act of 1872, the buildings were let to the school board for public schools, on payment by the board of the feu-duty of £2, 0s. 8d. In 1884 the Caledonian Railway Company took the ground under compulsory powers, according to the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 19), paying the sum of £8494, 4s., being the value of the subjects under deduction of the capitalised value of the feu-duty of £18, 6s.

The Educational Endowments Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 59), gives power to the Commissioners thereunder to frame schemes for the future government and management of educational endowments, and thus defines that term, viz.:—"any property, heritable or moveable, dedicated to charitable uses, and which has been applied, or is applicable . . . to educational purposes."

The Commissioners framed a scheme for the government and management of the educational endowments of Greenock, including among them the sum of £8494, 4s.

Held that the scheme, so far as regarded the £8494, 4s., was not within the scope of the statute, as the subjects had not been "dedicated to charitable uses," the feu-contract allowing them to be applied to other purposes.

1st Division.
B.

For several years prior to 1813 there had been carried on in Greenock two charity schools, one for boys, the other for girls, which were managed by committees of gentlemen and ladies of the town. The expenses of maintenance and management were met by subscriptions, and by the annual return from a bequest. The boys' school was carried on in a building the use of which was granted by the Magistrates, the girls' school in a building rented by the subscribers.

The Town-Council minutes under date 24th May 1813 contained this entry,—"Mr Ker [Mr Alan Ker, then Chief Magistrate of Greenock] stated that Sir Michael Shaw Stewart had made a present to the town of a plot containing about thirty-seven falls of ground, for building a charity school, and having a proper area around it; and that he had, on behalf of the community, addressed a letter of thanks to Sir Michael. This the meeting approved of, but defer till further in the season any procedure as to the removal of the present or the building of a new charity school," and on 14th August following this entry was found, viz.:—"The meeting appoint Mr Ker, Mr Bannatyne, and Mr Leitch, as a committee to consider and suggest the plan for the new charity school, and what aid the corporation may be able to give to the undertaking from the price to be obtained from the site and building of the present school, which, although the entire property of the corporation, there can be no objection to apply to so humane and beneficial a purpose as the erection of a new school upon a proper plan."

Thereafter by feu-contract, dated 15th and 19th September 1813, it was agreed between Sir Michael Shaw Stewart and the Bailies and Council of the town, in these terms, viz.:—"The said Sir Michael Shaw Stewart, in consideration of the feu-duties and others after specified, has sold and disponed, like as he hereby sells, dispones, and in feu-farm and heritage for ever lets and demits to and in favour of the said Hugh Crawford, &c., . . . Bailies, Treasurer, and Counsellors foresaid, and to their successors in office, for the purposes after mentioned, heritably and irredeemably, All and Whole . . . But it is hereby expressly declared and agreed to between the said parties, that the said piece of ground above disponed is

No. 81.
—
Feb. 24, 1888.
Magistrates of Greenock v. Commissioners on Educational Endowments.

given by the said Sir Michael Shaw Stewart to the said Bailies and Council and their successors in office for the sole and express purpose of building accommodations for charitable institutions. . . . For which causes, and of the other part, the said Bailies and Council bind and oblige themselves and their successors in office to pay to the said Sir Michael Shaw Stewart and his foresaids, or to their factors and chamberlains, in name of feu-duty, the sum of £2, 0s. 8d. sterling yearly, at the term of Martinmas, beginning the first term's payment at Martinmas 1813, and so forth yearly at the said term so long as the said piece of ground with the erections made thereon shall be used for charitable purposes: But in the event, at any future period, the said Bailies and Council shall make use of or dispose of the said ground or erections for any other purpose, then, and in that event, they oblige themselves and their successors in office, in place of the feu-duty above mentioned, to pay the sum of £18, 6s. sterling of yearly feu-duty, and that at the first term of Martinmas after the said occupation, and so forth yearly thereafter in all time coming, with the due and ordinary annual rent thereof from and after the same becomes due, aye and until payment."

The Bailies and Council, between 1814 and 1819, built upon the ground so feued at the town's charges, borrowing the money from various persons. The foundation-stone of the building bore,—"By the favour of Almighty God, the foundation-stone of this building, erected by the town of Greenock for the education of poor children, was laid," &c.

The two schools already mentioned were accommodated in this building, and continued to be carried on as before, the feu-duty being paid by the Bailies and Council.

Alterations and additions were made upon the buildings from time to time, the cost of these being borne in part by the Bailies and Council. In 1860 a sum of £150 was raised for this purpose by voluntary subscription, and in 1864 a sum of £300. In the annual accounts of the burgh, the buildings were entered as part of the common good of the burgh.

After the passing of the Education Act of 1872 the Council approved of the following recommendation, recorded in their minute under date 18th June 1873:—"The committee recommend the Council to lease the charity school and school of industry to the school board for a period of two years from Whitsunday last, at a yearly rent not exceeding the actual sum which may be expended by the Council on and for said schools, during the term of the lease. The sum expended to be held to include the feu-duty which may be payable by the Council, also all sums expended in maintaining and upholding said schools, insuring the same, and all public rates and burdens during the currency of said lease."

The school board continued to hold the buildings under this arrangement, until, in 1884, the Caledonian Railway Company, who were making a line of railway from Greenock to Gourock, took the ground on which the buildings stood under their compulsory powers. By the verdict of a jury summoned under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the sum of £8494, 4s. was awarded to the Provost and Magistrates as the value of the lands and buildings, under deduction of the capitalised value of the feu-duty at the rate of £18, 6s.

This money having been consigned in bank under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the Commissioners acting under the Educational Endowments Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 59), framed a scheme for educational endowments in Greenock, and included in that scheme the consigned money.

The Provost and Magistrates, feeling themselves aggrieved by this provision of the scheme, submitted a case to the Court of Session, in which they were the parties of the first part, and the Commissioners were parties of the second part. The first parties contended that the subjects acquired by the railway company were part of the common good of Greenock, and that the consigned money was so also, and that neither they nor it was an educational endowment in the sense of the statute.* The parties of the second part contended that in the circumstances the buildings, and the money, as a surrogatum for them, were an educational endowment.

No. 81.

Feb. 24, 1888.
Magistrates of Greenock v. Commissioners on Educational Endowments.

The questions submitted were—"(1) Whether said subjects in Ann Street and Sir Michael Street, or said consigned money, or any part thereof, was or is an educational endowment in the sense of the said Educational Endowments Act? (2) Whether the said scheme, so far as it includes the said sum of money awarded as compensation for the said subjects, consigned in bank as aforesaid, is not within the scope of the Educational Endowments Act, 1882, and is contrary to law?"

Argued for the first parties;—Two things were essential to the definition of educational endowment, for, by the 1st section of the Educational Endowments Act, 1882, the property must in the first place be dedicated to charitable purposes, and, in the second place, be applied or applicable to that particular species of charitable purposes with which the statute dealt, viz., educational purposes. The second element was present here, the first was wanting, for there was no dedication to charitable purposes. That property should be dedicated to any purpose it was necessary that it should be irrevocably destined to it. It could not be said that that was the case here, for the feu-contract, in which the dedication, if dedication there were, must be found, made provision for the application of the subjects feued to charitable purposes, or to other purposes, as the Magistrates pleased. One rate of duty was exigible so long as they pleased to devote them to charitable purposes, and another for all time coming, if they devoted them to other ends. Who could require the magistrates to keep the subjects devoted to charitable purposes? Not the superior, for he had agreed to take a certain feu-duty at a higher rate when the subjects were applied to other uses. Nor had anyone else the right to insist upon the maintenance of the subjects as a charity, for the subscribers, who alone could claim an interest to do so, had enjoyed the use of the buildings for many years free of rent. The present title was very different from that of Gold v. Houldsworth,[1] where the vassal was prohibited from using his premises as a public-house, and the additional rent was imposed as a penalty to be renewed upon each offence. The history of the subjects since 1872 was instructive. First, they had been occupied by the school board, who took fees from children attending them. Their occupation was not charitable. In the next place, they had been sold by the Magistrates under deduction of the higher rate of feu-duty.

Argued for the second parties;—The true interpretation of the title here was that the higher feu-duty was inserted as a fence or irritancy to prevent the subjects being diverted from charitable purposes. [LORD PRESIDENT.—But this is a title of property, and there is no irritancy in the event of a contravention.] It was possible that provision might be made

---

* 45 and 46 Vict. c. 59, sec. 1, provides,—"'Educational endowment' shall mean any property, heritable or moveable, dedicated to charitable uses, and which has been applied or is applicable in whole or in part, whether by the declared intention of the founder or the consent of the governing body, or by custom, or otherwise, to educational purposes."

[1] Gold v. Houldsworth, July 16, 1870, 8 Macph. 1006, 42 Scot. Jur. 617.

No. 81.

Feb. 24, 1888.
Magistrates of Greenock v. Commissioners on Educational Endowments.

for the imposition of a penalty upon a contravention of the terms of the title without an irritancy, and it would not be held that the contravention was allowable upon payment of the penalty. That was familiar law in the case of penalties for miscropping. Another instance of the same rule in the case of a property title was the case of Gold.[1] [LORD PRESIDENT.—That also was the case of a lease.] But it was a lease for 999 years, and treated by the present Lord President as a feu-contract, a view subsequently adopted by Lord Watson in the House of Lords.[2] The language of the clause here was peculiar, for charitable purposes were declared to be the "sole and express" purposes of the feu. But long usage was dedication as much as an express clause in a grant.[3] No one could dispute the long usage here, in addition to which there was the solemn inscription on the foundation-stone, and the contribution of very considerable sums by voluntary subscription, given, there could be no doubt, for the furtherance of the charitable purpose to which the schools had been for so long applied. To allow the school board to enjoy the use of the buildings was not to depart from the charitable purposes prescribed in the feu-contract. The superior did not think so, for he continued to be content with the lower rate of feu-duty, and it had been held that an endowed school might be lent or leased to a school board without losing its character.[4]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question in this case is, whether certain subjects in Greenock, or rather whether the price of these subjects, for they have now been sold to the Caledonian Railway Company, was or is an educational endowment in the sense of the Educational Endowments Act. The Act in question which is the 45th and 46th Vict. cap. 59, is entitled—An Act to reorganise the Educational Endowments of Scotland, and the preamble sets out that "it is desirable to extend the usefulness of educational endowments in Scotland, and to carry out more fully than is done at present the spirit of the founders' intentions," and so forth. The first section of the statute, which has been largely commented upon, provides that "'educational endowment' shall mean any property, heritable or moveable, dedicated to charitable uses, and which has been applied or is applicable in whole or in part, whether by the declared intention of the founder or the consent of the governing body, or by custom, or otherwise, to educational purposes." Now, it appears to me that the meaning of that section is not that property, heritable or moveable, applied or applicable to educational purposes shall fall within this statute, whether it be a charitable endowment or not; but it means merely to limit the class or description of endowments to which this statute shall apply, and it means that a subject to fall under this statute must in the first place be a charitable endowment. There are many educational endowments which are not charitable,—and which have no element of charity in them at all,—a great many foundations of chairs in universities are not in any sense charitable, and the purpose, therefore, of this section I apprehend to be to limit the educational endowments which fall under the operation of the statute to those which are dedicated to charitable uses.

---

[1] Gold v. Houldsworth, 8 Macph. 1006.

[2] Earl of Zetland v. Hislop, &c., June 12, 1882, 9 R. (H. L.) 40, Lord Watson, at p. 49.

[3] Sanderson v. Lees, &c., Nov. 25, 1859, 22 D. 24, per Lord Deas, at p. 31, 32 Scot. Jur. 14.

[4] M'Culloch v. Kirk-Session and Heritors of Dalry, July 21, 1876, 3 R. 1182.

But we must consider in the first place whether this is an endowment in any sense of the term. Now, I understand an endowment to mean an irrevocable gift, and therefore, although this may be a charity in one sense, and may be applied or applicable to educational purposes, if it is not an endowment, or, in other words, an irrevocable gift, it does not fall under the statute.

Now, applying that construction of the statute in the present case, let us see how the matter stands. This is not a property the history of which is left in any doubt. We have before us the title under which the Magistrates originally acquired it; and we see from that title under what conditions they held it from the beginning. It is in the shape of a feu-contract between the Magistrates and Sir Michael Shaw Stewart, and no doubt the consideration of the feu is the usual consideration of the payment of the feu-duty, and the conveyance is made to the Magistrates and their successors in office, contemplating apparently that the property is of such a description that it will be held by the Magistrates for public purposes. And then there is a clause which expresses a sort of condition of the grant:—"It is hereby expressly declared and agreed between the parties, that the said piece of ground above disponed is given by the said Sir Michael Shaw Stewart to the said Bailies and Council and their successors in office, for the sole and express purpose of building accommodations for charitable institutions." Now, if there were nothing more than I have read, there would be very strong ground for holding that this grant was made under the express condition that it should be held in all time coming for charitable uses and for nothing else. But then there is the reddendo clause, which gives a different colour and complexion to it altogether. The reddendo clause begins thus:—"For which causes and of the other part, the said Bailies and Council bind and oblige themselves and their successors in office to pay to the said Sir Michael Shaw Stewart and his foresaids . . . in name of feu-duty, the sum of £2, 0s. 8d. sterling yearly, at the term of Martinmas, beginning the first term's payment at Martinmas 1813, and so forth yearly at the said term, so long as the said piece of ground with the erections made thereon shall be used for charitable purposes." Now, it is clearly contemplated here that a time may come when the ground and the buildings thereon shall not be used for charitable purposes. The deed accordingly goes on to provide what the obligation of the Magistrates shall be when the ground ceases to be used for charitable purposes, and provides:—"But in the event, at any future period, the said Bailies and Council shall make use of or dispose of the said ground or erections for any other purpose, then, and in that event, they oblige themselves and their successors in office, in place of the feu-duty above mentioned, to pay the sum of £18, 6s. sterling yearly of feu-duty, and that at the first term of Martinmas after the said occupation, and so forth yearly thereafter in all time coming." Now, here again it is plainly implied that the Magistrates may make use of the ground, or may dispose of the ground for other purposes than charitable purposes, and in that event they are to pay a feu-duty, which it may be assumed represents the true value of the ground, and not the much lower feu-duty which they undertook to pay so long as the ground and erections were used for charitable purposes; and that once the subject has been diverted from the charitable purpose to which it is at the beginning to be devoted, then the feu-contract resolves itself into a feu-contract of which the reddendo is to be £18, 6s., in all time coming thereafter. In short, the moment the Magistrates elect to use this subject for other than ch purposes, or to dispose of it, then it becomes simply an absolute feu i hands for any purpose to which they choose to devote it, and after that t never to pay less than the increased feu-duty of £18, 6s.

Now, the case comes to be whether this subject is vested in the Mag as an irrevocable gift in favour of the public for charitable purposes, or it is a property held by the Magistrates under this title upon conditio that while they hold it for charitable purposes they are to pay a very sm duty, and as soon as they devote it to any other purpose they are to larger feu-duty corresponding to the value of the ground. I have no he in saying that the latter is the true construction of this deed; and if tha it seems to me that the Magistrates hold this property to use it in their cretion, either for charitable purposes, or for any other purpose that the more beneficial to the community or corporation. It is not immaterial to that this property has been disposed of. It has been sold, no doubt by sory sale, but still it has been disposed of; and the disponee, the Cal Railway Company, holds it, and can hold it, only as absolute owne accordingly they are under obligation to pay the full feu-duty of £18, the price which the Magistrates received from the railway company is ca upon the footing that the subject conveyed is burdened therewith.
that from the figures before us shewing the way in which the price was est Therefore the price which is now in the hands of the Magistrates is price of a subject that was devoted to charitable purposes, but the pri subject which it is assumed is held on absolute title by the Magistrates larger feu-duty. The surrogatum is the price of the subject burdened w larger feu-duty of £18, 6s., and therefore what was given for that surr is that same subject, namely, the property burdened with that larger fe
The circumstance that this property has been applied by the Magistra a long time to charitable uses, and to educational uses, does not seem t affect the question. Nobody can say that the Magistrates have n exercising a perfectly wise discretion in applying it up to this time purposes for which they thought fit, these being charitable purposes, b cannot derogate from their right under this charter to apply it to other p
They cannot by that use lose, by a sort of negative prescription, the titl they have to apply this to any other object which they think fit; and th upon the whole matter I do not see any ground for holding that thi "educational endowment" within the meaning of the statute.

LORD ADAM.—The question here is, "whether certain subjects in Ann St Sir Michael Street, or said consigned money," being a sum of £8494, 4s., " is an educational endowment in the sense of the Educational Endo Act"? If it is an educational endowment, then, no doubt, it falls wit scope of the Act; and if that be so then the scheme which has been p is right and cannot be touched by us. But that takes us back to the pro of the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act, to see whether or subject, or the price thereof, is an educational endowment in the sense
Act. That depends upon the construction of the first section of th
Now that section says this,—"'Educational endowment' shall mean any p heritable or moveable, dedicated to charitable uses, and which has been or is applicable in whole or in part, whether by the declared intention

No. 81.

Feb. 24, 1888.
Magistrates of Greenock v. Commissioners on Educational Endowments.

founder or the consent of the governing body, or by custom or otherwise, to educational purposes." It is obvious that there are two things required here to bring a fund within the Act; in the first place, it must be dedicated to charitable uses; and, in the second place, it must have been applied or be applicable to educational purposes. It is quite obvious, as it appears to me, that the fact that it has been applied to educational purposes is not in itself sufficient. We all know that there are hundreds of school-houses and schools which have been built in Scotland, and have been applied by the proprietors thereof for years to educational purposes, yet it is impossible to say that the Act can apply to such property as that, because the proprietors of these schools, although they have so applied them, can at any moment divert them to any other uses if they so please. Here there can be no doubt that this fund falls within the second requirement, because this property and fund have been applied to educational purposes for a long time. But then, the question remains behind that, has it been dedicated to charitable uses? Now, I think, a property or fund to be destined to charitable uses must be, as your Lordship has said, irrevocably so destined,—a fund or property which cannot be diverted from such uses without a breach of trust on the part of the governing body or holders of the fund. Whether or no this property is in that position appears to me to depend entirely upon the construction of the feu-contract which is the title of the first parties to this case; and upon the construction of that feu-contract I have no doubt at all that the fund is not so dedicated. I think it is clear upon the construction of the feu-contract that the Magistrates of Greenock have an option to apply this property to charitable purposes, or to any other purpose they may think advisable. The contract sets forth what the consideration is, and the consideration is this, that the said Sir Michael Shaw Stewart "in consideration of the feu-duties and others." Now, what are the feu-duties referred to there? The feu-duties are clearly the two feu-duties; the one of £2, 0s. 8d., which the Magistrates are to pay so long as they choose to use and apply the property to charitable purposes; and the other feu-duty is the alternative one of £18, 6s., if in their discretion they choose to apply it to purposes other than charitable. So that this contract states upon the very face of it that the consideration is the one or other of these as the contracting party may think right. Then the feu-contract goes on to say that "the ground above disponed is given for the sole and express purpose of building accommodations for a charitable institution," and if the deed had stopped there and gone no further I think there would have been a great deal to be said upon the ground that this was an irrevocable destination. But the deed does not stop there, for it goes on to set out a reddendo clause, which shews quite clearly that the contracting parties meant that there should be an option as to how this property was to be used. It appears to me that there can be nothing clearer than this, that it was intended that the Magistrates should have the option either to use it for charitable purposes, in which case they were to pay £2, 0s. 8d., or for purposes other than charitable purposes, in which case they were to pay the larger feu-duty of £18, 6s. Now, supposing the Magistrates here had made up their minds not to apply it to charitable purposes, who could have interfered with them? Could the supposed founder, Sir Michael Shaw Stewart, have prevented that? Would he not immediately have been met with the objection,—"You have agreed by your feu-contract that in the event of our using it for other than charitable purposes we shall pay you

No. 81.

Feb. 24, 1888.
Magistrates of Greenock v. Commissioners on Educational Endowments.

the moment the Magistrates elect to use this subject for other than charitable purposes, or to dispose of it, then it becomes simply an absolute feu in their hands for any purpose to which they choose to devote it, and after that they are never to pay less than the increased feu-duty of £18, 6s.

Now, the case comes to be whether this subject is vested in the Magistrates as an irrevocable gift in favour of the public for charitable purposes, or whether it is a property held by the Magistrates under this title upon condition only that while they hold it for charitable purposes they are to pay a very small feu-duty, and as soon as they devote it to any other purpose they are to pay a larger feu-duty corresponding to the value of the ground. I have no hesitation in saying that the latter is the true construction of this deed; and if that be so it seems to me that the Magistrates hold this property to use it in their own discretion, either for charitable purposes, or for any other purpose that they think more beneficial to the community or corporation. It is not immaterial to observe that this property has been disposed of. It has been sold, no doubt by compulsory sale, but still it has been disposed of; and the disponee, the Caledonian Railway Company, holds it, and can hold it, only as absolute owners; and accordingly they are under obligation to pay the full feu-duty of £18, 6s, and the price which the Magistrates received from the railway company is calculated upon the footing that the subject conveyed is burdened therewith. We see that from the figures before us shewing the way in which the price was estimated. Therefore the price which is now in the hands of the Magistrates is not the price of a subject that was devoted to charitable purposes, but the price of a subject which it is assumed is held on absolute title by the Magistrates for the larger feu-duty. The surrogatum is the price of the subject burdened with the larger feu-duty of £18, 6s., and therefore what was given for that surrogatum is that same subject, namely, the property burdened with that larger feu-duty. The circumstance that this property has been applied by the Magistrates for a long time to charitable uses, and to educational uses, does not seem to me to affect the question. Nobody can say that the Magistrates have not been exercising a perfectly wise discretion in applying it up to this time for the purposes for which they thought fit, these being charitable purposes, but that cannot derogate from their right under this charter to apply it to other purposes. They cannot by that use lose, by a sort of negative prescription, the title which they have to apply this to any other object which they think fit; and therefore upon the whole matter I do not see any ground for holding that this is an "educational endowment" within the meaning of the statute.

Lord Adam.—The question here is, "whether certain subjects in Ann Street and Sir Michael Street, or said consigned money," being a sum of £8494, 4s., "was or is an educational endowment in the sense of the Educational Endowments Act"? If it is an educational endowment, then, no doubt, it falls within the scope of the Act; and if that be so then the scheme which has been prepared is right and cannot be touched by us. But that takes us back to the provisions of the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act, to see whether or no this subject, or the price thereof, is an educational endowment in the sense of that Act. That depends upon the construction of the first section of that Act. Now that section says this,—"'Educational endowment' shall mean any property, heritable or moveable, dedicated to charitable uses, and which has been applied or is applicable in whole or in part, whether by the declared intention of the founder or the consent of the governing body, or by custom or otherwise, to educational purposes." It is obvious that there are two things required here to bring a fund within the Act; in the first place, it must be dedicated to charitable uses; and, in the second place, it must have been applied or be applicable to educational purposes. It is quite obvious, as it appears to me, that the fact that it has been applied to educational purposes is not in itself sufficient. We all know that there are hundreds of school-houses and schools which have been built in Scotland, and have been applied by the proprietors thereof for years to educational purposes, yet it is impossible to say that the Act can apply to such property as that, because the proprietors of these schools, although they have so applied them, can at any moment divert them to any other uses if they so please. Here there can be no doubt that this fund falls within the second requirement, because this property and fund have been applied to educational purposes for a long time. But then, the question remains behind that, has it been dedicated to charitable uses? Now, I think, a property or fund to be destined to charitable uses must be, as your Lordship has said, irrevocably so destined,—a fund or property which cannot be diverted from such uses without a breach of trust on the part of the governing body or holders of the fund. Whether or no this property is in that position appears to me to depend entirely upon the construction of the feu-contract which is the title of the first parties to this case; and upon the construction of that feu-contract I have no doubt at all that the fund is not so dedicated. I think it is clear upon the construction of the feu-contract that the Magistrates of Greenock have an option to apply this property to charitable purposes, or to any other purpose they may think advisable. The contract sets forth what the consideration is, and the consideration is this, that the said Sir Michael Shaw Stewart "in consideration of the feu-duties and others." Now, what are the feu-duties referred to there? The feu-duties are clearly the two feu-duties; the one of £2, 0s. 8d., which the Magistrates are to pay so long as they choose to use and apply the property to charitable purposes; and the other feu-duty is the alternative one of £18, 6s., if in their discretion they choose to apply it to purposes other than charitable. So that this contract states upon the very face of it that the consideration is the one or other of these as the contracting party may think right. Then the feu-contract goes on to say that "the ground above disponed is given for the sole and express purpose of building accommodations for a charitable institution," and if the deed had stopped there and gone no further I think there would have been a great deal to be said upon the ground that this was an irrevocable destination. But the deed does not stop there, for it goes on to set out a reddendo clause, which shews quite clearly that the contracting parties meant that there should be an option as to how this property was to be used. It appears to me that there can be nothing clearer than this, that it was intended that the Magistrates should have the option either to use it for charitable purposes, in which case they were to pay £2, 0s. 8d., or for purposes other than charitable purposes, in which case they were to pay the larger feu-duty of £18, 6s. Now, supposing the Magistrates here had made up their minds not to apply it to charitable purposes, who could have interfered with them? Could the supposed founder, Sir Michael Shaw Stewart, have prevented that? Would he not immediately have been met with the objection,—"You have agreed by your feu-contract that in the event of our using it for other than charitable purposes we shall pay you the sum of £18, 6s.," and what answer could he have set up to that? I do not see that he could have had any answer, because that is one of the conditions on which they were entitled to hold their property. And if the founder has no title to interfere with them, if their doing so was in terms of the contract, who else could interfere or object? Who else could say that this was a diversion of the property from the purposes to which the Magistrates were entitled to apply it? I do not see that anybody could have the right to say that. I think, therefore, that this property was held by the Magistrates upon a title under which they had a right to divert it and use it for any purpose they chose, other than a charitable purpose, upon paying a certain sum of feu-duty; and if that be so, it is just in the position of any other property which for the time they choose to apply to educational purposes. But that will never bring it within the Act. This case is quite different from that of Gold v. Houldsworth, to which we were referred. In that case there was a permanent prohibition against using the property for public-houses. There was a perpetual prohibition against the lessee or vassal, fortified by a penalty of £10 for every time it should be so used; and accordingly it was held there that the superior or proprietor, for it was a long lease, had a right to insist that it should be applied to no other purposes. But here Sir Michael Shaw Stewart had no right whatever, because he had agreed that it was to be used in a certain way on payment of a certain sum in all time coming. On the whole case I have no hesitation in agreeing with your Lordship.

No. 81.
Feb. 24, 1888.
Magistrates of Greenock v. Commissioners on Educational Endowments.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree with your Lordship. I think an educational endowment in the sense of this statute is an irrevocable gift, which must, in the first place, be set apart and appropriated to charitable uses; and in the second place, it must have been applied or be applicable to that particular form of charity which is described as educational purposes. I think that is very clear upon a construction of the words; and that construction is confirmed by the implication which arises from the remaining part of the clause, because that makes it very clear that the subject contemplated by the enactment is not a property in the hands of an unlimited owner, but an endowment, an educational endowment, in the hands of a governing body or managers or trustees. Therefore if an unlimited owner allows a building upon his property to be used for charitable purposes during his pleasure, being under no obligation either to the objects of the charity or anybody else to continue that use longer than he thinks fit, that is not an educational endowment in the sense of this statute any more than it is such an endowment in the ordinary meaning of the words. I entirely agree, therefore, with your Lordships that the question whether this compensation money does or does not fall within the scope of the statute really depends upon whether, on the construction of the title of the Magistrates of Greenock, they hold it as trustees for charitable uses, or as administrators of the common good of the burgh of Greenock. I entirely concur with your Lordship that upon the construction of the feu-contract there can be no question as to the purpose or the character in which they hold it. The subjects are conveyed to them for the purpose after mentioned, heritably and irredeemably; and then the deed goes on to say what the purposes after mentioned are. They are, in the first place, "building accommodations for charitable institutions"; and, in the second place, "for any other purpose for which the Magistrates shall make use of or dispose of the said ground or erections." Therefore it becomes very clear upon reading the whole deed that the reason for specifying that purpose of the erection of "building accommodations for charitable institutions" is simply to explain and make clear a very special agreement between the superior and vassal for the variation of the feu-duty in certain events. What the superior stipulates comes simply to this, that since the ground is acquired for the express purpose of being used for charitable purposes he shall be content with a very small feu-duty so long as it is in fact so applied; but since it has become the property of the Magistrates, who may use it for any other purpose for which they may use the property of the burgh, and may therefore divert it from charitable purposes, when they do that, or if they shall do that at any time, then they are to pay the feu-duty which your Lordship points out must be assumed to be the true value of the land. It appears to me therefore that the Magistrates hold this property under no other restrictions except those which necessarily attach to their character as Magistrates. They hold it as they hold the rest of the property of the burgh, in trust for the community; but they do not hold it for any purposes more definite than those to which the common good may be lawfully appropriated by the administrators. I entirely agree with your Lordships.

No. 81.

Feb. 24, 1888.
Magistrates of Greenock v. Commissioners on Educational Endowments.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find and declare that the subjects in Ann Street and Sir Michael Street, Greenock, and the consigned money, being the price thereof, are not an educational endowment in the sense of the Educational Endowments Act, 1882; and find and declare that the scheme, so far as it includes the said sum of money, the price of the said subjects, consigned in bank, is not within the scope of the Educational Endowments Act, 1882, and is contrary to law, and decern."

CUMMING & DUFF, S.S.C.—DONALD BEITH, W.S.—Agents.

No. 82.

Feb. 24, 1888.
Brand v. Shaws.

JAMES BRAND, Pursuer (Appellant).—R. V. Campbell—W. Campbell.
MRS F. W. SHAW AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Respondents).—Sir Charles Pearson—Maconochie.
MISS G. SHAW, Defender (Respondent).—Sir Charles Pearson—Maconochie.

Title to Sue—Parent and Child—Action for custody of bastard child—Personal and intransmissible.—Held that an action at the instance of a mother for custody of her bastard child could not be insisted in after her death by a person named by her in a testament as "tutor, curator, and guardian" to her child.

Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Action at instance of mother of bastard for custody.—Opinions as to the competency in the Sheriff Court of an action at the instance of a mother concluding for the custody of her bastard child.

Parent and Child—Bastard—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. c. 27).—Question, whether the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, applies to bastards.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Ayrshire.
M.

ON 31st August 1886 Ann Hammel, residing at the Convent of the Good Shepherd, Dalbeth, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Ayr against Mrs F. W. Shaw, Ayr, and her husband for his interest, concluding for an order on the defender to restore to her the pursuer's illegitimate child, John Ingram Hammel, presently in the custody or under the control of the defender, and failing the defender doing so, for a warrant to officers of Court to search for the child, and to take possession of it, and deliver it to the pursuer.

No. 82.

Feb. 24, 1888.
Brand v. Shaws.

On 28th September 1886 Ann Hammel, in respect Mrs Shaw averred that the child was not under her control, raised an action also in the Sheriff Court against Miss Shaw, with conclusions similar to those in the other action.

These actions were conjoined.

The pursuer's condescendence in these actions stated that she was the mother of the child, which at the date of the action was four years of age, having been born on 3d April 1882. That in 1883 the child was entrusted to the charge of the defenders, and that though she had repeatedly asked the defenders to return the child to her, they had refused to do so.

The defenders averred that for some time previous to 1883 the pursuer had been leading a dissolute life, and that at that time she was in very delicate health and in great poverty. That in March of that year she was admitted with her child to a Charitable Institution in Ayr, and that while there she handed over the child to Miss Shaw on the footing that the pursuer was to have no further control over the child. It was further averred that Miss Shaw took charge of the child till he was four years of age, when he was sent to the Home for Little Boys at Farningham, where he was to be educated and taught a trade. The defenders further averred that when the pursuer came out of the Home in Ayr she went to service for a time, then relapsed into criminal courses, and was in jail, and, when released, was placed in the Roman Catholic Convent of the Good Shepherd at Dalbeth.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The female defender having been entrusted with the child during the pursuer's pleasure only, and having no legal right to retain it in her custody or under her control against the pursuer's will, the said female defender should be ordained to restore it to the pursuer.

The defender in each action pleaded;—(1) The action is incompetent in the Sheriff Court. (4) In respect of the facts averred by the defender, and in the whole circumstances stated by her, the child should not be delivered to pursuer, and the defender should be assoilzied, with expenses.

In October 1886 the pursuer died in the Convent, leaving the following settlement:—"I, Ann Hammel, residing at the Convent of the Good Shepherd, Dalbeth, near Glasgow, do hereby leave and bequeath my whole means and estate to James Brand, contractor, Glasgow, in trust for behoof of my son, John Ingram Hammel; and I hereby nominate, constitute, and appoint the said James Brand to be my sole executor, and to be tutor, curator, and guardian to my said son; and being a Roman Catholic myself, it is my desire that my said son be brought up in that faith."

On 2d February 1887 the Sheriff-substitute (Orr Paterson), in respect of a minute lodged for James Brand, sisted him as pursuer in the conjoined actions, and the Sheriff adhered, but "reserving all objections to his title."

The defenders added this statement,—(Stat. 10) "The document, No. 16 of process, produced by James Brand, contractor, Glasgow (who has been sisted as pursuer, under reservation of all objections to his title to insist in this action), confers on him no title to insist therein. The original pursuer, as the mother of an illegitimate child, had no legal power to appoint the said James Brand, or any other person tutor to her child. The said James Brand has no legal status or right, through kinship or other right, to the custody of said child. The pursuer had no means and

No. 82.

Feb. 24, 1888.
Brand v.
Shaws.

estate whatever at the time of her death. She was dependent on the charity of others. The said James Brand, if known to her at all, was only known to her by name, and his name, it is believed, was inserted in said document on the suggestion of those who surrounded the deceased during her last illness."

The pursuer Brand added this plea,—"The defenders having no right or title to retain the custody of the child in question, and the pursuer Brand being duly appointed tutor, curator, and guardian to it by its mother, is entitled to an immediate order for delivery of the child as craved, with expenses."

The defenders added these pleas,—"(5) The pursuer Brand having no title or interest to insist in the present proceedings, and the document founded on by him having conferred no such title or interest, the defender should be assoilzed, or the action dismissed, with expenses. (6) Separatim, the right to insist on the cravings of the petition not being transferable, the defender should be assoilzied, or the action dismissed, with expenses."

On 24th May 1887 the Sheriff-substitute (Orr Paterson) allowed parties a proof, under reservation of their pleas.

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (Brand), who, on 29th September, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute: Finds, under reference to the annexed note, that the action is incompetent, and dismisses the same," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.— . . . . The motion to have Mr Brand sisted was opposed, but by interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute was granted, and this judgment was adhered to on appeal, under reservation, however, of all objections to Mr Brand's alleged title. Since then the Sheriff-substitute has pronounced an interlocutor allowing a proof, and against that interlocutor the present appeal has been taken by Mr Brand, who, in his reclaiming petition, maintains that inquiry is unnecessary, and that, having regard to the settlement, there is no room for any judgment save a decerniture in terms of the conclusions of the first petition. In their answers the defenders contend that as the action has been raised to determine the permanent custody of a pupil child, it is incompetent in the Sheriff Court, which, it is said, can only deal with questions of interim custody arising on emergency. On the other hand, it is argued for Mr Brand that under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, 49 and 50 Vict. cap. 45, and particularly section 3 (1), there is conferred on the Sheriff the jurisdiction requisite to deal with a case like the present. On the question whether, apart from the Act, the Sheriff has jurisdiction in this case to make an order for permanent custody, there is no room for serious doubt. The suggestion that there is emergency is out of the question. The protection and guardianship of infants 'is,' as Lord Fraser says (Parent and Child, p. 131), 'the peculiar province of the Court of Session as the Supreme Court of Equity, and to that Court must application be made in regard to all questions as to the custody of bastards. The Sheriff has power to decide as to their temporary custody where any sudden contingency prevents an application to the proper Court.' See also page 222.

"This passage fully sets forth the rule of law as to jurisdiction, and the various cases on the matter which the Sheriff has examined do not modify or vary the rule as now stated. See the cases of Buchan v. Cardross, 27th May 1842, 4 D. 1268; Lang, 30th June 1849, 11 D. 1217; Harvey v. Harvey and Others, 15th June 1860, 22 D. 1209; Muir v. Kerr, 18th July 1868, 6 M. 1125; and Hood v. Hood, 24th January 1871, 9 M. 449. There may, it is true, be a question whether the Sheriff has power to interfere to enforce or protect the legal title of a parent of lawful children,—see Dove Wilson, 3rd, p. 60; but no such question exists here. As an instance of procedure in the competent Court in reference to the custody of an illegitimate child, reference may be made to the case of Macpherson v. Leishman, 4th June 1887, 14 R. 180. Taking it, accordingly,

No. 82.

Feb. 24, 1888.
Brand v.
Shaws.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session. It was admitted at the bar that Ann Hammel had left no property of any kind.

Argued for the pursuer;—The action, as originally brought, was competent in the Sheriff Court. It was an action to enforce the legal right of a mother to the custody of her bastard child.[1] Such actions were competent in the Sheriff Court.[2] Further, under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, the Sheriff Court had now jurisdiction in such cases. The present pursuer's title was good to insist in the action, as the mother, who was the guardian of the child, had validly appointed him tutor under her settlement. At common law, even though a bastard had, in the eye of the law, no father, the putative father could appoint a guardian to him.[3] Further, under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, a mother had power to nominate a tutor to her son. The Act throughout spoke of "infants"; that meant any infant, whether legitimate or not. Such broad words in any Act of Parliament were construed in the widest sense, e.g., under the Act 1672, c. 2, the words "ony minor" were held to include bastards, and they could therefore choose curators when they ceased to be pupils.[4]

---

as sound law that jurisdiction does not exist apart from statute, has it been conferred by the Guardianship of Infants Act? The result of an examination of its provisions has been to satisfy the Sheriff that it does not apply to illegitimate children. The preamble sets forth that it is expedient to amend the law relating to the guardianship and custody of infants; or as, by the 8th section, the word 'infants' is to be read in Scotland, of 'pupils.' This means infants or pupils lawfully begotten. The second section makes mothers the guardians of infants on the father's death; but it is trite law that an illegitimate child has no father, and to illegitimates, therefore, the second section cannot apply. Section 3 (1) contains the provision specially founded on by Mr Brand. It sets forth that 'the mother of any infant may, by deed or will, appoint any person or persons to be guardian or guardians of such infant after the death of herself and the father of such infant (if such infant be then unmarried); and where guardians are appointed by both parents, they shall act jointly.' But it is clear from these words that the infant or pupil referred to is a person who has a father and mother, or, in other words, has been lawfully begotten. Further, by section 3, where guardians are appointed by both parents, they are to act jointly; but a father has no right to appoint a tutor to an illegitimate child, and therefore the father of the child referred to in the Act must be the father of a child lawfully begotten. As Bell says (section 2071), 'A natural child has no recognised father, and so his reputed father cannot appoint tutors,' &c. A reference to the 7th section adds force to the view now stated. It provides for the case where there is a decree of judicial separation, or a decree of divorce; and enacts that the Court pronouncing such decree may declare the guilty parent unfit to have custody of the children, if any, of the marriage, &c. This section, dealing with persons married, but afterwards judicially separated or divorced, must be taken as following on sections dealing also with persons who had entered into the marriage relation, and had not been divorced or separated. It may be added, that had it been intended that the Act should apply to illegitimate children, it would have contained a provision to that effect. The view now taken renders it unnecessary to offer any opinion on various other questions raised, and, in particular, whether Mr Brand was validly appointed, and whether the action, with its personal conclusion for delivery to the deceased when alive, can be transferred into an action for delivery to Mr Brand. On the whole matter, the Sheriff is of opinion that he has no jurisdiction in the present case."

[1] Cf. Macpherson v. Leishman, June 4, 1887, 14 R. 780; Sutherland v. Taylor, Dec. 22, 1887, supra, p. 224.

[2] Goadby v. Maccandys, July 7, 1815, Fac. Coll.

[3] Johnston v. Clark, 1785, M. 16,374; Whitson v. Speed, May 28, 1825, 4 S. 42.

[4] Wilson v. Campbell, March 10, 1819, Fac. Coll.

No. 82.
—
Feb. 24, 1888.
Brand v. Shaws.

Argued for the defenders;—The custody of infants was the peculiar province of the Court of Session, as the Supreme Court of Equity.[1] This had always been recognised, the only exception being where a case of emergency was averred.[2] Here there was no such averment, the only averment of that kind having been added after the death of the original pursuer. If the Sheriff had jurisdiction to enforce the legal rights of the mother that only applied to the case up to the date of the mother's death. In the case of Goadby the question was never raised, and the Court throughout took the case as one for an exercise of the nobile officium. In the later cases where such actions had been begun in the Sheriff Court the question of jurisdiction had either been waived,[3] or the Court had reserved it.[4] Further, the Sheriff had no jurisdiction under the Act of 1886. Every section of that Act bore on its face that the infants there dealt with were children having two parents, i.e., legitimate children. (2) The action was personal to the mother and intransmissible, and therefore fell by her death. The mother left no estate, and what she claimed here was not anything which would accrue to her estate, and therefore, qua executor, Brand had no title to insist in the action. Actions with pecuniary conclusions, e.g., for damages, alone transmitted to executors.[5] As tutor he had no title. Only a father could nominate a tutor to his son.[6] There was no authority for holding that a mother, in any circumstances, could do so. In all cases where tutors had been nominated to bastards they were nominated by persons who left money to be expended on the education of the child, and the custody of the child was therefore necessary for the proper expenditure of the money. The Court was the proper guardian of a bastard.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Sheriff in this case, recalling the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, which allowed a proof, finds "that the action is incompetent, and dismisses the same." Now, if the Sheriff means that the action, as originally brought by the mother of this infant, was incompetent in the Sheriff Court, I think that is somewhat doubtful; because an application by the mother of an illegitimate child for delivery of it to her custody is prima facie a just and legal demand, as she has the only legal title to its custody, and I am not disposed to throw any doubt upon the competency of such an application in the Sheriff Court, where there are no special circumstances which can be pleaded against her legal title. Therefore I can hardly agree with the Sheriff in holding that the action, as originally brought, was incompetent. It is, however, not now necessary to consider whether the original issue which was joined between the mother as pursuer and the defenders raised a question which was improper for decision in the Sheriff Court, for the case has changed its aspect altogether since that issue was joined.

The original pursuer died about the end of October 1886, and in February following Mr Brand came forward, and proposed to have himself sisted as pursuer. This was assented to by the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff,—although opposed by the defenders,—under reservation as to his title,

---

[1] Fraser on Parent and Child, pp. 131 and 222; Mackay's Practice, 1, p. 209, and 2, p. 267.

[2] Earl of Buchan v. Lady Cardross, May 27, 1842, 4 D. 1268, 14 Scot. Jur. 415.

[3] Lang v. Lang, June 30, 1849, 11 D. 1217, 21 Scot. Jur. 485.

[4] Hood v. Hood, Jan. 24, 1871, 9 Macph. 449, 43 Scot. Jur. 215.

[5] Auld v. Sharp, Dec. 16, 1874, 2 R. 191; Wrights v. Burns, Nov. 30, 1883, 11 R. 217.

[6] Fraser on Parent and Child, 174; Ersk. i. 7, 2.

No. 82.
Feb. 24, 1888.
Brand v.
Shaws.

and the question—the important question—now is, whether Mr Brand, executor of the deceased woman, or as tutor-nominate of the child, is e sist himself. I have come to be of opinion that he is not. In place, it appears to me that this is an action of a purely personal No one could have brought it except the mother, and it was just be was the mother, and in a condition to take charge of the child, and n and bring it up, that she was entitled to the custody of her ill child. That title cannot possibly pass to anyone else. The mother convey it by deed either inter vivos or mortis causa. It is a purely title in her. Mr Brand's title as executor gives him no title at all to action. It is not an action for recovery of funds belonging to the ex the like. I think it is clear that Mr Brand is not in the position of th pursuer, because he has not acquired her title, by transmission or o Her title could not transmit. No one could carry on the action e mother. I am therefore for dismissing this action on the ground that has no title to continue it. We have no need to decide anything title otherwise, nor whether the mother of an illegitimate child can na to it; nor need we decide the question which was raised as to th statute.

Lord Adam.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me to be m doubtful whether the Sheriff's interlocutor, if he means that the actio competent as originally brought, was well founded; for I am not satisfie thing that we have heard from the bar that a petition by the mother of a mate child, whose title to it is undisputed, may not competently ask in t Court for a warrant for its delivery to herself. But I agree with your Lor when she died, her action being a purely personal one could not be i by Mr Brand. It was the fact of her being the child's mother which a title to insist. That character could not transmit to Mr Brand nor t else. I think the clear course, then, was to dismiss the action. Mr respect of the expressed wishes of the deceased woman, may have apply. I say that may be, but I think it doubtful whether he could the Sheriff Court, and that is an additional reason why the proceedin action after the death of the original pursuer have been incompetent.

Lord Kinnear.—I am of the same opinion. I think the tit deceased mother was personal and intransmissible, and on that ground with your Lordships.

Lord Mure and Lord Shand were absent.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the She terlocutor . . . Find that the compearing pursuer Bran title to sue: Therefore dismiss the conjoined actions, and de

William B. Glen, S.S.C.—J. & F. Anderson, W.S.—Agents.

No. 83.
Feb. 24, 1888.
Fraser v.
Morris.

Alexander Fraser, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—J. C. Thomson—C
James Morris, Defender (Respondent).—A. J. Young—Fle

Reparation—Slander—Innuendo.—In an action of damages fo founded on words not in themselves libellous but innuendoed to b Court will not allow an issue unless the words founded on will fairly innuendo put on them.

No. 83.

Feb. 24, 1888.
Fraser v. Morris.

2D DIVISION.
Lord M'Laren.
M.

Averments founded on words innuendoed as slanderous which were held not to bear the innuendo so as to entitle the pursuer to an issue, and action dismissed as irrelevant accordingly.

ON 22d September 1887 Alexander Fraser, sole partner of the firm of Fraser & Carmichael, wholesale merchants, Dunfermline, brought this action of damages for alleged slander against James Morris, grocer, Dunfermline.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 1) "The pursuer is the sole partner of the firm of Fraser & Carmichael, merchants, Dunfermline, who carry on a large and extensive business in Dunfermline and the west of Fife. The defender was employed by the pursuer for some years until 1st March 1887 as a traveller, when he commenced business, along with his brother, under the firm of J. & Wm. C. Morris, as wholesale and retail grocers in Dunfermline." (Cond. 2) "In or about the month of June 1886 James Hutton, grocer, Baldridgeburn, near Dunfermline, ordered from the pursuer's firm, through the defender as their traveller, ten casks of Linlithgow oil. There are two qualities of oil sold in the trade known as qualities Nos. 1 and 2, of which No. 1 quality is the superior and higher in price. The order by the said James Hutton, as received by the defender, and written in his order-book, was for ten casks of No. 2 quality, the price of which was fivepence per gallon. The pursuer's firm duly implemented said order." (Cond. 3) "The said James Hutton and his wife in or about the month of July 1887 complained to the pursuer that they had been supplied with No. 2 oil, instead of with No. 1 oil, for which they alleged they had contracted with the defender at fivepence per gallon, and they withheld payment of a portion of the account for oil due by them to the pursuer. The pursuer explained to Mr Hutton that he knew nothing of the order except what appeared from the defender's order-book, of which he gave Mr Hutton an extract. Mr Hutton thereafter shewed this extract to the defender, and the defender, on the extract being shewn to him, in the presence and hearing of Hutton and his wife, on or about 5th August 1887, and in Hutton's shop at New Row, Dunfermline, falsely and calumniously stated of and concerning the pursuer, that 'it was very mean of Mr Fraser to try and throw the blame on him after he had reaped the benefit,' by which the defender intended to convey, and did convey, the insinuation and false accusation against the pursuer, that he knew that Mr Hutton had ordered No. 1 quality, but that he had nevertheless supplied No. 2 quality, and thereby knowingly cheated and defrauded Mr Hutton, and acted dishonestly towards him, or did falsely and calumniously use words to that effect, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer. Both Hutton and his wife distinctly understood and believed, from the said statement by the defender of and concerning the pursuer, that the pursuer had defrauded and cheated, or tried to defraud and cheat, or act dishonestly towards them." (Cond. 4) "Mrs Hutton, believing that the pursuer and defender were parties to the alleged fraud and dishonesty, threatened to prosecute both of them criminally, to which threat defender falsely and calumniously replied in the presence and hearing of Mr and Mrs Hutton, and at the time and place aforesaid, that 'if the worst came to the worst, he would speak the whole truth about the matter,' by which he insinuated against the pursuer that he, the defender, was innocent of the alleged fraudulent and dishonest acting of the pursuer, and that pursuer was alone guilty of it, or did falsely and calumniously use words to that effect, of and concerning the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and damage." (Cond. 5) "The defender in making the foregoing statements has falsely and calumniously slandered the pursuer, and has injured him and his firm in their business

No. 83.
Feb. 24, 1888.
Fraser v. Morris.

dealings with Mr Hutton and other customers. The pursuer believes and avers that the defender was the author of the complaint made by Mr Hutton to the pursuer, in order to deprive pursuer of his custom, and secure it for himself. The defender, it is further believed, has circulated his said slanderous statements against the pursuer in reference to Mr Hutton's order among a number of persons for the purpose of damaging the pursuer's business. The pursuer has suffered loss in his business, and his character as an honest merchant has been seriously affected through the fault of the defender."

The pursuer pleaded;—The defender having made false and calumnious statements of and concerning the pursuer as condescended on, to his loss, injury, and damage, the pursuer is entitled to reparation as concluded for, with expenses.

The defender pleaded, inter alia, that the pursuer's statements were irrelevant.

The pursuer proposed the issue quoted below.*

On 19th November the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that there is no issuable matter stated in the record: Disallows the proposed issue: Dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses," &c.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The statements which the defender had made about the pursuer, as innuendoed, entitled the pursuer to an issue. Unless the innuendo was utterly extravagant the Court would not prevent the case going to a jury. Comparatively innocent looking words might conceal an atrocious slander.[1]

Argued for the defender;—The statement set forth in cond. 3 could not possibly bear the innuendo put on it. An innuendo, to entitle a pursuer to an issue, must be a reasonable inference from the words founded on. Here it was not. The statement in cond. 4 would no doubt bear the construction that the pursuer and the defender had together been guilty of a conspiracy to cheat the pursuer's customers, but that was not the innuendo contended for.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is no doubt within the power of any person who brings an action for defamation of character, not merely to found on the words of which he complains, but to put upon these words a construction which he says they bear and were intended to bear; and in general, if the words will fairly bear the innuendo which is put on them, we are not to weigh the words in very nice scales. But, on the other hand, the words themselves must be fairly susceptible of bearing the libellous interpretation which the pursuer says they were intended to have.

---

* "Whether, on or about the 5th day of August 1887, and within the shop at New Row, Dunfermline, of James Hutton, grocer, and in the presence and hearing of the said James Hutton and his wife, the defender did falsely and calumniously state of and concerning the pursuer, that 'it was very mean of Mr Fraser (the pursuer) to try and throw the blame on him after he had reaped the benefit,' and also that, 'if the worst came to the worst, he would speak the whole truth about the matter,' meaning thereby that the pursuer had knowingly supplied to the said James Hutton a quantity of oil of No. 2 quality in fulfilment of a contract made between the pursuer and the said James Hutton for the supply of a quantity of oil of No. 1 quality, which is superior in quality and higher in price to oil of No. 2 quality, and had thereby cheated and defrauded the said James Hutton, or tried to cheat and defraud the said James Hutton, and to act dishonestly towards him; or did falsely and calumniously use words to that effect, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?"

[1] Inglis v. Inglis, Feb. 24, 1866, 4 Macph. 491, 38 Scot. Jur. 227; Broomfield v. Greig, March 7, 1868, 6 Macph. 563, 40 Scot. Jur. 299.

No. 83.

Feb. 24, 1888.
Fraser v.
Morris.

In this case I think that the conclusion at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived is the right one. The words complained of here will not, I think, bear the interpretation which the pursuer desires to put upon them.

The pursuer's averments amount substantially to this,—He is a grocer in Dunfermline, and among other things he deals in oil. He has two qualities of oil—an inferior and a superior quality. Among his customers were two persons of the name of Hutton, and they gave him an order for oil. The order was given to the defender, who at that time was employed as traveller by the pursuer. He took the order, and entered it in his order-book. The entry in the order-book was for the inferior quality of oil known as No. 2, and the No. 2 quality was accordingly furnished to the Huttons, and was charged for as that quality. But the Huttons afterwards alleged that their order was for the superior or No. 1 quality of oil, and at the price charged for the No. 2 quality, and that it was a mistake on the part of the defender to enter No. 2 quality in his order-book as the quality of oil that had been ordered. Then the question arose as to how the mistake came about. The pursuer when challenged by the Huttons said he obeyed the order as he found it entered in the order-book, and in proof of the truth of his statement he gave them an extract from the book. They then seem to have shewn the extract to the defender, and he then appears to have made use of the words of which the pursuer complains, that "it was very mean of the pursuer to try and throw the blame on him after he had reaped the benefit." That is the whole of the first statement. I do not think that these words will bear the construction which the pursuer seeks to put on them. I do not think that they imply that there was any fraud in the matter at all. Probably the defender thought that the accusation was one of carelessness in the business, and he resented that.

But then comes the other statement, that on another occasion the defender made the remark that "if the worst came to the worst he would speak the whole truth about the matter." I do not think that these words will bear the innuendo sought to be put upon them. I do not think they imply anything of a fraudulent nature, unless it were averred that these two men had for a long time been engaged in a course of fraud, and there is no such allegation. I think this nothing more than a foolish squabble, and that the Lord Ordinary has taken the right view.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I daresay your Lordships are right, and I am quite sure that the judgment proposed is the best for both parties, but I have had great doubts whether the proper course is not to send this case to a jury, and I cannot say that these doubts have been altogether removed.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

RHIND, LINDSAY, & WALLACE, W.S.—WALLACE & BEGG, W.S.—Agents.

No. 84.
—
Feb. 25, 1888.
Clark v. Keirs.

ANDREW CLARK, Pursuer (Respondent).—C. S. Dickson.
FINLAY KEIR AND WALTER KEIR, Defenders (Appellants).—Salvesen—Shennan.

Lease—Hypothec—Hypothec Abolition Act, 1880 (43 Vict. c. 12), sec. 1—Houses and land separately let by one writing—Invecta et illata—Cattle.—A proprietor granted a written lease of a dwelling-house, with byres and other offices, "for one year from Whitsunday 1887 till Whitsunday 1888 at the rent of £30 sterling, payable at Martinmas, also three grass fields . . . 25 acres, till Martinmas, at the rent of £70 sterling, payable at Martinmas." The house and offices were not on the fields let, but on separate though adjoining lands. Held (1) that the house and offices were let separately from the fields, and therefore that the Hypothec Abolition Act did not apply to them, and (2) that the landlord was entitled to sequestrate cattle in the offices.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
1.

BY memorandum of lease, dated 22d January 1887, Andrew Clark, farmer, High Possil, near Glasgow, let to Finlay Keir and Walter Keir, dairymen, "the dwelling-house of Colston, with byres, milk-house, three stalls in stable, and garden, for one year, from Whitsunday 1887 till Whitsunday 1888, at the rent of £30 sterling, payable at Martinmas, also three grass fields, namely, West Hill, Barn Park, and Todhole Park, 25 acres, till Martinmas, at the rent of £70 sterling, payable at Martinmas."

The Keirs entered into possession of the subjects.

On 12th November 1887 Clark presented a petition to the Sheriff against the Keirs praying for sequestration of the defenders' effects, so far as subject to the pursuer's hypothec, in the dwelling-house, byres, milk-house, and stable, in security and for payment of the £30 as the unpaid year's rent from Whitsunday 1887 to Whitsunday 1888, and for warrant to sell.

The Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray) granted warrant to cite the defenders, and " meantime sequestrates and grants warrant to officers of Court to inventory and secure as craved."

The execution of sequestration, dated 14th November 1887, shewed that the pursuer had attached, besides household furniture, the bestial in the byres, consisting of twelve milch cows, three queys, and three calves.

The Keirs lodged defences, in which they pleaded;—The bestial are not now liable to the law of hypothec, nor the subjects in any buildings on the farm.

The Sheriff-substitute, on 10th December 1887, granted warrant to sell " as many of the effects sequestrated as would pay the £30 rent."

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff.

On 7th January 1888 the Sheriff (Berry) adhered.*

---

* " NOTE.—I think, with the Sheriff-substitute, that the pursuer is entitled to the remedy of sequestration for the rent due at Martinmas of the house and buildings connected therewith. If there had been one letting of the house and fields, the case would have fallen under the provisions of the Hypothec Abolition Act of 1880, and no right of hypothec would have existed. Here, however, although no doubt in one document, we have separate lettings for the house and buildings on the one hand and for the fields on the other, separate rents are payable for these two sets of subjects, and there are separate periods of duration, the lease of the house and buildings extending to Whitsunday 1888, while that of the fields expired at Martinmas last, and when this petition for sequestration was brought the lease of the fields was at an end. In these circumstances I think that the case, in as far as regards the house and buildings, does not fall within the operation of the Act of 1880, and that the pursuer is entitled to

No. 84.

Feb. 25, 1888.
Clark v. Keirs.

The defenders appealed.

It was stated at the bar that the houses and offices were not situated in the fields let. They were on separate but adjoining lands.

Argued for the defenders;—The sequestration was incompetent in respect of the Hypothec Abolition Act, 1880.* There was one lease and one subject. The houses and fields were let as one to dairymen for the purposes of their business. The buildings were a necessity for the profitable use of the fields. The fact that separate rents were stipulated for made no difference. It was a formal separation, but gave the respondent no right to treat the cattle which were to feed on the fields as subject to hypothec for the rent of the houses. The case was the same as if the whole subjects had been let for the cumulo rent of £100.

Argued for the pursuer;—The subjects were different, a house and offices, and grass lands. These were capable of being enjoyed separately, and were let separately for different rents on contracts with different terms of endurance. It was of no consequence that these contracts were expressed in the same paper, or that the term of entry was the same.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think there is no ground for disturbing the decision of the Sheriff. There is here indeed one transaction, but in two parts. I think the buildings are not within the category referred to in the section of the statute. They are not on the lands in point of fact, and the sequestration for the rent of the houses was competent. I am for adhering to the judgment of the Sheriff.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I am of the same opinion, and have felt no difficulty. It appears to me that there were two subjects let—the house, byres, and garden on the one hand, and the grazing fields on the other. There was one rent for the one and another for the other. The terms were not the same, the term of expiry being in the one case Martinmas and in the other Whitsunday. It seems to me, however, that there is as little difficulty as if there had been one lease for the one and another lease for the other.

Further, the houses are not in fact upon the ground. They are separate from it.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I also think that the Sheriff is right.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT refused the appeal, and affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff.

JAMES COUTTS, S.S.C.—GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—Agents.

---

sequestration for the rent of the house and buildings. The Sheriff-substitute, in the latter part of his note, says that he abstains from expressing an opinion as to whether the cattle belonging to the defender are liable to sequestration for the rent of the house and buildings. But it has been pointed out to me that the cattle are included in the inventory, and I have been asked to express an opinion on the point. I think that under the head of invecta et illata the cattle are liable to sequestration as being property of the tenant in the byres or stables belonging to the landlord for the rent of which he seeks sequestration."

* The Hypothec Abolition (Scotland) Act, 1880 (43 Vict. cap. 12), provides (sect. 1), "From and after 11th November 1881 . . . the landlord's right of hypothec for the rent of land, including the rent of any buildings thereon, exceeding two acres in extent let for agriculture or pasture shall cease and determine. . . ."

No. 85.

Feb. 29, 1888.
Milne v. Leslie.

JAMES MILNE, Pursuer (Appellant).—D.-F. Mackintosh—M'Lennan.
JAMES LESLIE, Defender (Respondent).—J. C. Thomson—Ferguson.

Administration of justice—Law-agent—Sheriff—Small-Debt Court—Small-Debt Act, 1837 (1 Vict. cap. 41), secs. 14 and 15—Law-Agents Act, 1873 (36 and 37 Vict. cap. 63), secs. 2, 13, and 16—Interdict.—The Small-Debt Act, 1837, sec. 14, enacts that "no procurators, solicitors, nor any persons practising the law shall be allowed to appear or plead for any party without leave of the Court upon special cause shewn, . . ." Sec. 15 enacts that "any defender, who has been duly cited, failing to appear personally, or by one of his family, or by such person as the Sheriff shall allow, such person not being an officer of Court, shall be held confessed, and the other party shall obtain decree against him; and in like manner, if the pursuer or prosecutor shall fail to appear personally, or by such person as the Sheriff shall allow, such person not being an officer of Court, the defender shall obtain decree of absolvitor, . . ." The Law-Agents Act, 1873, sec. 16, enacts,—"From and after 1st February 1874 no person shall be allowed to practise as an agent in the Court of Session or any Sheriff Court until he shall have subscribed the roll of agents practising before such Court."

In a petition presented by an enrolled law-agent in a Sheriff Court for interdict against a person who was not an enrolled law-agent practising as a law-agent in the Small-Debt Court, held (diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) (1) that sec. 16 of the Law-Agents Act, 1873, had no application to persons allowed by the Sheriff to appear for others in the Small-Debt Court, and (2) that it was entirely within the discretion of the Sheriff to grant such leave to any person not an officer of Court.

Opinions (per the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young) that an application for interdict was not an appropriate remedy in such cases. Opinions (per Lord Craighill and Lord Rutherfurd Clark) contra.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeenshire.
M.

JAMES MILNE, an enrolled law-agent, practising at Fraserburgh, raised an action before the Sheriff Court at Peterhead, craving the Court to interdict James Leslie, "writer, Fraserburgh, from practising as a law-agent for or on behalf of any litigant or litigants in any of the Courts to be held at Fraserburgh, or elsewhere within the city or county of Aberdeen, by the Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff, or his Substitutes, until such time as he shall have legally qualified himself so to do."

The defender was a notary-public, and practised as such in Fraserburgh. He was not an enrolled law-agent.

The pursuer averred that the defender had unwarrantably, illegally, and publicly usurped the functions of a law-agent in the Sheriff Courts held at Fraserburgh; and particularly, that he had been in the habit of appearing and conducting causes for or on behalf of litigants, whereby the pursuer had sustained loss and damage; further, that the defender threatened to continue the practice.

The defender admitted that he had, "by leave of the Court, occasionally appeared in small-debt cases."

The pursuer, in reply to this averment, averred that it was ultra vires of the Court to give the defender leave to appear.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender not having signed the roll of law-agents kept for the county of Aberdeen, and not being qualified to do so, he is not entitled to practise as an agent in the Sheriff Court of the said county, and should therefore be prohibited from so doing. (2) The defender having unwarrantably and illegally assumed the name of a solicitor, or at least usurped the functions of a law-agent, the pursuer is entitled to interdict against him in terms of the prayer of the petition, with expenses. (4) Separatim, The leave of the Court, even if it had been granted to the defender, being ultra vires, cannot be pled by him as a defence to this action.

The defender pleaded that the action was irrelevant and incompetent.

The Sheriff-substitute (Brown), on 22d October 1887, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer has a sufficient title to sue the present action: Finds that the defender has not subscribed the roll of agents practising before the Court of the Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff, at Fraserburgh or elsewhere within the city or county of Aberdeen, and therefore is not entitled to practise in said Court: Therefore ordains the defender to abstain from the acts complained of: Further, instructs the Clerk of Court to refuse the privileges of an enrolled law-agent to the defender," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—The only point which I have felt to present any difficulty in connection with this case is one not raised by the pleadings, but I think requiring serious attention, viz., the question of the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain such an application. The doubt is suggested by the repeal of the Procurators Act of 1865, the 25th section of which gave right to any procurator to complain to the Sheriff in whose Court he is entitled to practise against any person practising in such Court who is not a procurator thereof, and to the provisions of the Law-Agents Act of 1873, placing law-agents within the jurisdiction of the Court, that is, the Court of Session. It may plausibly be contended that it was the intention of the Legislature, especially by the repeal of the Act of 1865, to make the whole question of the status, not only of procurators, but of persons professing to act as such, subject to the supervision of the Supreme Court only. It was pleaded by the pursuer in this case that the provision in the Act of 1865 was to be read as declaratory of the then existing law, and it is just the repeal of the statute without substituting anything in its place in this matter that raises the question whether the Procurators Act of 1865 was a true expression of the law when it passed. I have come to the conclusion, however, although not without difficulty, that the Act does not remove the right of a person possessing the necessary title and interest to have his rights protected by proceedings in the inferior Court, and that what the Law-Agents Act of 1873 makes privative to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session are questions affecting the title to be placed on the register of enrolled law-agents or the liability to be struck off that roll by reason of misconduct. But the defender in this case is admittedly not an enrolled law-agent, and therefore the question raised does not fall within either of the categories just stated, but simply is whether the pursuer is entitled to be protected from patrimonial loss caused by another engaging in practice in the Court without having qualified his right to do so. I do not think that the concluding section of the Act of 1873 (the 26th section) touches the question, for that obviously conserves only the right of inferior Judges in so far as that is necessary to maintain the discipline of their Courts, but I do not see that the right of the Sheriff to give such redress as the pursuer seeks here is withdrawn, either by express enactment or necessary implication.

"In the light of the foregoing remarks it appears clear that the only matter which can be regarded as falling within the merits of the case is the simple fact whether or not the defender is an enrolled law-agent, and that is not matter of dispute. In the view I take of the question of jurisdiction it is not within my province to decide whether as a notary-public he has any right to be put upon the register, the ground of action to which I have given effect simply being that, until he has been put upon the roll, the defender does not qualify the right to practise. It is proper, however, that I should say, with reference to a part of the argument addressed to me on his behalf that, so far as I am aware, there is no practice of sanctioning the appearance, either in the Small-Debt Court or the Debts Recovery Court, of a person to act professionally who does not possess the qualification and the title of a law-agent. Under both Acts there are certain classes of persons who are entitled in their absence to represent the parties to the suit, among which the pursuer is obviously not included, and the 'leave of

No. 85.

Feb. 29, 1888.
Milne v. Leslie.

On appeal the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith), on 11th November 1887, recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and dismissed the action.*

---

the Court' is not extended to anyone who, apart from such permission, has not the right to practise. The defender has from time to time appeared in the Court at Fraserburgh, but only on the assumption that he was entitled to exercise the privileges of a law-agent, and it is this unlawful practice which the pursuer now challenges and seeks to bring to an issue.

"The form of action which the pursuer has adopted to put an end to what, quite relevantly as I think, he represents to be an invasion of his legal rights, has given me some consideration, and in the end I have come to be of opinion that it should not be the course followed. In a question of interdict it is an essential element in the course of action proposed to be interdicted and prohibited that it shall be illegal and wrongful. But any acts performed with the sanction of the Court, such as appearing in judicial proceedings without objection from any quarter, do not possess that character of illegality and wrongfulness that is necessary to bring them within the category of acts that may be interdicted. The reason is obvious—a Court of law cannot interdict itself, and it seems to follow that it cannot interdict any act performed under its sanction or authority. In my opinion the actings here complained of must come to an end, but my view is that the decree should not take the form of an interdict but that of an order of Court."

* "NOTE.—The parties to this action are both engaged in the practice of the law in Fraserburgh. The pursuer, who is a law-agent enrolled under the Act 36 and 37 Vict. cap. 63, asks the Court to interdict the defender, who is merely a notary-public, 'from practising as a law-agent for or on behalf of any litigant or litigants in any of the Courts to be held at Fraserburgh or elsewhere within the city or county of Aberdeen by the Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff or his Substitutes, till such time as the defender shall have legally qualified himself so to do.' It is perhaps a sufficient answer to the application that the defender neither admits that he has practised, nor apparently does he claim the right to practise, in the ordinary Court of the Sheriff or Debts Recovery Court. He has no interest to make so broad a claim, for the simple reason that at Fraserburgh no ordinary Court is held; and although there is now a monthly Court for both Small-Debt and Debts Recovery cases, it is only as regards the Small-Debt Court that he claims the same privilege as other practitioners. That privilege, however, is very limited, for no one except the parties themselves is entitled to appear in any case without the leave of the Court. The Small-Debt Act (sec. 14), enacts 'That no procurators, solicitors, nor any persons practising the law, shall be allowed to appear or plead for any party without leave of the Court on special cause shewn, and such leave and the cause thereof shall in all cases be entered in the book of causes kept by the Sheriff-clerk.' If the defender is not a procurator I am not sure that he may not be quite accurately described as a 'solicitor' (for in Scotland that is not a nomen juris with a fixed technical meaning), and in any case I have little doubt that, being a notary accustomed to give advice and frame deeds, and entitled (under Aiken v. Kirk, 3 R. 595) to charge the same ad valorem and other fees as the members of any incorporated society of law-agents, the defender is a person practising 'the law' within the meaning of the statute. I cannot, therefore, interdict him from exercising such right as the statute gives him in the Small-Debt Court; and in the Debts Recovery Court there is no dispute between the parties requiring to be settled by interdict—the right not being claimed.

"I am also not satisfied that the pursuer has either title or interest to make the application. The parties are two rival practitioners, but the pursuer fails to shew what benefit he will gain by the defender being driven from the field. The usurpation of a practice may be a breach of law but it is for the public authority to enforce the law, and no private citizen is entitled to complain of its violation without shewing that it directly affects him in his personal and patrimonial rights. Interdict then becomes an appropriate remedy, for it is better to prevent a wrong than leave the party to a claim of damages after it is accom-

No. 85.

Feb. 29, 1888.
Milne v. Leslie.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—In point of fact it could be proved that the defender had not only practised in the Small-Debt Court, but in the Debts Recovery Court, and had even done so since the action was raised. The pursuer had plainly an interest to prevent this competition with him of a person having no right to practise. The first question was whether the defender was entitled with the Sheriff's leave to practise in the Small-Debt Court. That question fell to be decided on the construction of section 16 of the Law-Agents Act, 1873. The effect of that provision, the object of which was to prevent the evil caused by the practising of unqualified persons, was that in order to practise professionally for gain in the Small-Debt Court, which was one of the Courts of the Sheriff, the person so practising must (1) have the leave of the Sheriff in the particular case; and (2) be a qualified agent. The Sheriff's leave was requisite, because the Small-Debt Act of 1837 * had a special exclusion of professional assistance in that Court. The Sheriff could give that leave, but only to a qualified professional man to appear professionally. The enrolled law-agent had a right to practise in that Court plished. But here no damage is relevantly averred, or is indeed conceivable, unless we are to suppose that the pursuer has a grant of monopoly.

---

"In former times we were familiar in Scotland with exclusive trading corporations within burgh, the privileges of which were sometimes enforced by interdict, but always (so far as I am aware) by the corporation itself—never by an individual member. But the object of the Procurators Act was not to create a monopoly, or to call into existence a species of trades union of lawyers. The preamble of the Medical Act (21 and 22 Vict. cap. 90) explains the motive and purpose of all this kind of legislation. It rests on the expediency of enabling persons requiring medical or legal aid 'to distinguish qualified from unqualified practitioners.' The object was the protection of the public, and this is enforced by its being enacted in the case of medical men that a practitioner who falsely describes himself as a duly qualified physician, &c., shall be liable to a penalty of £20, which is recovered in Scotland by the procurator-fiscal or 'any other person' in the mode pointed out by sec. 41. The Procurators Act of 1865 is not so severe. It first declares that an agent possessing a certain qualification may be enrolled in the roll kept by the Sheriff-clerk of the Court where he wishes to practise for the sum of five shillings (sec. 13), and then it enacts that 'no person shall be allowed to practise as an agent in the Court of Session or any Sheriff Court until he has subscribed this roll' (sec. 16). This provision it is of course the duty of the Court to enforce—but as the Sheriff has no access to the roll he is entitled to assume that when audience is claimed by someone whose name is not on the roll the Sheriff-clerk will duly inform him of the fact. It is not to be supposed that this official will neglect his duty in this respect, and if that be so I fail to perceive what useful purpose the proposed interdict will serve. Evidently the time to enforce the statute is in open Court when the claim to appear and plead is actually made, and it is probably this consideration which induced the Legislature to omit from the present Law-Agents Act the provision in the repealed Procurators Act of 1865, that any law-agent might sue out an interdict against an unqualified practitioner. The title of a member to inform the Court of Session of any act of misconduct with a view to the exercise of discipline on a party already on the roll is a different matter. I therefore think that the present application is altogether incompetent, and I abstain from issuing the order on the defender which has been granted by the Sheriff-substitute, because the Act of Parliament is itself a sufficient standing order on the subject."

* The Small-Debt Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 41), enacts by sec. 14 that "No procurators, solicitors, nor any persons practising the law shall be allowed to appear or plead for any party without leave of the Court upon special cause shewn, and such leave and the cause thereof shall in all cases be entered in the book of causes kept by the Sheriff-clerk."

No. 85.
—
Feb. 29, 1888.
Milne v.
Leslie.

as one of the Courts of the jurisdiction, subject only to this, that there was a disqualification of all professional pleading, which in his case, but his only, could be removed by the Sheriff's leave to appear. The provision of the next section of the same Act* for the appearance of an absent party, by a member of his family, or someone else whom the Sheriff might allow, did not apply at all to persons appearing for a party in the practice of the business of an agent. The object of the Law-Agents Act of 1873 was to check the evil which had grown up of unqualified persons appearing and conducting cases in Court. The defender not having the statutory qualification to appear, the leave of the Sheriff could never supply it. [LORD YOUNG.—Your interdict should be against the Sheriff himself.] It would not be incompetent so to direct it, but that was not necessary. An inferior Judge might be interdicted from unlawfully giving audience to an unqualified person. Interdict directed against the defender was the appropriate remedy. It had been held in early cases that notaries had a right to prevent improper and unqualified persons from practising along with them.[1] In a recent case the right at common law of any enrolled law-agent to have an unsuitable person struck off the roll and prevented from practising had been affirmed.[2] The Law-Agents Act of 1873 provided no pecuniary penalty for unlawful practice such as the defender carried on, which was another reason for holding the remedy of interdict an appropriate one.

Argued for the respondent;—It was not maintained that the respondent had a right to appear in the Debts Recovery Court, but he might lawfully, with the Sheriff's leave, appear in the Small-Debt Court. He was then "such person as the Sheriff shall allow," and it was immaterial to the question that he received payment. It was the public advantage that was to be considered by the Sheriff in such a matter,[3] and not the interest of particular bodies. But even assuming that the public interest required that a notary-public quite able to conduct small-debt cases ought to be debarred from doing so, even with the Sheriff's leave, interdict was not an appropriate process for the purpose. In the first place, the process was one which practically asked the Sheriff to whom it was addressed to interdict himself from allowing the respondent to appear. Again, the only power ever given to an agent to interdict the practice of another was one which was conferred by the Procurators Act, 1865, and had with the rest of that Act been repealed by the Law-Agents Act of 1873.† The proper time and way to object to the respondent was when the appearance was made. The Sheriff, who was the best judge of the matter, could then refuse to hear the respondent if he thought fit.

---

* Sec. 15 enacts that "any defender, who has been duly cited, failing to appear personally, or by one of his family, or by such person as the Sheriff shall allow, such person not being an officer of Court, shall be held confessed, and the other party shall obtain decree against him; and in like manner, if the pursuer or prosecutor shall fail to appear personally, or by such person as the Sheriff shall allow, such person not being an officer of Court, the defender shall obtain decree of absolvitor, unless in either case a sufficient excuse for delay shall be stated."

[1] Mitchell v. Greig, Dec. 7, 1815, F.C.; Procurators of Paisley v. Craig, March 8, 1823, 2 S. 249; Sands v. Meffan, Jan. 20, 1829, 7 S. 290.

[2] Incorporated Society of Law-Agents v. Clark, Dec. 3, 1886, 14 R. 161.

[3] Graham v. Society of Advocates of Aberdeen, March 6, 1841, 3 D. 813.

† The Procurators (Scotland) Act, 1865 (repealed by the Law-Agents Act, 1873) (28 and 29 Vict. c. 85), provided (sec. 25)—"Any procurator shall be entitled to complain to the Sheriff in whose Court he is entitled to practise against any person practising in such Court who is not a procurator thereof; and the Sheriff shall, on such complaint being proved to his satisfaction, interdict such person from practice."

At advising,—

Lord Young.—This is a case of an unusual kind, and therefore of some interest. The pursuer of the application for interdict is an enrolled law-agent in Aberdeenshire, and he practises at Fraserburgh. He seeks to have interdict to prevent the defender, who is not an enrolled law-agent, "from practising as a law-agent for or on behalf of any litigant or litigants in any of the Courts to be held at Fraserburgh or elsewhere within the city or county of Aberdeen by the Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff, or his Substitutes, until such time as he shall have legally qualified himself so to do."

It is admitted that the defender is not an enrolled law-agent, and also that he is not entitled to practice in the Debts Recovery Court or in the ordinary Court of the Sheriff. But he contends that he is entitled to "act for" or "represent" others in the Small-Debt Court. I use these expressions because we have seen from the argument that a good deal may depend on the particular expression. "Acting as a law-agent" is one form of expression which has been used, and "represent" or "appear for" others with the permission of the Sheriff under the Act of Parliament is another. At all events, what the defender contends for is the right to represent others or appear for them, with the leave of the Sheriff, under the Small-Debt Act; and the question is whether he has that right. I shall therefore address myself to that interesting question in the first place, but I shall also have something to say on the form of the remedy.

The Small-Debt Act of 1837 was intended to confer a boon on the lieges by enabling them in a summary manner and at a small cost to recover small debts or defend themselves against small claims. For that purpose a special protection against law-agents is extended to them by section 14 of the statute. Of course in 1837, as now, procurators, solicitors, and others lawfully practising the law, were entitled to appear for others and represent them, and therefore without a prohibition they would in the exercise of their ordinary right have been entitled to appear for litigants in the Small-Debt Court. But the Legislature intended benignantly to protect the public from them, and prohibited law-agents from practising in that Court, as they would otherwise have been entitled to do, and so deprived them of the right which otherwise their professional position would have given. That prohibition, however, has attached to it the qualification that on special cause shewn law-agents may appear in the Small-Debt Court. The Legislature contemplated that there might occasionally be wealthy litigants in the Small-Debt Court, and serious questions to be argued there (and we have all known such cases), and therefore put it in the discretion of the Sheriff to remove that disability which in the interest of the public it had laid upon law-agents.

Again the Legislature, still compassionating the ordinary poor litigants, does not insist absolutely upon their appearing personally. The general rule is that they shall, but the Sheriff is permitted to relax that rule and to allow either party to appear and be represented by a member of his family or "by such person as the Sheriff shall allow, such person not being an officer of Court." That provision, like any provision of such a character, may be abused, but the general intention of it is plain, and is that the poor litigant is to be protected against legal practitioners, whose charges might be considerable, and be represented,

No. 85.
Feb. 29, 1888.
Milne v. Leslie.

with permission of the Sheriff, by any person not being an officer of Court. We are told that the consequence has been that a number of practitioners have started up in the Small-Debt Courts of large towns who are thought expert in ascertaining the subject of dispute, and representing the parties in Court, and examining their witnesses, and who ask only a moderate remuneration. This may become an abuse, but may be a great good, and I firmly believe it has been a prevailing good on the whole. The services of people quite competent for the work have been procured. Whether they have any action for their hire is another matter. It does not arise here. The point is that they are willing to give their services for what the litigants are willing to give them. This Mr Leslie, it appears, has been in the way of representing litigants in the Small-Debt Court with the leave of the Sheriff, and I see no illegality in his doing that. The permission may have been given, indiscreetly or not. I am not the judge of that. The Sheriff is the best judge of whether it should be given or withheld. If he gives it, he does so in the interest of the public, as I apprehend, and in the discharge of his duty to the public, and so also if he withhold it. I cannot pronounce that in giving permission to Mr Leslie to perform this part he would have been acting illegally.

It is, I think, clear that this matter stands as I have described it under the Small-Debt Act of 1837, and I rather understood the Dean of Faculty to admit that, and to put his case on the Law-Agents Act of 1873. I think the provision of that Act which is founded on has no bearing at all upon the matter, and I am quite certain it was not intended to have any, or to interfere at all with the Small-Debt Act of 1837. The particular clause of the Act of 1873 which is founded on is the 16th, which is a section having regard to an institution established by that Act, namely, the roll of agents practising before each Court in Scotland. Before 1873 the practitioners in each Sheriff Court were admitted by that Court, and there was no other authority for doing so than the Court itself, while the agents admitted to the Supreme Court were in like manner confined to practice in that Court itself. The Act of 1873 requires all law-agents, wherever they are to practise, to be admitted in the same way, by the Court of Session, and being so admitted they may practise anywhere in Scotland. There is to be a roll of agents practising in each Sheriff Court and in the Court of Session, and section 16, which never was intended to bear upon the Small-Debt Act, and I think does not bear upon it, relates to that roll, providing that "no person shall be allowed to practise as an agent in the Court of Session, or in any Sheriff Court, until he shall have subscribed the roll of agents practising before such Court, or after his name shall have been struck off such roll, unless the same shall have been subsequently restored thereto."

I must say I think it requires some ingenuity to make that section bear upon the Small-Debt Act, which otherwise it is conceded is clear upon the matter.

I am therefore clearly of opinion that the defender is entitled with the Sheriff's leave—and he admits he has no right without it—to appear for and represent the interest of any pursuer or defender in the Sheriff's Small-Debt Court, and I assume that the Sheriff will have regard to the interest of the litigants in considering whether to give leave or not.

As to the Debts Recovery Court and the ordinary Sheriff Court, I am not apprehensive that the Sheriff will give permission to appear in these Courts to anyone not duly enrolled as a law-agent in his Court. The Sheriff says he will not grant such leave. Even if I thought this were the right form of process I would not be disposed to entertain an application to interdict a person from appearing, or the Sheriff from allowing him to appear, in the Debts Recovery or ordinary Court on such a statement as is before us here.

On the form of process I entirely agree with the Sheriff-principal. To some extent I agree also with the Sheriff-substitute, when he says the case is not one for an interdict. The proper result of that view is, I think, the dismissal of the application. He says the proper view is that the application is for an order of Court. Well then, if the application is for an order of Court, and the Sheriff-substitute grants, but the Sheriff refuses it, it is to me a novelty that the person applying for the order and being refused it can appeal the refusal to this Court as in an ordinary litigation.

But on the form of process I agree entirely with the Sheriff-principal that the proper time to take the objection to Leslie's appearance is when the appearance is made. I do not think it is a case for application for an interdict. I am strengthened in that opinion by the fact that whereas by the Act of 1865 there was provision made for an application for such an interdict, that provision has been repealed. It was, I suppose, found inconvenient, and it was therefore repealed.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that this application for interdict ought to be refused de plano, and with expenses.

Lord Craighill.—I concur with Lord Young. I have no difficulty as to the Small-Debt Act. I do not think that section 16 of the Act of 1873 affects it. The latter Act assumes two things in all its provisions (1) that enrolment gives the right to appear in all Sheriff Courts; and (2) that no other title than that which is conferred by the statute is required for practising in any of the Courts to which its provisions apply. If these views are right then so far as regards appearance in Court that Act can neither give nor take away a right otherwise possessed.

The Small-Debt Act of 1837, by section 14, enacts that procurators, by which we now mean law-agents enrolled under the Act of 1873, shall not appear for a party in the Small-Debt Court "without leave of the Court upon special cause shewn." There is nothing in the Act of 1873 which overcomes that. The case provided for in the Act of 1873 has no application to the provisions of the Act of 1837. It provides that agents must be enrolled, and once an agent is enrolled he has a title to appear. Nothing more is needed to make certain his right of audience. That is not the case with the Small-Debt Act. There an enrolled law-agent is not entitled to audience. That which gives the right there is the leave of the Sheriff. On that view I come to the conclusion that there is no ground for the interdict sought. In fact, though not in form, the thing sought is to interdict the Sheriff from giving his permission to the defender to appear. I think there is no warrant for that. The Sheriff is the judge of that. He is charged with the protection of all concerned. If there is any hardship the Sheriff's duty is to prevent it. If he do not give leave, no one appearing for another has audience, and his leave, if given, is the only title.

As to the Debts Recovery Court the defender does not insist in any right to appear there. But I think there is an interest in an enrolled law-agent to object to the right of a person who is not such to appear. Such a person is an unauthorised competitor with him. I think that whether there be any other remedy or not we ought not to conclude that he cannot come to the Court for an interdict against such a person appearing. But in doing so the enrolled law-agent is not acting in the public interest as has been suggested. He is acting for his own interest and is protecting himself.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—After as much consideration as I have been able to give to this case, I am disposed to take a different view from that which has been expressed by Lord Young and Lord Craighill.

It is now certain that no one but an enrolled law-agent is entitled to practise in any Sheriff Court. I think that was the law before 1873 and before 1865. I am not concerned to inquire whether that was the common law rule or not. It is now matter of statutory provision that no one but a duly enrolled law-agent may practise in any Sheriff Court.

That being clear, the next thing to consider is to what Court that statutory provision applies. I see no exception to the generality of the words. The Small-Debt Court is one of the Sheriff's Courts as much as the Debts Recovery Court or the ordinary Court, and hence it seems to me a matter of plain statutory declaration that no one is entitled to practise in it as a law-agent except a duly enrolled law-agent.

It is true that in the Small-Debt Act there exists a certain disqualification which is applicable to law-agents. They are not entitled as of right, as they are in the other Courts, to appear for their clients in the Small-Debt Court. They are only entitled to do so with the leave of the Sheriff given in the particular suit. This cannot take the shape of a general permission. The permission is limited to each particular case. But it seems to me to follow from what I have said that the Sheriff has no right to give leave to anyone to practise as an agent in his Court except only an enrolled law-agent. For the Sheriff cannot confer a right to practise. It is a right given by a statute to certain persons, and he can only give leave to them to appear in particular suits. Therefore I think that the law-agent is the only person entitled to practise in the Sheriff Court, and that he is the only person to whom the Sheriff can give leave to act as a law-agent in any particular suit in the Small-Debt Court.

The defender is not a law-agent, but he maintains that he is entitled to take the cases of people who may employ him in the Small-Debt Court, and conduct them on their behalf for remuneration. I cannot see that that is anything else than practising as a law-agent. It is true that he only claims to do so with the leave of the Sheriff, but the Sheriff is, in my opinion, not entitled to give him right to practise as a law-agent.

It is said that the Sheriff may do so under section 15 of the Small-Debt Act, 1837. I cannot read that as applying to the employment of law-agents. They had been dealt with under section 14, which provides for their appearance only by leave given for the particular case. The 15th section does not relate to persons practising as law-agents. It enables the Sheriff to give decree condemnator or absolvitor if the party does not appear personally, or by a member of his family, or by such other person as the Sheriff shall allow. It enables the Sheriff to allow another person to appear for a pursuer or defender. But I do not think that in the exercise of that power he is entitled to permit a person to practise as an agent. I do not say to what extent his power is limited, or how it is to be exercised. I only say that it is not permissible under that section to allow a person to practise as an agent who has not the legal qualification. The Sheriff cannot dispense with or set at naught a statutory provision as to the qualification of the persons who may appear in that capacity. To hold otherwise seems to be equivalent to holding that the Sheriff may create a special class of law-agents to act as legal practitioners before the Small-Debt Court.

No. 85.

Feb. 29, 1888.
Milne v. Leslie.

It follows, if I am right in what I have said, that an unqualified person who appears in the Small-Debt Court is a person doing an unlawful thing, and if so, that unlawful thing ought to be stopped.

It requires little interest to give a title to complain of what is unlawful. But the pursuer here has, I think, a plain title and interest to stop an unlawful thing which interferes more or less with his practice of his profession and his earnings in it.

Therefore, as to practising in the Small-Debt Court, I think interdict should be granted.

There is little importance in the question as to the Debts Recovery Court. The Sheriffs both think, and there is no doubt, that the defender is not entitled to practise in it. The respondent himself does not contend that he is, and has stated at the bar that he does not intend to claim so to do.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I so entirely concur with Lord Young in the result at which he arrives, and in the reasons for which he arrives at it, that it is unnecessary for me to enter at length into this question, though it is one of some public and some professional interest.

In the first place, I think it is clear that this application cannot be sustained under the Act of 1837. Under that Act we have not a leave given to a qualified agent to appear, but a statutory prohibition against his doing so except with the leave of the Sheriff. From plain views of expediency, the Court is to be one not of lawyers, but a popular tribunal where each party is to plead his own case, but in which the Sheriff may give leave to appear to one who is not himself a party. I cannot, for my part, say that the Sheriff, if he give leave to appear to one who makes a charge for his services, is doing an illegal thing.

In the next place, I think that the Law-Agents Act of 1873 does not apply to the matter at all. Its object was to provide that a qualification for one Court should be a qualification for the other Courts throughout the country. It was not intended to interfere with the Act of 1837, and particularly with the Sheriff's discretion to permit one not himself a party to appear, and I think it has not done so.

As to the Debts Recovery Court, no case with regard to it has been established. It will be time enough to decide it when it arises. It does not seem a matter for much doubt, for the respondent does not maintain that he has a right to act for clients in the Debts Recovery Court.

As to the form of the remedy, I am strongly of opinion that interdict is here an inconvenient, and I rather think it is an incompetent, remedy.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff.

J. D. MACAULAY, S.S.C.—BOYD, JAMESON, & KELLY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 86.
—
Feb. 29, 1888.
Menzies v. Whyte.

ROBERT MENZIES, Pursuer (Appellant).—M'Lennan.
WILLIAM THOMAS WHYTE, Defender (Respondent).—Gunn.

Reparation—Lease—Urban tenement—Injury to business by operations of neighbouring occupier.—Where a tenant of an urban tenement sues his landlord for damages in respect that his rights as occupant have been encroached on by operations carried on by the proprietor of a neighbouring tenement, he must aver, in order to found a relevant action, that he has applied to his landlord to have his rights protected, and that the landlord, in breach of his duty, has refused, or unduly delayed, to protect them.

1st Division.
Sheriff of the Lothians.
M.

ROBERT MENZIES, fishmonger, Leith, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh against William Thomas Whyte, C.A., Edinburgh, concluding for payment of £50.

The pursuer averred that the defender let to him the premises, No. 173 Morrison Street, at a rent of £15 per annum, for three years, from Whitsunday 1887, to be occupied by him as a fishmonger's shop.

He averred;—(Cond. 3) "The pursuer entered into possession on 1st July 1887. On the 4th of that month, being three days after pursuer's entry, operations were commenced to take down the old buildings immediately to the west of pursuer's said premises, and a new tenement is in the course of erection on the site. In these operations there has been erected on the west side of pursuer's front shop a hoarding of about six feet high, and which extends from the front wall of said shop and into Morrison Street 36 feet or thereby. Said hoarding encroaches on the front wall of pursuer's said shop, cutting off or covering part of his signboard; besides the hoarding is so defective that it does not afford protection against lime and other dust from said operations reaching pursuer's said premises, and destroying his goods. The drainage pipe within the front railing of pursuer's said premises, and connected therewith, has been cut, and the pursuer deprived of the use thereof. Part of the oven in the pursuer's back shop, and which oven is required by him in his business, has been taken down, and an opening made, through which any person may enter the premises. As said new building is proceeded with, the pursuer will be deprived of the window light in the centre room or division of said premises. By these proceedings the pursuer has been deprived of the use of said shop and premises, and he has been compelled to leave the same, and relinquish his business." (Cond. 4) "The pursuer has sustained loss and damage through being obliged to leave the shop, and abandon his business there, in the establishment of which he has incurred considerable expense, and which business was turning out to be very lucrative. It was the duty of the defender to have protected the pursuer in the beneficial occupancy of said shop and premises, and having failed in that duty, the defender, as pursuer's landlord, is liable in damages to the pursuer, which he estimates at not less than £50 sterling, the sum pursued for. The pursuer has repeatedly complained to the defender, and informed him that the pursuer was unable to carry on his business, and that he would be compelled to leave the premises unless the grounds of complaint were removed, but the pursuer has received no redress."

A letter, dated 12th August 1887, from the pursuer to the defender, and quoted in full by the Lord President in his opinion, p. 472, was lodged in process.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender having let to the pursuer the premises as condescended on, and the pursuer having been compelled to leave the same through his being deprived of the use thereof, the pursuer is entitled to damages as concluded for. (2) The defender being proprietor of the premises let by him to the pursuer, is bound to protect him in the useful possession thereof, and the defender having failed to do so, and the pursuer having been compelled to remove from the same under the circumstances condescended on, the pursuer is entitled to decree as craved, with expenses.

The defender pleaded;—(1) This action is irrelevant as regards the defender, and should be dismissed, with expenses. (3) The operations complained of not being under the control of the defender, he is not responsible therefor, and the defender should be assoilzied, with expenses. (4) The operations complained of were not such as to warrant the relinquishment of the business by the pursuer, and the closing of the premises by him, and any loss sustained by the pursuer by cessation of profit, proceeding from the due exercise of proprietary rights, must be borne by the pursuer himself, and the defender should therefore be assoilzied, with expenses.

On 21st October 1887 the Sheriff-substitute (Rutherfurd) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer's averments are not relevant or sufficient to infer liability for damages on the part of the defender: Therefore dismisses the action, and decerns."

The pursuer appealed to the First Division, and argued;—The pursuer had called on the landlord to put a stop to the operations complained of, which were a clear invasion of a tenant's rights, and he had failed to take any steps to do so. The failure was therefore not unintentional on the landlord's part, but wilful, and he was in such circumstances liable in damages.[1]

Argued for the defender;—The tenant had taken the law into his own hands, and shut up his shop. His proper remedy would have been to have intimated to the landlord that failing his stopping the nuisance, he would remove from the premises and hold him liable. He had not done so, and did not aver that he had. The landlord was therefore not liable.[2]

LORD PRESIDENT.—The premises let by the defender to the pursuer were to be occupied by the latter as a fish shop. The allegation of the pursuer is that he entered into possession on 1st July 1887. Immediately after that, viz., on the 4th of that month, certain operations were commenced to take down old buildings immediately to the west of his shop. In consequence of these operations he says that he suffered much inconvenience. A hoarding was erected which, as he alleges, encroached on his shop, and being of defective workmanship, allowed dust and lime to reach his premises, whereby his goods were destroyed. So far it was, I think, admitted by the appellant's counsel that his averments were not relevant, but he relies on what immediately follows. "The drainage pipe within the front railing of pursuer's said premises, and connected therewith, has been cut, and the pursuer deprived of the use thereof. Part of the oven in the pursuer's back shop, and which oven is required by him in his business, has been taken down, and an opening made through which any person may enter the premises." Now, these are undeniably encroachments on the pursuer's right of occupation to which he is not bound to submit, whether they are made by his landlord or any other person. The pursuer being a tenant on

---

[1] Ersk. Inst. ii. 6, 43; Deans v. Abercromby, 1681, M. 10,122; Goskirk v. Edinburgh Railway Station Access Co., Dec. 19, 1863, 2 Macph. 383; Laurent v. Lord Advocate, March 6, 1869, 7 Macph. 607, 41 Scot. Jur. 329.

[2] Gardner v. Walker & Donald, July 19, 1862, 24 D. 1430, 34 Scot. Jur. 600.

No. 86.

Feb. 29, 1888.
Menzies v.
Whyte.

a short tenure, would naturally go to his landlord in the first instance. If he had done so, and the landlord had refused to take any steps to stop the nuisance, the action would have been relevant, but in order to make the action relevant it is essential that he should make an averment that he took that course—that he should aver that he called the landlord's attention to the nuisance, and that he asked him to have it remedied. Here, however, the pursuer does not make such an averment in relevant terms. He says in condescendence 4,—"The pursuer has sustained loss and damage through being obliged to leave the shop and abandon his business there, in the establishment of which he has incurred considerable expense, and which business was turning out to be very lucrative. It was the duty of the defender to have protected the pursuer in the beneficial occupancy of said shop and premises, and having failed in that duty, the defender, as pursuer's landlord, is liable in damages to the pursuer." That is not a relevant statement. To make it relevant the pursuer ought to have stated that he applied to the landlord to defend him against the operations complained of, and that the landlord either declined to do so or delayed doing so, so as to amount to a breach of duty on his part. There is no averment of that kind. In place of that he merely refers us to a letter written by him to the defender, which we would willingly embody in cond. 4 if it would make the action relevant. The letter is in these terms:—"By the operations on the tenement, or in the building of a new tenement, adjoining Mr Menzies' shop at 173 Morrison Street, his business has been stopped, and the shop shut. A hoarding has been put up in front of, and close to, and on the front wall of the shop, the window in the centre division of the shop has been broken, and in time will be built over. Part of the back wall has been taken down, and through the opening the shop can be entered. Mr Menzies will claim damages for the stoppage thus put to his business, and being compelled to leave the shop." It appears, then, that the pursuer, without previously calling on his landlord to defend him, shut up his shop, and put a stop to his business there. This does not shew any failure of duty on the landlord's part, but, on the contrary, a failure on the tenant's part to do his duty. In respect of that failure, I think the pursuer's case breaks down.

Lord Adam and Lord Kinnear concurred.

Lord Mure and Lord Shand were absent.

The Court refused the appeal.

Robert Broatch, L.A.—Cownie & Galbraith, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 87.

Feb. 29, 1888.
M'Nab v.
Campbell.

ROBERT M'NAB, Pursuer (Respondent).—J. C. Lorimer.
JEAN MORRISON OR CAMPBELL AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Appellants).— M'Kechnie—Shaw.

Lease—Crofter—Removing—Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29), secs. 1, 19, and 34.—The Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, sec. 1, enacts that a crofter shall not be removed from his croft except for breach of certain specified conditions. Sec. 19 enacts that the Crofters Commission, after due inquiry, shall ascertain what parishes within certain counties are crofting parishes, "and shall determine that this Act shall apply to such parishes: Such determination shall be reported to the Secretary for Scotland in one or more reports, and may be confirmed by him with or without modification: From and after the date of such confirmation this Act shall apply to the parishes included in the determination . . . Within the parishes to which this Act is determined to apply as aforesaid, this Act shall apply to every crofter who is the

No. 87.

Feb. 29, 1888.
M'Nab v. Campbell.

tenant of a holding at the passing of this Act, and to his heirs and legatees, in the same manner as if the tenancy were a lease . . . ." Sec. 34 defines "crofter" to mean "any person who at the passing of this Act is tenant of a holding from year to year, who resides on his holding, the annual rent of which does not exceed £30 in money, and which is situated in a crofting parish, and the successors of such person in the holding, being his heirs or legatees . . ."

A person who at the passing of the Act was a crofter complying with the conditions of sec. 34 died before the parish in which his croft was situated had been declared a crofting parish in terms of sec. 19. In an action of removing by his landlord against his heir, who was in possession and occupation of the croft, held that the defender was a crofter in the sense of the Act, and entitled to resist removing, subject to the conditions of sec. 1.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Argyllshire.
I.

THE CROFTERS HOLDINGS (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29), was passed on 25th June 1886.

On 14th September 1886 Hugh Campbell, the tenant and occupant of a house and croft in the United Parish of Kilninian and Kilmore, in Mull, for the year ending Whitsunday 1887, died.

On 24th October 1886 intimation (dated 22d October) reached the Sheriff-clerk at Tobermory that Kilninian and Kilmore had been declared a crofting parish under the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886.

On 10th November 1886 Dr Robert M'Nab, of Penmore, the proprietor of the house and croft of which Campbell had been tenant, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Tobermory against Jean Morrison or Campbell, the widow of Campbell's brother, and Colin Campbell (a minor), her son and Campbell's heir-at-law, who had possessed Campbell's house and croft since his death, for removing at Whitsunday 1887, on the ground that the tenancy then expired.

In defence Mrs Campbell and her son founded on sec. 1 of the Crofters Holdings Act, which enacted that "a crofter shall not be removed from the holding of which he is tenant, except in consequence of the breach of one or more of the conditions following," none of which were alleged by the pursuer to have been contravened, and also on sec. 34, which defined "crofter" and "crofting parish."*

In answer to this defence the pursuer founded on sec. 19 of the Act,†

---

* The Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, sec. 34, enacts,—"In this Act 'crofter' means any person who at the passing of this Act is tenant of a holding from year to year, who resides on his holding, the annual rent of which does not exceed £30 in money, and which is situated in a crofting parish, and the successors of such person in the holding, being his heirs or legatees. 'Crofting parish' means a parish in which there are at the commencement of this Act or have been within eighty years prior thereto, holdings consisting of arable land held with a right of pasturage in common with others, and in which there still are tenants of holdings from year to year, who reside on their holdings, the annual rent of which respectively does not exceed £30 in money at the commencement of this Act."

† The Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, sec. 19, enacts,—"The Crofters Commission after due inquiry shall ascertain what parishes or islands or districts forming aggregates of parishes within the counties of Argyll, Inverness, Ross and Cromarty, Sutherland, Caithness, Orkney and Shetland, are crofting parishes, or aggregates of crofting parishes, and shall determine that this Act shall apply to such parishes. Such determination shall be reported to the Secretary for Scotland in one or more reports, and may be confirmed by him with or without modification. From and after the date of such confirmation this Act shall apply to the parishes included in the determination. . . . Within the parishes to which this Act is determined to apply as aforesaid, this Act shall apply to every crofter who is the tenant of a holding at the passing of this Act, and to his heirs and legatees, in the same manner as if the tenancy were a lease. . . ."

No. 87. and contended that, as it had not been determined under that section that the Act applied to the parish of Kilninian and Kilmore until after Campbell's death, neither he nor the defenders were entitled to the benefit of the Act.

Feb. 29, 1888.
M'Nab v. Campbell.

On 19th May 1887 the Sheriff-substitute (MacLachlan) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defender Colin Campbell is heir to the deceased Hugh Campbell, who died in the month of September last, and as such is entitled to succeed to him in the dwelling-house and croft on the pursuer's estate of Penmore of which the said Hugh Campbell was tenant: Finds that the said Colin Campbell cannot be removed on the grounds stated in the petition; therefore dismisses the action: Finds the pursuer liable to the defenders in the expenses of process."

On appeal the Sheriff (Forbes Irvine), on 13th July, recalled this interlocutor, and gave decree as craved.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—On the construction of section 34 by itself, Hugh Campbell at his death was plainly a crofter in the sense of that section, and the defender Colin, as his heir, was entitled to succeed to him in his rights under the Act. But it was said that section 19 must be read as controlling section 34—that a crofter, though fulfilling all the requirements of section 34, did not become a crofter in the sense of the Act until his parish had been determined to be a crofting parish, and that determination had been confirmed by the Secretary for Scotland. If that were the true reading of the Act, it was a most unmeaning and inequitable provision, for it did not give all crofters equal rights—some parishes had been early declared to be crofting parishes, but others, which would undoubtedly be so declared, were still undetermined. The true view, however, was that the proceedings of the Commissioners and the Secretary for Scotland were executorial merely, and that they drew back to the date of the Act.

Argued for the pursuer;—It was impossible to read section 19 in the way proposed by the defenders. It could only mean that until the Secretary for Scotland had confirmed the determination of the Commissioners the Act did not apply to the parish, and consequently no one within the parish could take advantage of any of its provisions.

At advising,—

LORD CRAIGHILL.—This is an action of removing at the instance of the proprietor of Penmore, in the island of Mull, and it is directed against Mrs Campbell and her son Colin Campbell, who claim to be crofters on the estate of Penmore. The facts are not in controversy, and appear to be these. The late Hugh Campbell, uncle of Colin Campbell, one of the defenders, was tenant of the house and croft of which the defenders claim to be crofters. He was a yearly tenant, the tenancy with reference to which the present proceedings have arisen extending from Whitsunday 1886 to Whitsunday 1887. For how long previously he had been tenant has not been explained, and probably is not of importance. He did not survive the expiry of his tenancy, for he lived only till September 1886. At the time of his death there were living with him the two defenders, one of whom, Colin Campbell, his nephew, was his heir-at-law, and the other, Mrs Campbell, was Colin's mother, and had things remained as it was expected for some time before the death of Campbell that they would, there is no doubt that Mrs Campbell and her son, who came in place of the uncle, would have been removeable on the expiry of the tenancy according to the contract at Whitsunday 1887. But before Martinmas 1886, when the summons of removing was served, an event occurred which is vital to the decision of this case, namely, the passing of the

No. 87.
Feb. 29, 1888.
M'Nab v. Campbell.

Crofters Act of 1886. The question is whether that Act alters the rights of the parties to this contract, and if so, what is the change thereby effected. There can be no doubt that but for the Act the landlord would have been entitled to remove his tenants, after proper warning, at the expiry of the lease. But the Act makes a change in the position of crofters, giving them a right to the continued occupation of their holdings, except in certain events specified in sec. 1 of the Act, none of which occur in the present instance, and the defenders contend that Colin Campbell being the heir-at-law of his uncle, who survived the passing of the Crofters Act, and the parish in which the holding was situated having been declared a crofting parish, he cannot be removed. The Sheriff-substitute takes that view, holding that the Act applies to the case. His opinion was that the late Hugh Campbell having been alive when the Act passed, and Colin being his heir-at-law and in occupation when the Act became operative in consequence of the parish of Kilninian, in which the croft is situated, having been declared a crofting parish, he cannot be removed, because the ground of removal was not within the exceptions contained in sec. 1 of the Act. The Sheriff takes the opposite view. His opinion is that Hugh Campbell died before the Act in regard to one of its essential conditions was fulfilled, having died before the determination of the Commissioners declaring Kilninian a crofting parish had been confirmed by the Secretary for Scotland, as required by section 19 of the Act. The result, in the Sheriff's view, is that Colin Campbell is not entitled to the benefit of the Act, because he was not tenant when the Act was passed into law, and Hugh Campbell, the tenant at that date, did not survive till the Act had been declared to apply to the parish. In short, the Sheriff-substitute thinks that it is enough if Hugh Campbell was alive when the Act passed, while the Sheriff thinks that he must live till the parish to which his holding belongs has actually been declared a crofting parish.

Now, this resolves itself into a question of the interpretation of an Act of Parliament. I think this is one of the cases in which a liberal interpretation ought to be given, and all the more is it necessary that such an interpretation should be given to prevent any defeat of what I think must obviously be assumed to be the spirit and intendment of the Act.

The first clause enacts that a crofter shall not be removed from the holding of which he is tenant except in consequence of the breach of one or more of certain conditions which the clause proceeds to specify. The first question therefore is, was Hugh Campbell, who was in occupation in June, when the Act passed, but who died before the confirmation of the Commissioners' determination by the Secretary for Scotland, a crofter in the sense of the Act of Parliament? All the essentials as regards occupation were fulfilled, but we must refer for light upon the question to the definition of the word "crofter" in section 34. That definition is, "In this Act 'crofter' means any person who at the passing of the Act is tenant of a holding from year to year, who resides on his holding, the annual rent of which does not exceed thirty pounds in money, and which is situated in a crofting parish, and the successors of such person in the holding, being his heirs or legatees."

It is quite plain that the first part of that definition applied to Hugh Campbell. He was a crofter at the passing of the Act, he was a tenant of his holding from year to year, he resided on his holding, the annual rent of which did not exceed £30, and the holding is now situated in what has been designated a crofting parish. It does not appear that there is anything awanting in this

No. 87.

Feb. 29, 1888.
M'Nab v.
Campbell.

case to comply with this definition. It does not say that to be a crofter at the passing of the Act will not be enough. Nothing of the kind. The expression used is a very remarkable one—"Anyone who at the passing of this Act is" in the occupation of a croft upon a yearly tenancy. It is not "was" but "is." There may be a little difficulty as regards the time at which the parish becomes a crofting parish, but anything awanting in that respect is made up for by the direction that "crofter" shall include the heirs and successors of the man in possession at the passing of the Act. Thus Hugh Campbell remained in his croft until his death in September, and when he died the other part of the definition comes in—"heirs and successors." There was thus all that was necessary in the way of occupation, and that was followed by the designation of the parish by the Commission, and the approval of that designation by the Secretary for Scotland.

The only other part of the Act requiring to be specially referred to is the 19th section, which enacts that "the Crofters Commission after due inquiry shall ascertain what parishes or islands or districts forming aggregates of parishes" within certain counties "are crofting parishes, and shall determine that this Act shall apply to such parishes. Such determination shall be reported to the Secretary for Scotland in one or more reports and may be confirmed by him with or without modification. From and after the date of such confirmation this Act shall apply to the parishes included in the determination." Now the provisions of the Act, no doubt, can only be carried out after these proceedings have been completed, but there is nothing in that, according to my view of the matter, which detracts from the character stamped upon "crofter" and "heirs and successors" in the occupation of the croft at the time of the passing of the Act. The rest of the section, which I have still to read, is of some moment, for it says —"Within the parishes to which the Act is determined to apply as aforesaid, this Act shall apply to every crofter who is the tenant of a holding at the passing of the Act, and to his heirs and legatees, in the same manner as if the tenancy were a lease." It is to apply to the man in occupation at the passing of the Act, and if he is not alive at the time when the Commissioners designate the parish and the Secretary for Scotland approves, the other portion of the section comes to receive effect, and indeed, if that were not so, the Act in many cases, as in this, would become of no avail. I do not think there is room for doubt. I do not see how you can get the better of that reading. I quite see how a plausible complexion may be given to a reading the other way, but I do not think the difficulty is a great one. I therefore take the same view as the Sheriff-substitute. I am obliged to dissent from the other view which was adopted by the Sheriff. It would seriously encroach on the provisions of the statute, and the rights intended to be conferred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal; recall the interlocutor appealed against, and assoilzie the defender, with expenses."

CURROR, COWPER, & CURROR, W.S.—F. J. MARTIN, W.S.—Agents.

WALKER & DICK, Petitioners (Appellants).—Gloag—W. Campbell.
MOSES PARK AND ANOTHER, Objectors (Respondents).—
Sir Charles Pearson—Low.

No. 88.

Feb. 29, 1888.
Walker & Dick v. Park.

Superior and Vassal—Building restrictions.—By feu-contract dated in 1855, Allan, the vassal, bound himself to erect two villas of specified dimensions and style, and Dixon, the superior, bound himself to take the whole feuars of the remaining portions of his estate bound in similar terms, and to insert in their feu-rights the like clauses with reference to the erection of buildings. These obligations were appointed to be inserted in the infeftment, and to be validly referred to in all future conveyances of the feu.

In 1862, Dixon granted a feu to Hunter by a feu-contract which contained clauses obliging him to erect villas only, and obliging the superior to take the feuars of the ground "immediately adjoining to the north" similarly bound.

In 1883, Allan and Dixon executed a deed by which they discharged each other of the foregoing obligations, and in the same year Dixon feued to Allan an additional piece of ground to the north of Hunter's feu, but not adjoining it, under a contract which permitted the erection of tenements of dwelling-houses and shops.

In 1887 Allan presented a petition to the Dean of Guild for warrant to erect tenements of dwelling-houses in flats and shops on his additional feu.

The petition was opposed by Hunter, who objected to the erection of tenements and shops, founding, in the first place, on the feu-contract of 1855, which he maintained created a jus quæsitum in favour of the other feuars, rendering the unrestricted title of 1883 null, and, in the second place, on his own title.

Held (on appeal from the judgment of the Dean of Guild, which gave effect to Hunter's objections) that Allan's title was not subject to any restrictions in favour of Hunter, and that as it was not alleged that he had taken it in the knowledge that it was in violation of any obligation by the superior in favour of Hunter, he was entitled to obtain the authority craved.

Dean of Guild—Jurisdiction.—Held (per the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Craighill) that the Dean of Guild in considering a petition for a lining has no jurisdiction to entertain the question whether, on a construction of the titles of other feuars, a restriction ought to be imported into the title of the petitioner, when that title is in itself unambiguous and unrestricted.

2D DIVISION.
Dean of Guild of Crosshill.
M.

BY feu-disposition, dated 25th May 1855, William Johnston, trustee for William Dixon of Crosshill, feued a portion of the lands of Crosshill, extending to about three acres, to James Allan. The feu-disposition contained the following clauses:—"But these presents are granted and accepted, and the subjects hereby conveyed are disponed with and under the following conditions, provisions, and obligations, viz.:—That the said James Allan and his foresaids shall be bound to erect upon the said piece of ground a neat dwelling-house, or separate dwelling-houses, or villas, or cottages, which shall cost at least £300 each, exclusive of the ground." Then followed conditions regarding the style of the dwelling-houses and the formation and maintenance of roads and sewers, but there was no express prohibition of the erection of buildings other than dwelling-houses, villas, or cottages. The deed then continued,—"And that I, the said William Johnston, as trustee foresaid, and my foresaids, shall be bound and obliged to take the whole feuars or purchasers of the remaining portions of Crosshill lands bound in similar terms, and to insert in their feu-rights, dispositions, or other conveyances, the like clauses with reference to the erection of buildings, and formation and upkeeping of the same . . . and of the streets and sewers therein, as are hereinbefore inserted; which conditions, provisions, and obligations, are appointed to be inserted in the infeftment to follow hereon, and thereafter validly referred to in all future conveyances and investitures of the said plot or piece of ground."

No. 88.
—
Feb. 29, 1888.
Walker & Dick v. Park.

In 1868 the trustees of James Allan, as proprietors of the ground feued to him in 1855, brought an action against the testamentary trustees of William Dixon to have them interdicted from feuing the lands of Crosshill without taking the feuars bound by similar restrictions as in the feu-disposition to Allan. In this action the Court of Session granted interdict, and this judgment was affirmed on appeal.—Allan's Trustees v. Dixon's Trustees, Dec. 9, 1868, 7 Macph. 193, aff. July 12, 1870, 8 Macph. (H. L.) 182.

On 25th May 1883, by deed of mutual discharge and assignation, proceeding on the narrative of the feu-disposition of 1855, and of the interdict granted in 1868, Allan's trustees on the one hand renounced and discharged the obligations in their favour in the feu-disposition, to take the whole feuars or purchasers of the remaining portions of Crosshill lands bound in similar terms, and to insert in their feu-rights, dispositions, or other conveyances the like clauses with reference to the erection of buildings and formation and upkeeping of the same, and of the streets and sewers therein as were inserted in the feu-disposition, and declared the lands of Crosshill, "now belonging to" Dixon's trustees, "to be now and for ever freed, disburdened, and disencumbered thereof, declaring that the said" Dixon's trustees "and their successors in office and disponees, shall in all time coming be entitled to feu and dispose of all or any part of the said lands of Crosshill, now held by them, without taking the feuars and purchasers thereof bound in terms of the said obligation", and Dixon's trustees on the other hand renounced and discharged the conditions, provisions, and obligations created by and contained in the feu-disposition, with reference to the erection of buildings and formation and upkeeping of the same, and of the streets and sewers therein, but that only in so far as the said conditions, provisions, and obligations applied to and affected the portion feued to Allan and belonging to his trustees, and declared the said portion to be now and for ever freed, disburdened, and disencumbered of the said conditions, provisions, and obligations.

On 28th May 1883 Dixon's trustees feued another portion of the lands of Crosshill to Allan's trustees. The feu-contract, which proceeded on the narrative of the deed of discharge, provided that the buildings to be erected on this feu "shall be suited for and shall only be occupied and used as dwelling-houses or shops, and dwelling-houses as hereinafter provided," and the subsequent clauses of the deed shewed that tenements of dwelling-houses and shops might be erected.

In May 1887 Messrs Walker & Dick, who had taken a feu from Allan's trustees of a portion of this last-mentioned ground, but had not feudalised their title, presented a petition to the Dean of Guild of Crosshill for authority to erect five tenements of houses and shops on their feu.

The petition was opposed by two other feuars on Crosshill estate, Messrs Moses Park and James Hamilton, who objected to the erection of the tenements and shops.

Park's title was a feu-contract granted by W. S. Dixon, William Dixon's successor, dated August 1874, by which Park bound himself to erect on the ground feued two villas or cottages, each of which were to cost at least £300. There was no obligation binding the superior to restrict the remaining feuars in regard to the houses they might erect, and at the end of the deed there was this clause:—"Declaring that the said first party [Dixon] and his foresaids shall be entitled at any time at their own discretion to discharge or modify in favour of the said second party or his foresaids all or any of the said burdens, reservations, conditions, provisions, declarations, obligations, and others without consent of any of the other feuars or disponees of any lands belonging to them, these presents being intended only to regulate and express the terms of the contract between the parties hereto."

Hamilton's title was derived from William Hunter, who had, in 1862, taken a feu of a part of the lands of Crosshill, and had disponed a lot of this ground to Hamilton. The feu-contract of 1862, which was granted by Johnston as trustee for William Dixon, bound Johnston, as trustee, and his foresaids, when they should "come to feu or sell the remainder of the ground belonging to them fronting the said road of fifty feet in breadth and the ground immediately adjoining the ground hereby disponed on the north to take the feuars or purchasers thereof bound to build villas or cottages only, with suitable offices thereon, in all respects similar to those to be built by the said William Hunter on the plot or area of ground hereby disponed in terms of the stipulations to that effect after written"; and further bound Hunter to erect eleven villas or cottages, each of the cost of at least £300, with suitable offices, and not to erect any other buildings.

Of the feus thus in question Allan's original feu of 1855 was bounded on the east by the New Cathcart Road. Immediately opposite it, on the other side of the road, were the feus of Park and Hamilton, whose western boundaries were together exactly co-extensive with Allan's eastern boundary. Hamilton's was the southern, and Park's the northern feu; Hamilton's formed the corner of a cross street called Queen Mary's Drive (the rest of Hunter's feu extending eastward along that street), and Park's the corner of a parallel cross street called Albert Road, which thus formed its northern boundary. Allan's second feu formed the northern side of Albert Road, the petitioners' subfeu being the corner portion immediately opposite Park's feu.

The objectors averred, with reference to the clause above quoted in Hunter's feu-contract of 1862, that the expression therein contained, "ground immediately adjoining the ground hereby disponed on the north," included the petitioners' feu. They did not aver that either Allan's trustees or the petitioners had any knowledge of the terms of Hunter's feu-contract.

The objectors pleaded;—(1) The predecessors and authors of the petitioners having come under an obligation to impose similar restrictions to those narrated in the feu-disposition of the said James Allan, and in the titles of the objectors and their predecessors, and having been interdicted by the Court of Session and House of Lords from feuing, selling, or disposing of the lands of Crosshill without imposing such restrictions, the petitioners, whose titles disclose the existence of that obligation, and the granting of said interdict, are bound thereby, and cannot erect on the ground in question other buildings than cottages or villas of the description before specified. (2) The petitioners' authors and predecessors having expressly undertaken an obligation in favour of the said William Hunter, the author and predecessor of the objector James Hamilton, and his successors, not to erect on the ground in question any buildings other than cottages or villas, of the description before specified, the petitioners are not entitled to erect thereon the tenements of dwelling-houses for which the lining is sought. (3) The objector Moses Park having feued his steading in the knowledge that the lands of Crosshill, and particularly the ground immediately to the north of William Hunter's feu, were restricted as before specified, and having erected on said steading a villa of the description specified in his title on the faith and assurance that only buildings of a similar character could be erected on the ground in question, the petitioners are not entitled, to the objector Park's hurt and prejudice, to erect buildings other than cottages costing at least £300

No. 88.

Feb. 29, 1888.
Walker & Dick v. Park.

each. (4) In respect of the condition of the titles, the mutual obligations which they contain, the nature of the properties, and the relation of the various proprietors and feuars of the lands of Crosshill to one another, the objectors are entitled, on the principle of jus quæsitum tertio, to insist on the said restrictions being observed.

The petitioners in their answers to the objections denied that the expression above quoted included anything beyond the line of building stances immediately to the north of Hunter's feu, i.e., the southern side of Albert Road. This construction would exclude the petitioners' feu, which, as already explained, was on the north side of Albert Road.

The petitioners pleaded;—(1) The objections stated, involving as they do questions of heritable title, are incompetent in this Court. (2) The objector James Hamilton not being a conterminous proprietor, and having therefore no interest or right to oppose the prayer of the petition, his objections ought to be repelled, with expenses. (4) The buildings proposed to be erected by the petitioners being entirely in accordance with the terms of their titles, the objections stated ought to be repelled, with expenses, and they are entitled to authority as craved. (5) The restrictions referred to by the objectors not being in their favour, but in favour of the petitioners' predecessors, by whom they have been discharged, the objectors have no right to found upon them, and the objections stated ought to be repelled, with expenses. (6) The interdict referred to by the objectors not being in their favour, but in favour of the petitioners' predecessors, by whom it has been discharged, the objectors have no right to found upon it, and their objections ought to be repelled, with expenses. (7) All the restrictions, the observance of which the objectors are entitled by their titles or otherwise to insist upon, having been observed, and the pursuers' proposed buildings not being in contravention thereof, and the objections stated being quoad ultra jus tertii of the objectors, the objections ought to be repelled, with expenses.

A proof was allowed. The evidence was mainly directed to shew the condition of the estate in 1862 (when most of the streets above mentioned were unformed), with the view of construing the expression "ground immediately adjoining to the north" in Hunter's feu-contract. At the date of Hunter's feu-charter his ground was part of a field which ran north as far as a road called Malsmyre Road, which was a little to the north of the petitioners' ground. This road was an old statute labour road, which was subsequently closed in consequence of the feuing operations. There was no attempt to prove that either Allan's trustees or the petitioners were aware of the terms of Hunter's feu-contract before the date of the petition. Park in his evidence could not say that in taking his feu he had relied on the clause of restriction in Allan's feu-disposition of 1855, though he deponed that he understood villas only were to be erected on the estate. It did not appear that any feuing plan of the estate was shewn to him, or was in use to be shewn to feuars. Hamilton was not examined as a witness.

On 26th August 1887 the Dean of Guild Court pronounced an interlocutor in which, after a variety of findings in fact, including one to the effect that the ground immediately adjoining Hunter's feu to the north comprehended the petitioners' ground, they found in law "(1) that the respondents Hamilton and Park, on the principle of jus quæsitum tertio, acquired a right to enforce the obligation by the superior William Johnston contained in the said disposition [of 1855]; (2) that, as in a question with the respondents, the mutual discharge and assignation [of 1883] does not discharge the said obligation, but that the same subsists and is binding on Dixon's trustees; (3) that the obligation by the superior in the feu-charter of Hamilton's feu to restrict the ground now belonging to the petitioners to villas and cottages is still subsisting and binding on Dixon's trustees, the superiors of the ground, and the respondent Hamilton, as the successor of the original feuar, Hunter, has a right to enforce that obligation; (4) that in accordance with the obligation undertaken by William Johnston in the foresaid disposition [of 1855], and in the feu-charter to Hunter [of 1862], Dixon's trustees had no power to feu the ground belonging to the petitioners with liberty to erect thereon tenements of flatted houses and shops, as proposed by the petitioners: Therefore refuse the prayer of the petition: Find the petitioners liable to the respondents Hamilton and Park in expenses," &c.

The petitioners appealed, and argued;—I. The Dean of Guild had no jurisdiction to entertain the question raised on record. He ought to have taken the titles as they stood. The petitioners' title was unambiguous; it gave rise to no question of construction; what the Dean of Guild had in effect done was to reduce, or at least reform, that title. That was outwith his jurisdiction. The objection was not a technical one, leading merely to the useless expense of another action. The question could not effectually or competently be determined except in an appropriate action, to which the superior was a party. II. But apart from that, the objectors' case failed on the merits. (1) In the first place, it failed in so far as based on the deed of 1855. That deed imposed no real burden on the lands of Crosshill—merely a personal obligation on Dixon's trustees—the sole creditors in which were Allan's trustees. The superior might contract for all future feuars, and so give them, when they came into existence, an independent right to enforce the restrictions on the principle of jus quæsitum tertio; the case here was the converse—that of the first vassal taking the superior bound to impose restrictions on future vassals, and the effect of that, according to the objectors, was that the creditor in the obligation, the vassal, was himself bound to future vassals, and could not discharge the obligation in his own favour at pleasure; but there was no authority for that extension of the principle of jus quæsitum tertio. Allan's Trustees were entitled to discharge the obligation in their favour, and had effectually discharged it by the deed of 1883. The authorities[1] shewed that in order to confer a right on co-feuars the following conditions were essential—(a) The restrictions must appear expressly or by clear implication in all the titles; but the petitioners' title was unrestricted. (b) There must be mutuality of obligation; but the objectors' own titles, and Park's in particular, were fatal to the application of the doctrine of mutuality. (c) The feuar objecting must in taking his feu have proceeded on the faith of the restriction. Here, on the contrary, both the objectors' titles and the evidence shewed that neither of the objectors had proceeded on the faith of the deed of 1855. Lastly (d) the feuar must have an interest to enforce the restriction, and here Hamilton at least had not. (2) The objectors' case on Hunter's feu-contract of 1862 was more favourable to them, for Hamilton was undoubtedly entitled to enforce the clause of restriction in that deed. The question was whether he could do so against the petitioners. Now, in the first place, the clause did not apply to the petitioners' ground. A heavy onus lay on one who sought to apply a clause of restriction to his neighbour's ground, and even if the proof admitted of the view maintained by the objectors, it did not necessitate it, and consequently they

---

[1] Allan's Trustees v. Dixon's Trustees, Dec. 9, 1868, 7 Macph. 193, 41 Scot. Jur. 124, aff. July 12, 1870, 8 Macph. (H. L.) 182, 42 Scot. Jur. 461; Hislop v. MacRitchie's Trustees, June 23, 1881, 8 R. (H. L.) 95; Thomson v. Alley & M'Lellan, Dec. 22, 1882, 10 R. 433.

No. 88.
——
Feb. 29, 1888.
Walker & Dick v. Park.

failed. Then secondly, assuming the clause to apply to the petitioners' ground, it (like the clause of 1855) created merely a personal obligation on the superior, not a real burden on the lands. The petitioners' title therefore was unimpeachable. The superior had complete power to grant it, although by granting it in the terms he did it might be that he had made himself liable to Hunter in damages for breach of contract. But whether he had done so or not was obviously a question that ought not to be determined in his absence. That, however, was the real issue on this branch of the case, and it was an issue with which the petitioners had nothing to do. Had they known the terms of Hunter's contract, they might have been barred personali exceptione from taking an unrestricted title, but there was no suggestion that they knew, either on record or in the evidence. (3) Park's case on his title was hardly stateable, and not worth considering. His only advantage over Hamilton was that his feu was nearer the petitioners' than Hamilton's was, and consequently his interest was more obvious.

Argued for the objectors;—I. The Dean of Guild had jurisdiction. He had two interests to consider—the public interest, and the interest of the neighbouring feuars, and in considering the second of these interests he had in practice frequently dealt with the terms of feu-contracts, his jurisdiction being ousted only when a distinct conflict of heritable rights emerged, which there was not here. The authorities shewed that he had inquired into titles so as to free proprietors from burdens,[1] and an inquiry with the result of imposing a burden was in principle indistinguishable. II. On the merits the Dean of Guild's judgment was right. (1) The effect of the deed of 1855, coupled with the subsequent feuing of the estate and the state of the objectors' titles, was to confer on them a jus quæsitum to enforce the restriction. There could be no doubt about the intention of parties in 1855, and that the lands were burdened was also the opinion of the framers of the deed of discharge of 1883, for that deed relieved not only Dixon's trustees but the lands of Crosshill. The title of the petitioners being unfeudalised they must be taken as in this question identical with their authors Allan's trustees, and Allan's trustees as feuars of the 1883 lot must be taken as identical with Allan's trustees as feuars of the 1855 lot, to this effect, at least, that if the restriction of 1855 ought to have been inserted in the deed of 1883 they could not plead that it in fact had not, and neither consequently could the petitioners. Now, when a feuar stipulated that a restrictive condition imposed on himself should be imposed on his co-feuars, he was to be held as having had in contemplation that the restriction was for the mutual benefit of all the feuars, and to be mutually enforceable by them. This stipulation was made by Allan's trustees in 1855. Of course the same conditions must occur in the charter of the feuar seeking to enforce, but both Park and Hamilton were under the same obligation as to building villas only. They certainly had an interest to enforce, as it would undoubtedly lower the value of their property, which they had erected on the understanding that villas only should be built. (2) Hamilton's case at all events was clear. His title gave him an express right to have villas only erected on the ground immediately to the north of his feu. The evidence shewed that that expression included the petitioners' ground. If the petitioners' title had been in terms restricted, Hamilton's title to enforce could hardly have been questioned, but it was not in terms restricted and what the petitioners said was that Hamilton's only remedy was an action of damages for breach of contract against the superior. That was not his only remedy, for Allan's trustees, who were identical with the petitioners, were also in bad faith in taking an unrestricted title to the lot of 1883. The restriction was, as already stated, to be read into Allan's title, and into the petitioners'. The objectors, therefore, could proceed directly against the petitioners, although they were quite willing that the superior should be made a party to this process if that were thought desirable. A declarator was certainly unnecessary.

---

[1] Smellie v. Thomson, July 9, 1868, 6 Macph. 1024, 40 Scot. Jur. 583; Pitman v. Burnett's Trustees, July 7, 1881, 8 R. 914; Calder v. Merchant Company of Edinburgh, Feb. 26, 1886, 13 R. 623.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case from the Dean of Guild Court of Crosshill raises questions of a somewhat unusual nature, which in some aspects are of considerable importance.

The state of the facts out of which these questions arise is this—Messrs Walker & Dick proposed to build certain houses and shops on ground belonging to them in Crosshill, and they presented a petition to the Dean of Guild praying for a lining authorising them to erect the buildings which they proposed. The petition proceeds upon the title of the petitioners to the ground in question, which title is not disputed. They obtained the ground from Allan's trustees under a title which is wholly unrestricted. Two neighbouring feuars—Messrs Park and Hamilton—appear to oppose the petition, and they state this,—that although it is perfectly true that there is in the title of the petitioners no restriction against the erection of the houses and shops which the petitioners propose to build—yet there ought to be; that the title by which they hold the ground, as well as that of their authors, which is also unrestricted, was obtained by a substantially fraudulent proceeding; and that the superiors attempted by an incompetent mode to discharge certain obligations in regard to the land as building ground which were imposed upon it before. The Dean of Guild after hearing parties, and acting, as I suppose he did, by the advice of his assessor, sustained the pleas in law on which the compearers proceeded, and refused the petition. In his interlocutor he has a variety of findings about the feudal titles to this ground, which are against the manifest operation of these titles as they stand—findings that the ground is burdened as the compearers maintain, and that the houses proposed to be built on it are prohibited by what ought to have been the terms of the titles, although the titles in their actual terms do not express these restrictions.

I am of opinion that the procedure in the Dean of Guild Court was wrong from first to last. I doubt whether it was competent. I think it is erroneous in point of law, and I think the whole proceeding was beyond the scope of the Dean of Guild.

Shortly told, the history of these titles is simply this. Mr Dixon, the proprietor of the lands of Crosshill in the neighbourhood of Glasgow, began to feu out that estate shortly before his death in 1855. In that year he feued a portion of the ground to Allan's trustees, and Mr Johnston, as his trustee, inserted certain restrictions as to the nature of the buildings to be erected upon the ground. The restrictions were to the effect that the ground should be used for the building of villas and cottages only, and Mr Johnston undertook when the rest of the land came to be feued to insert in the titles of the feuars clauses to a similar effect. That went on until the year 1868, when a question arose between Allan's trustees and Johnston as to whether the restrictions so imposed were binding. They were held to be binding by this Court, and on appeal that judgment was sustained. That was in 1870. But some years later, in 1883, the superior and his vassal came to an understanding and a deed was executed by which they mutually discharged each other of those inconvenient restrictions. Immediately afterwards Dixon's trustees feued out another piece of ground to the same vassals, namely, Allan's trustees, on a charter from which the restrictions were absent. Then in 1887 Allan's trustees feued a part of that ground to the present petitioners Walker & Dick. So that upon that narrative it is manifest that when the case came before the Dean of Guild, and the feuars Walker & Dick presented their petition, their authors, Allan's trustees, were entirely free of the restriction which had originally burdened the title. But, as I have already indicated, the compearers maintain that the superiors, Dixon's trustees, were not entitled to liberate Allan's trustees from this burden, because there was an obligation in regard to other feuars of the lands of Crosshill by which it is contended that there is a jus quæsitum in those other feuars entitling them to object to the buildings which the petitioners propose to erect.

No. 88.

Feb. 29, 1888.
Walker & Dick v. Park.

Now, my opinion is that the Dean of Guild was bound to take the title as he found it. He had no power to go behind the title, or to judge of an alleged personal exception against the feuars, Allan's trustees, or the feuars from them—the petitioners—the title disclosing no burden upon the lands. Even on the footing that in a proper proceeding such a question might be decided in favour of the compearers, it is, I think, wholly and absolutely incompetent to raise it in the Court of the Dean of Guild. It is settled—and there can be no question about it—that while from the very nature of the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild, many questions may be raised incidental to the immediate objects of proceedings before that Court, a competition between heritable rights, or burdens on heritable rights, or variations from the feudal title on which the rights stand until they are set aside, are matters entirely beyond the competency of the Dean of Guild. My opinion is, if there was nothing more to be said about the case, that whatever may be the foundation of the objection taken, it is one that could not competently be taken cognisance of by the Dean of Guild, much less competently decided by him.

It must be manifest that the question here raised is a very important one, not only to the feuars Walker & Dick, but to the superior, and the superior is not here, yet the Dean of Guild has gone resolutely to work, and decided upon questions in which the superior has the deepest interest, without the superior being a party to the proceeding, or being heard for his interest. That would of itself be quite sufficient to render these proceedings entirely inept, and therefore I should have been disposed to hold, first, that the question raised by the compearing feuars Park and Hamilton is irrelevant as long as these titles stand as they are, and in the second place, that the question raised could not have been considered or decided in the absence of the superior—amounting, as the allegation in truth does amount, to a statement or charge of a breach of contract against the superior himself, for they say,—"You the superiors were in bad faith in entering into this contract with Allan's trustees"; and they say that against Allan's trustees also.

But I do not think it necessary that I should put the conclusion at which I have arrived exactly on that ground. I think it is sound; but I am of opinion still farther that these compearers have shewn no right whatever to interfere in the Dean of Guild Court, and object to parts of the lining prayed for by the petitioners being granted. Their case is, that they also are feuars of the lands of Crosshill—one of them a feuar from Dixon's trustees, and the other from a person of the name of Hunter,—that they in the titles so derived have been put under similar restrictions, and in that way that they have an interest to appear in this matter, especially as it is unjust that they should be restricted while the obligation on the superior in the original title to Allan's trustees remains unimplemented. I am of opinion that there is no foundation for that allegation. I am not, however, going to give an absolute opinion upon that matter, because I should in so doing be putting myself into the same position as the Dean of Guild by deciding upon the superior's rights in his absence. But I do say, as far as it is necessary to decide the matter for the purposes of the Dean of Guild case, that neither the title of Moses Park, who is one of the compearers, nor the title of Hamilton, who is the other, affords material for raising the question that has been decided by the Dean of Guild. Park feued from William Dixon, and although it is quite true that in his title these restrictions have been recapitulated and imposed there is a clause at the end of the title which entirely neutralises it as far as this matter is concerned, for the superior reserves to himself the power to discharge these restrictions whenever he chooses without regard to the other feuars, the deed being declared to be entirely for the purpose of regulating the relations between the superior and the vassal. That reservation was as much in breach of those original restrictions as the discharge granted by Allan's trustees, on which the petitioner's title proceeds. In short, Moses Park is not in the position of a coterminous feuar entitled to appeal to the restrictions, because the clause in his own title enables the superior to discharge that obligation, which is inconsistent with the very ground of his contention. The title of the other opposing feuar, Hamilton, is equally unavailing. There a feu was given off by Johnston, as Dixon's trustee, not direct to Hamilton but to Hunter, who is thus the author of Hamilton. In Hunter's title similar, but not the same clause or clauses of restriction were imposed, or sought to be imposed. The clause is this,—"And further, when the said William Johnston or his foresaids shall come to feu or sell the remainder of the ground belonging to them, fronting the said road, of fifty feet in breadth, and the ground immediately adjoining the ground hereby disponed on the north, to take the feuars or purchasers thereof bound to build villas or cottages only," and so on. Now, I am of opinion that this clause is so indefinite—it is difficult to tell what the ground is to which the restrictions apply—that, without some further proceeding by way of declarator or otherwise, it is not a title on which the Dean of Guild should have stopped proceedings on the petition before us.

I am therefore of opinion on the whole matter that we should recall the Dean of Guild's interlocutor, and remit the petition to the Dean of Guild to repel the objections stated for the compearers, and to proceed.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I have come to the conclusion which your Lordship has reached. It appears to me that the respondents have shewn no cause why the prayer of the petition should not be granted. The petitioners produced what upon the face of it was a perfectly good title. They hold a disposition to the subjects from Allan's trustees which ex facie discloses no burden. It is said that it is a mere minute of agreement, but it is operative. The subjects are described as unburdened, and their author's title was equally free from burden.

No. 88.

Feb. 29, 1888.
Walker & Dick v. Park.

Now, if there is nothing more than that, I do not think the objectors could pretend that they had a case to which effect could be given by the Dean of Guild, or by this, or by any Court. But they try to get the better of the express words of the title by reading into the title which was granted by Dixon's trustees all the burdens and obligations which are to be found in the disposition granted in 1855. It is quite true, they say, that there was an arrangement between the superior and the vassals, who are represented by Allan's trustees, by which the restrictions in that title on the one side and on the other were discharged. But they contend that Allan's trustees were in bad faith in entering into any such arrangement. They say that Allan's trustees ought to have looked to the title granted in 1855, and because there was a burden to be found in that title they ought in their own minds to have held that that burden was to continue for ever; and that therefore Allan's trustees are to be regarded as violating some obligation incumbent upon them if they took a disposition of property which formed any part of the lands of Crosshill in which no such burdens were mentioned. But it is not said, and it could not be said, that there is any real burden on the lands. From first to last in all the transactions between the superior and the vassal there was no real burden constituted over the lands. The whole thing depended on the personal undertaking or obligation of Dixon's trustees. Well, when that is so, how has it been made to appear that Allan's trustees, just as much as anybody else, were not entitled to take an unburdened disposition? I do not see any reason for such a contention at all. They were not bound to assume—and I do not think with reference to the rights of others that they were called upon to assume—that there was anyone whose interests were in the least affected by the discharge granted in 1883, and the subsequent feu-contract entered into on the footing that that was a good discharge. I do not see that they were so called upon at all. The objectors referred to the process that existed between Allan's trustees and the superior. That process was begun sometime in 1868 and ended in 1870. In that process it was found that the superior was all wrong, and that the vassals, Allan's trustees, were all right. But why? Because there was a contract between the two. The thing with regard to the rights of Allan's trustees was as plain as if the superior, their antagonist, had bound himself to pay a certain sum of money to them. They simply asked for fulfilment of a contract which they said existed between Dixon's trustees and themselves. Dixon's trustees were continuing to violate the contract which existed. They asked for interdict to prevent them from violating the contract, and the Court of Session here, and the House of Lords upon appeal, found them entitled to that interdict. They held that Dixon's trustees were in breach of the contract to which I have referred. The House of Lords did not say that in seeking to vindicate that right for themselves the vassal was vindicating any right secured to any other party. That might or might not be. That never was decided; it never was argued. We know nothing about that up to this moment. Therefore to say that Allan's trustees, because they believed that they were the only parties interested in the matter of the discharge granted to Dixon's trustees, and because they took a disposition in the terms that have been referred to, are therefore in bad faith, is, in my view, entirely out of the question. It seems to me as if the objectors had looked about them to try to find where it was that their rights lay. If they had borne in mind that there was no real burden on the lands, it appears to me that they would not have made the foolish stand they did in urging their objections in the Court below.

I have thus ventured to express an opinion on what has been very properly called the merits of the case; but I am not sure that I am right in following the course that was desired by both parties. That was indicated to us in the course of the debate. But I was much disposed to adopt the view which your Lordship has proceeded upon, and to say that, even though we might be entitled, we are not bound to consider and determine the merits of the controversy that has been raised. All the same, it is always well when we can express an opinion on the merits of a controversy to do so. And I think we have warrant for doing it here, for the simple reason that our judgment will not bind any other than the parties to this process. It will bind the objectors and the petitioners, but nobody who is not a party to the process. The objector and the petitioner cannot say that our observations are not within the scope of the case, and that we have no jurisdiction to make such remarks. They have expressly asked for judgment on the merits. I venture to express my opinion on that matter. I am as thoroughly satisfied on the merits as on the preliminary question of jurisdiction. At all events, the objectors are quite wrong on that matter which is the most important, namely, that they have shewn no cause whatever why the decree of lining as prayed for in the petition ought not to be pronounced.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—The petitioners are not infeft, they have only an agreement for a feu-contract. It follows that they are to be identified with Allan's trustees, their authors.

It is admitted that in the title of the latter there are no restrictions which prevent the erection of the proposed buildings; consequently on the face of the title the petitioners are entitled to the decree of lining which they ask for. But the respondents urge that the superior had not the power to grant such a title to Allan's trustees, and that they were not in good faith to take it.

As the superior was the unrestricted owner of the ground, there can, I think, be no doubt of his power. The objection of the respondents therefore takes this shape. They say that the title was granted in breach of an obligation to them, and that they are entitled to plead against Allan's trustees a personal exception which debars them from availing themselves of the title as it stands.

The superior is not a party to the record. It follows that we cannot decide any question between him and the respondents. Nor are we entitled to express any opinion adverse to his rights. But we may—and indeed we must—examine the case to see whether it be necessary that the superior should be called.

In 1855 the superior feued to James Allan a part of his estate under certain building restrictions, and he bound himself to insert similar restrictions in the other lots which might be subsequently feued. In 1862 he feued another portion to William Hunter, and in implement of the obligation he inserted the restrictions which occur in Allan's title. Further, he came under an obligation to Hunter, which is thus expressed—"Declaring that the said William Johnston, as trustee foresaid, shall be bound and obliged, . . . when he or his foresaids shall come to feu or sell the remainder of the ground belonging to them fronting the said road of 50 feet in breadth, and the ground immediately adjoining the ground hereby disponed on the north, to take the feuars or purchasers thereof bound to build villas or cottages only with suitable offices thereon in all respects similar to those to be built by the said William Hunter on the plot or area of ground hereby disponed, in terms of the stipulations to that effect after written."

No. 88.

Feb. 29, 1888.
Walker & Dick v. Park.

In 1883 Allan's trustees discharged the obligation which the superior had granted in favour of their author, and they thereafter feued another lot. The feu-contract did not contain the original restrictions, so that so far as this title goes Allan's trustees are entitled to erect the proposed buildings. It is to a part of this feu that the petitioners have acquired right.

It was argued that because the original feu to Allan was placed under restrictions, and because Allan had taken the superior bound to insert the same restrictions in subsequent feu-contracts, neither he nor his trustees could acquire from the superior any unrestricted ground. I see no foundation for this argument. That they possess restricted ground is no reason why they should not acquire unrestricted ground. Nor did the obligations which Allan had taken from the superior impose any restraint upon himself or his trustees. It was taken for his own benefit, and he or they might enforce or discharge it as they pleased. It was argued that he took it for the benefit of subsequent feuars, who acquired a right to it as they obtained their feus. No authority was cited in support of this view, and I see no principle for it. The obligation was personal to Allan, and was not in any way communicated to the other feuars.

Again, it is argued that the feu-contract to Allan's trustees is in breach of the obligation granted by the superior to Hunter. As I have already said we cannot decide that question when the superior is not a party to the record, and we are not entitled to express any opinion adverse to him. But if there be any breach of obligation the rights of Allan's trustees are not affected by it. They are entitled to exercise the powers competent to them as owners of their feu, and the superior can only be sued in damages.

But it is said that there is a personal exception which bars Allan's trustees from the exercise of their powers. If there be, it could only arise from their taking their feu-contract in the knowledge that it was granted by the superior in breach of his obligation to Hunter. But it is not alleged that they were in the knowledge of any such obligation, and therefore they could not be aware of any breach of it. There is thus an end of the plea of personal exception, for the conditions on which alone it could be raised are absolutely wanting. I may add that in my opinion it is extremely doubtful whether the obligation of the superior extends to the feu granted to Allan's trustees in 1883. It applies to the ground "immediately adjoining the ground hereby disponed on the north." The ground feued to Allan's trustees does not immediately adjoin it, and it is not clear what area these words would be held to cover. And so it follows that even if Allan's trustees had been in the knowledge of the obligation, they could not have been in the knowledge that their feu-contract was in breach of it. Their rights as owners cannot be controlled by a personal exception, said to arise from an obligation conceived in so vague and doubtful terms.

I have confined my attention to the case of Hamilton, who derives his title from Hunter, and as this fails it is not necessary to examine the much weaker case of Park.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the pursuers are entitled to the decree of lining which they ask for.

Lord Young was absent.

The Court sustained the appeal, recalled the judgment of the Magistrates appealed against, and remitted the cause to the Magistrates with instructions to repel the objections for the respondents, and to proceed as accords.

J. & J. GALLETLY, S.S.C.—SMITH & MASON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 88.

Feb. 29, 1888.
Walker &
Dick v. Park.

ALEXANDER CAMERON, Pursuer (Respondent).—Darling—Forsyth.
THE HONOURABLE ARTHUR DRUMMOND, Defender (Reclaimer).—
Sir Charles Pearson—Dundas.

No. 89.

Mar. 2, 1888.
Cameron v.
Drummond.

Lease—Fences—Wire-netting—Landlord's right to remove—Game damage.—The landlord of a farm was bound by the lease to repair the fences, and on that being done the tenant accepted the fences "as in sufficient tenantable condition and repair, and binds and obliges himself to uphold them in tenantable condition during the currency of the lease, and to leave them in the like condition at the expiry thereof, . . . and the tenant shall also be at half the expense of upholding plantation and march-fences."

At the beginning of the lease the lands let were separated from a plantation (which also was the landlord's property, and was full of ground game) by a fence lined with wire-netting. The landlord sometime after the beginning of the lease removed the netting. Held that the tenant was entitled to have the netting restored, and to recover damages for injury done to his crops by ground game coming out of the plantation after the removal of the netting.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Fraser.
M.

IN November 1887 Alexander Cameron, farmer, tenant of the farm of Hutcheson, Dunblane, raised an action in the Court of Session against his landlord, the Honourable Arthur Drummond of Cromlix, concluding that the defender should be ordained "to bring back and restore to its original position the wire-netting removed by the defender from the wire-fence which runs from the north end of the farm of Hutcheson, on the estate of Cromlix, . . . tenanted by the pursuer, in a south-westerly direction, and forms the march-fence between a plantation belonging to the defender and the said farm, thereafter for a short distance in a north-westerly direction, and which forms a part of said march-fence, and then south-west to the farm of Crofts, on said estate, partly through the hill pasture on said farm of Hutcheson, and which lies on the west thereof, and partly separating the said hill pasture from the remainder of said farm of Hutcheson, which wire-netting lined the said wire-fence, and formed a portion thereof, or otherwise to line the said wire-fence with new wire-netting of the same height, quality, and dimensions," and for payment of £150 of damages.

He averred (cond. 3) that before offering for the farm "he examined the fences, and observed that on the west side the farm was bounded by a plantation belonging to the defender, which was closely preserved for game, but that the farm was effectually protected from inroads of ground game therefrom by a wire-fence lined with wire-netting, which ran from the north end of said farm tenanted by the pursuer in a south-westerly direction, and formed the march-fence between said plantation belonging to the defender and the said farm, thereafter for a short distance in a north-westerly direction, and which formed a part of said march-fence, and then south-west to the farm of Crofts, also belonging to the defender, partly through the hill pasture of said farm of Hutcheson, tenanted by the pursuer, and which lay on the west thereof, and partly separating the said hill pasture from the remainder of said farm tenanted by the pursuer. The said wire-fence so lined with wire-netting extended to about 1000 yards or thereby." (Cond. 4) "After making all necessary inquiries regarding the farm to enable him to estimate its value, the pursuer made a written offer on 23d September 1885 for a lease of the same for fifteen years at a yearly rent of £180 sterling for the first five years, and £190 sterling for each of the remaining years. . . ." (Cond. 5) "The said offer was accepted by the defender, and at Martinmas 1885 the pursuer entered into the possession of the farm. A formal lease was thereafter executed between the pursuer and defender, in which the said farm is described as follows, viz.:—'All and Whole the farm of Hutcheson, as presently possessed by Malcolm Macfarlane, with the exception of the field lying next the wood and adjoining the farm of Crofts, which farm hereby let lies in the parish of Dunblane and county of Perth, and is delineated and enclosed by a red line in the plan or tracing hereto annexed, and subscribed as relative hereto.'"

No. 89.

Mar. 2, 1888.
Cameron v. Drummond.

Under the lease the landlord was bound to "repair the fences where necessary, and subdivide the forty acre field with one fence; on these things being done the said Alexander Cameron hereby accepts of the buildings, fences, hedges, gates, roads, drains, ditches, and water-courses on the said farm as in sufficient tenantable condition and repair, and binds and obliges himself and his foresaids to uphold them in tenantable condition during the currency of this lease, and to leave them in the like condition at the expiry thereof, . . and the tenant shall also be at half the expense of upholding plantation and march-fences."

The pursuer further averred;—(Cond. 6) "The said wire-netting lined the said wire-fence not only when the farm was examined by the pursuer with a view to becoming an offerer therefor, but when he entered into possession. As the plantation on the west side of the farm was full of ground game it was thus the most important part of said fence, and its existence formed an important consideration affecting his becoming an offerer." (Cond. 7) "On or about 9th September 1886, the defender unwarrantably, illegally, and wrongously removed the wire-netting from said fence, to the loss and damage of the pursuer. The said wire-netting was about three feet high, and the mesh thereof about two inches wide, and formed an effectual protection against hares and rabbits getting access to his farm from the said plantation, where they exist in thousands. The pursuer on said date wrote to him asking him to replace it, and failing his doing so, intimating that he would be held responsible for all damage done to his crops and grass by vermin."

The defender answered to cond. 7;—"Admitted that about the date here mentioned the wire-netting was removed from said fence by the defender's orders or with his authority. It was rabbit-netting of the ordinary kind and dimensions. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that the said netting belonged to the defender, and was put on the said fence by him in a temporary manner and for a temporary purpose, and that the defender was perfectly entitled to remove it at his pleasure. The said netting formed in no sense a part of the fence, which has been erected years before, and was an ordinary plantation fence."

The pursuer averred further;—(Cond. 8) "The pursuer's crops and grass have since the removal of said wire-fence suffered seriously, as hares and rabbits in great numbers from the said plantation have since been feeding thereon, there being no fence left to prevent their getting access to his farm. The loss which the pursuer has sustained thereby amounts at the date hereof to the sum of £150 sterling. In reference to the answer hereto, it is explained that the great increase of ground game, which the removal of said wire-netting has occasioned, could only be kept down at great expense to the pursuer, who would require to keep at least two men constantly employed for the purpose. Further, the said ground game are bred on the adjoining plantation, to which the pursuer has no right of access."

The defender answered;—(Ans. 8) "Denied. Explained that in virtue of the provisions of the Ground Game Act, 1880, the pursuer was and is entitled to protect his crops by taking and killing hares and rabbits as therein provided. If his crops have been damaged as here mentioned (which is denied), he is himself to blame for not efficiently protecting them, either by destroying the hares and rabbits or putting up wire-netting at his own expense. Explained further that the landlord is not bound by the lease to fence the farm to the exclusion of ground game, and that the amount of ground game existing in the said plantation has not increased since the pursuer became tenant of the farm, and is not in excess of an average and usual stock."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender having unwarrantably, illegally, and wrongously removed the wire-netting in question, ought to be ordained to restore the same. (2) In any view, the removal thereof constitutes a breach of the lease by the defender, and he ought to be ordained to restore it. (3) The pursuer having sustained loss and damage in consequence thereof, the defender is liable in reparation therefor. (4) Further, the defender is, in any view, liable for the damage done by the excess of ground game complained of, the pursuer not having the same in view when he entered into the lease.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) The defender should be assoilzied, in respect that he was perfectly entitled to remove the said wire-netting, and is under no obligation to restore or replace it. (3) The pursuer having suffered no loss or damage for which the defender is responsible, the defender should be assoilzied, with expenses. (4) Any loss or damage which the pursuer may have suffered having been caused by his own neglect to take measures for the protection of his crops, the defender should be assoilzied, with expenses.

On 15th January 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Decerns and ordains the defender, within fourteen days, to bring back and restore to its original position the wire-netting removed by him from the wire-fence which runs from the north end of the farm of Hutcheson on the estate of Cromlix in the parish of Dunblane and county of Perth, tenanted by the pursuer, in a south-westerly direction, and forming the march-fence between a plantation belonging to the defender and the said farm, thereafter for a short distance in a north-westerly direction, and which forms a part of the said march-fence, and then southwest to the farm of Crofts, on said estate, partly through the hill-pasture on said farm of Hutcheson, and which lies on the west thereof, and partly separating the said hill pasture from the remainder of said farm of Hutcheson, which wire-netting lined the said wire-fence and formed a portion thereof; or to line the said wire-fence with new wire-netting of the same height, quality, and dimensions: Further, in regard to the claim of damage made by the pursuer, allows to both parties a proof of their averments, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation." *

---

* "OPINION.—The defender leased to the pursuer, for a period of fifteen years from Martinmas 1885, 'All and Whole the farm of Hutcheson, as presently possessed by Malcolm Macfarlane.' By the lease the proprietor was taken bound to 'repair the fences where necessary, and subdivide the forty acre field with one fence; on these things being done the said Alexander Cameron hereby accepts of the buildings, fences, hedges, gates, roads, drains, ditches, and water-courses on the said farm as in sufficient tenantable condition and repair, and binds and obliges himself and his foresaids to uphold them in tenantable condition during the currency of this lease, and to leave them in the like condition at the expiry thereof, . . . and the tenant shall also be at half the

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The netting was not under the contract of lease at all. It was admitted that the netting was on the fence when the tenant entered, but it was not covered by the words "as presently possessed by Malcolm Macfarlane." Such words in leases had always been held to refer to the boundaries of the farm, the subdivision of the fields, and such general features of the subject let, but they had never been held to apply to minutiæ of this kind.[1] By removing the netting the landlord was not adding to but lightening the tenant's burden, as, on the assumption that the landlord had to leave it standing, the tenant would, under the lease, be bound to keep it up. (2) If the netting expense of upholding plantation and march-fences.' Now, at the time when the pursuer entered upon his farm there was on the west side of it a wire-fence lined with wire-netting, which bounded the farm on that side from a plantation belonging to the defender. This wire-fence and wire-netting were there when the farm was in the possession of Macfarlane. It was intended as a barrier against the inroads of ground game from the plantation. Now, this was a material and important safeguard for the pursuer's crops, and he was entitled to rely upon the wire-fence and netting being allowed to remain during his lease. He got the farm as it was possessed by the former tenant, and if the wire-netting be taken away he does not get all that that tenant possessed. But the defender, in the month of September 1886, did remove a considerable portion of it, and the result, as stated by the pursuer, is that the ground game have come in large numbers upon his farm, and committed damage. The defender justifies his action by saying that the wire-netting was his property, and consequently he was entitled to remove it at his pleasure. Now, let us see how this view of the relations of the parties would answer. Ordinary fences or palings are intended to keep out the encroachments of cattle or horses. These palings are the property of the landlord, but he dare not touch them, far less carry them away, if the farm was let with these palings upon it. They are a fence against cattle;—and so is wire-netting a fence against ground game, and if he cannot remove the one fence he cannot remove the other; and the very stringent obligations laid upon the tenant in this case to uphold the fences imply an obligation on the part of the landlord to let these fences alone. The Lord Ordinary, therefore, has no hestitation in ordering the defender to replace the fences in the condition they were in when he took them away in September 1886, or if he cannot replace the identical netting, then he must give sufficient new netting.

---

"As regards the claim for damage, it is said to be irrelevant, because it is not stated that there is an increase in the ground game beyond the number that were upon the farm when the lease was entered into. What is stated is, that whereas the wire-netting kept the ground game entirely off the farm, the removal of it has allowed rabbits to come in great numbers where there were none before. This is a perfectly relevant ground of damage. It is also argued that the claim cannot be insisted in, seeing that the tenant could have protected himself by erecting wire-netting on his farm at the junction between it and the plantation. But why should he go to this expense if he has a right to insist upon the wire-netting being left as it was when he took possession? Nor is the defence available in such a case as this, that the pursuer is entitled under the Ground Game Act to kill all the ground game. The rabbits here are bred in a plantation to which the tenant has no access,—the law as to such a case being 'that a landlord cannot both reserve covers for game preservation within or around the land which he has let for agricultural purposes, and at the same time answer such demands as this in regard to depredations by rabbits by the plea that the tenant had the remedy in his own hand.'—Per Lord Justice-Clerk in Inglis v. Moir's Tutors (7th December 1871, 10 Macph. 204). The only proper mode of extirpating them is by attacking them in the cover which shelters them, and in such circumstances the tenant's claim will lie, though he has the power of killing them if he finds them in the open."

[1] Rankine on Leases, p. 188, and cases there cited.

did not come under the contract of lease, then there was no relevant averment of damage for which the landlord was liable. Damages for injury done by game were only exigible where it was averred that the stock of game had increased unduly since the lease was entered into.[1] There was no such averment here. (3) The Ground Game Act of 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 47) cut off the tenant's right to claim damages for injury by ground game at common law. It gave him a right to protect himself by killing the ground game which came on to his own ground. It was his duty to protect himself, and a neighbouring proprietor could use his own ground in any way he chose, so long as he did so in a reasonable manner. It was not averred that he was using it otherwise in this case.

Argued for the respondent;—The netting was a part of the fence as it existed when he got possession of the farm. He took the farm on the understanding that the fence should remain. It was useful to him to keep ground game out, and that was as natural a use of a fence on a farm of this class as to keep bestial within the farm, or to prevent them straying into it. If the landlord was bound to leave the netting, then the tenant was entitled to recover any damage he had suffered through the landlord's breach of duty.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the pursuer entered as tenant of the farm of Hutcheson at Martinmas 1885. The subject let was described as "All and Whole the farm of Hutcheson, as presently possessed by Malcolm Macfarlane." The matter of fences is very specially provided for in the lease. The proprietor, on the one hand, is bound to "repair the fences where necessary, and subdivide the forty acre field with one fence," while the tenant, on the other hand, "hereby accepts of the buildings, fences . . . on the said farm as in sufficient tenantable condition and repair, and binds and obliges himself and his foresaids to uphold them in tenantable condition during the currency of this lease, . . . and the tenant shall also be at half the expense of upholding plantation and march-fences." The pursuer avers (and it is admitted by the defender) that when he examined the farm, and also at the time he entered into possession, there was attached to the fence which divided the farm from a certain plantation, and also on another part of the same fence which divided the arable land from the hill pasture, a wire netting three feet high. That netting has since been removed by the landlord. The pursuer complains that the removal was unjust, and was a breach of contract on the landlord's part. The Lord Ordinary has found the affirmative of that contention, and I am of opinion that he is right. I do not attach much importance to the words, "as presently possessed by Malcolm Macfarlane." These words generally refer to extent of the farm and of the fields of which it consists. The question, I think, depends on the clause regulating the matter of fences which I have already quoted. It appears to me that under that clause if this wire-netting on the fence was useful to the tenant for any purpose, and if it was there at his term of entry, and was delivered over to him and accepted by him, then the landlord has no right to interfere with it. Now, I think, there is no doubt that this netting was beneficial to the tenant. It is admitted that the plantation contained a quantity of game, and the netting certainly had the effect of preventing the game from straying into the farm. That settles the question. He got it because it was useful, and he is bound to

---

[1] Inglis v. Moir's Tutors, Dec. 7, 1871, 10 Macph. 204, 44 Scot. Jur. 123.

No. 89.

Mar. 2, 1888.
Cameron v.
Drummond.

keep it up. The defender says that it was put up in a temporary manner, and for a temporary purpose. But he does not explain what that purpose was. It is difficult to understand what purpose there could be, except the purpose of keeping the game off the farm and in the plantation. If it was erected for that purpose and is useful, it is in vain for the landlord to say that he was entitled to remove it without cause assigned. The landlord, however, says that the tenant is himself to blame because he does not keep down the game. He says he should destroy it himself or put up a netting at his own expense. He evidently contemplates that if this netting had not been there, the tenant would have put up one himself because it would have been useful to him. I think the tenant was entitled to rely that the netting he saw would not be disturbed. I am therefore of opinion it must be restored, or an equivalent be furnished, and that the pursuer is entitled to such damages as he has sustained.

Lord Adam and Lord Kinnear concurred.

Lord Mure and Lord Shand were absent.

The Court adhered.

James Forsyth, S.S.C.—Dundas & Wilson, C.S.—Agents.

No. 90.

Mar. 2, 1888.
Sutherland v.
Prestongrange
Coal and Fire-
Brick Co.
Limited.

Charles Sutherland, Pursuer.—Rhind—Gunn.
Prestongrange Coal and Fire-Brick Company, Limited, Defenders.—
A. J. Young—Clyde.

Process—Jury—New trial—Reparation—Juryman visiting locus during progress of trial—Act 55 Geo. III. cap. 42, sec. 6.—During a jury trial in an action of damages at the instance of a workman who was injured in a colliery, evidence was led on 21st and 24th January. On the 23d one of the jury went by himself to inspect the locus of the accident, and the method of working the colliery. The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer. The defender moved the Court to grant a new trial, in terms of sec. 6 of the Act 55 Geo. III. cap. 42,* on the ground that the conduct of the juryman had rendered it impossible for the jury to return a verdict according to the evidence led before them.

The Court granted a new trial.

1st Division.
Lord Fraser.
B.

In November 1887 Charles Sutherland, carter, Tranent, raised an action against the Prestongrange Coal and Fire-Brick Company, Limited, concluding for damages in respect of injuries received by him at the defenders' colliery, near Prestonpans.

The case went to trial before Lord Fraser with a jury on 21st January 1888. The cause was then continued to the 24th, when further evidence was led.

The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer by a majority of seven to five.

The defenders thereafter moved the First Division to grant a new trial on the grounds (1) that the verdict was contrary to evidence, (2) that the foreman of the jury had on Monday 23d January visited the locus of the accident, and seen how the operations, through which the accident to the pursuer occurred, were carried out.

---

* The Act 55 Geo. III. cap. 42, sec. 6, enacts,—"And be it further enacted . . . it shall be lawful and competent for the party who is dissatisfied with the verdict to apply to the division of the Court of Session which directed the issue for a new trial on the ground of the verdict being contrary to evidence . . . or for such other cause as is essential to the justice of the case."

The Court granted a rule, and ordained the defenders to obtain and lodge in process an affidavit from the juryman of whose conduct they complained.

On 2d March the affidavit was lodged. The juryman therein stated that he had visited the locus on the day libelled, and had been shewn over the colliery, and had the method of working explained to him by the defenders' manager. He did not speak of the case to him. The affidavit then proceeded,—"On Tuesday morning when I arrived in Court I told the jurymen whom I saw that I had visited the scene of the accident on the previous day, but at this time there was no opportunity of discussing the matter. I am quite willing to state what passed when the jury retired, if desired by the Court to do so."

The defenders argued;—This was such an irregularity that it was in the words of the Act 55 Geo. III. sec. 6, "essential to the justice of the case" that a new trial should be granted. The jury were sworn to return a verdict according to the evidence led before them, and whether this juryman influenced his brother jurymen by relating to them what he had seen, or not, his mind must have been impressed by what he saw, and he at least did not give a verdict according to his oath. Thus, the majority being only seven to five, the defenders may have lost this juryman's vote through his action.

Argued for the pursuer;—This objection should have been stated before the verdict was taken,[1] as it came to the knowledge of the defenders' agents before the jury retired that the juryman had gone to see the locus. The defenders were evidently willing to have acquiesced in the verdict if it had been in their favour. Further the defenders were not entitled to assume that this juryman voted against them. There was no evidence or statement that such was the case. This irregularity was not such as to make it essential to the justice of the case that a new trial should be granted; the juryman was not any less likely to give a true verdict because he knew something of the locus. If he had happened to know it before, his knowledge would not have disqualified him.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question for us to consider is whether the defenders have here assigned cause "essential to the justice of the case" for setting aside the verdict of the jury. I am of opinion that they have. There has, I think, been here a gross miscarriage of justice. The irregularity complained of is, so far as I know, entirely without precedent in this Court, and is one which is of the greatest importance to the justice of the cause. The jury are empaneled and sworn to return a verdict according to the evidence led before them. They are not entitled to proceed upon anything else but the evidence given upon oath, and if they do proceed upon anything else they cannot return a verdict according to their oath.

In the present case it is impossible to believe that this juryman when he went to visit the locus of the accident, and informed himself how the work at which the accident occurred is carried out, had not some impression made upon his mind by what he saw. In what direction he was influenced we cannot say, very possibly he could not say himself. But if he was influenced in any way he was placed in a position in which no juryman should be placed; and that by his own fault.

Whether he influenced the minds of his co-jurymen we do not know, but it is very probable that he did. He certainly mentioned the fact that he had

---

[1] Williams v. Great Western Railway Co., 1858, 28 L. J. Exch. 2.

No. 90.

Mar. 2, 1888.
Sutherland v. Prestongrange Coal and Fire-Brick Co. Limited.

visited the locus to one of the other jurymen while the case was going on, and it is quite evident, I think, that, though he does not say that he said anything about his visit after the jury retired, he did do so. But whether he did so or not, his mind at all events was so influenced that he could not return a verdict according to his oath. I think therefore it is essential to the justice of the case that we should grant a new trial.

LORD ADAM.—It is impossible to feel satisfied that the verdict in this case was returned according to the evidence laid before the jury. It is impossible to believe that this gentleman who went to see the locus of the accident, and the way in which the work was carried on there, was not impressed by what he saw. He therefore gave his verdict upon evidence not obtained at the trial. Whether, or how far, he influenced others by stating the impression made upon himself, it is impossible to state, but it is very probable that he did to some extent influence his co-jurors. I think therefore a new trial ought to be granted.

LORD FRASER and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

THE COURT made the rule absolute, and granted a new trial.

CHARLES B. HOGG, L.A.—DRUMMOND & REID, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 91.

Mar. 2, 1888.
Barry's Trustees v. Barry.

JANET SMITH OR BARRY AND OTHERS (Barry's Trustees), First Parties.—C. S. Dickson.
JANET SMITH OR BARRY, Second Party.—C. S. Dickson.
MARY BARRY, Third Party.—Crole.

Trust—Parent and child—Separate maintenance of child.—A truster directed his trustees to pay to his wife, if she survived him, a certain annuity, and to permit her to have the occupation during her lifetime of a dwelling-house and the use of the furniture therein, declaring that she "shall out of the foresaid provisions educate and maintain my children . . . in a way befitting their station in life, until they shall respectively attain the age of twenty-one years or, if daughters, be married." He was survived by his wife and by several sons and daughters of that and of a prior marriage. The settlement left undisposed of part of the income and most of the capital of his estate, which was of considerable amount. Held that one of the daughters of the first marriage, who was over twenty-one years of age and desired to live apart from the widow, was not entitled under the settlement to a separate maintenance out of the widow's annuity, it being sufficient implement of the widow's obligation that she offered to maintain the daughter in family with her in the dwelling-house left by the truster.

2D DIVISION.
M.

JOHN BARRY, merchant, Leith, died on 21st May 1884. He had been twice married. He was survived by his second wife and by three children (a son and two daughters) of his first marriage, of whom the eldest was Mary, who was born in 1858, and by three children (two sons and a daughter) of his second marriage.

He left a settlement by which he conveyed his whole estate to trustees for certain purposes.

By the second purpose of the settlement he directed his trustees to pay to his widow a free annuity of £700, and to "permit" her "to occupy and possess my present dwelling-house . . . or any other dwelling-house which may be occupied by me at the time of my death, along with the whole household furniture and plenishing of every description belonging to me that may be in it," declaring that these provisions should be accepted by her in full satisfaction of her whole legal claims against his estate (except mournings and aliment till her annuity commenced to be payable), "providing and declaring that my said wife shall, out of the foresaid provisions, educate and maintain my children, born or to be born, in a way befitting their station in life, until they shall respectively attain the age of twenty-one years or, if daughters, be married." By the third purpose the truster provided for the carrying on of his business if it continued profitable, and by the fourth purpose he made a certain provision as to the application of the income, to an extent not exceeding £1000 after the death of his widow, but the settlement left undisposed of the great bulk of the estate.

No. 91.

Mar. 2, 1888.
Barry's Trustees v. Barry.

He also declared it to be his wish that after his widow's death his dwelling-house should be occupied by his unmarried daughters, free of all rents and charges.

The value of the trust-estate at the death of the truster was £7400 of heritage and £11,054 of moveables. The average yearly income, including the business profits, was £2063. The annual value of the house liferented by the widow was £50.

Mr Barry's first wife was a Roman Catholic, and Miss Mary Barry was educated in that faith, and resolved to become a nun. About six months prior to the death of the truster he had placed her in a convent at Rockferry, Birkenhead, as a novice, and paid for her a year's board, £40. She continued after her father's death to reside in that convent.

This special case was presented by the trustees (first parties), Mrs Barry (second party), and Miss Mary Barry (third party), to determine the question whether the board payable for Miss Mary Barry ought to be paid by Mrs Barry out of her annuity, or ought to be charged to the third party's own prospective share of her father's estate.

This question of law was stated,—"Is Mrs Barry bound to pay to Miss Barry a sum of money for her separate maintenance?"

The case stated that the trustees had "offered to pay the sum of £40 per annum to Miss Barry for her maintenance, debiting her share of her father's estate with such payments, if the Court shall be of opinion that they are entitled so to do, but Miss Barry objects to such payments being put to the debit of her share."

Argued for the first and second parties;—The widow's income was intended to be applied to the maintenance of a home for her and the unmarried daughters, and its amount had no doubt been fixed by the truster with that in view. It was not intended to provide a variety of separate establishments. If the third party were right the other daughters could make the same demand, and leave the house intended as the home of all to be the home of the widow only. The third party's board, if she declined the offer of the second party, should come from her own funds.

Argued for the third party;—The provision of the settlement bound the second party to support the truster's daughters till marriage. They might choose their own residence, and need not live with her. In the third party's case the truster must have contemplated that result, for he himself placed her in the convent. A stepmother bound to aliment a stepchild could not discharge that obligation by a mere offer of maintenance in her own house.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The claim here made by the daughter is one which can only be sustained if the will of the testator will bear out the contention which she has made. Her stepmother, the widow, has an alimentary provision of £700. She is bound out of it to maintain the unmarried daughters, but I think she is not bound to do so except in the house the testator has left her for that purpose. The daughter has gone into a nunnery. I think the stepmother is not bound to maintain her there. She offers to receive her into the house the testator left for that purpose and maintain her there out of her alimentary provision of £700, also left for that purpose, and I think she is no further bound.

No. 91.

Mar. 2, 1888.
Barry's Trustees v. Barry.

Lord Young.—I am of the same opinion. I think the question must be answered in the negative. Mrs Barry, the stepmother, has no interest in the estate of her deceased husband except to the extent of a sum of £700 a-year and a residence. That £700 a-year and that residence are given her by the will on the condition that she shall by means of them "educate and maintain my children, born or to be born, in a way befitting their station in life, until they shall respectively attain the age of twenty-one years or, if daughters, be married."

She is to maintain and educate the children till they are twenty-one, being freed earlier if they, being daughters, are earlier married. This daughter, Mary, did not marry before attaining that age. She is now unmarried and about thirty years of age. Fortunately for her, or for those who are now entertaining her in a nunnery at Birkenhead, her father died a man of considerable wealth, and that wealth is not disposed of adversely to her, except to the extent of £700 annually during her stepmother's life. What action she may have against those who are in possession of her deceased father's estate, which prima facie is liable to maintain her, I am not in a position to say in this case, and I have not considered. I am of opinion that the widow is not bound to give her a separate maintenance out of her £700 a-year.

Lord Craighill concurred.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I am clear that under the will there is no obligation on the stepmother to support Miss Barry in this nunnery.

The Court answered the question in the negative.

Andrew Wallace, S.S.C.—Tait & Crichton, W.S.—Agents.

No. 92.

Mar. 7, 1888.
Hine Brothers v. Clyde Trustees.

Hine Brothers, Pursuers (Appellants).—D.-F. Mackintosh—C. S. Dickson.

The Trustees of the Clyde Navigation, Defenders (Respondents).—Ure.

Ship—Reparation—Liability for collision.—Where a ship is placed in a position of peril and difficulty by the wrong manœuvring of another ship, and her captain in exercising his best judgment for the safety of his vessel commits an error which causes or contributes to a collision between them, he will not be held in fault.

The steamer "Horatio" going down the Clyde on an outward voyage after sundown kept too much to the south—her wrong side of the channel. A steam barge which was coming up on the south—her proper side—being in danger of coming into collision with the "Horatio," and thinking from her lights that she was going into Greenock on the south side, and that if she herself kept her own course collision would be inevitable, endeavoured to keep outside of her by going to the north. The "Horatio," however, almost at the same time, had changed her course with the view of passing on the north side, and a collision resulted. In an action for damages by the owners of the "Horatio," held that the master of the barge having been put in great danger and difficulty by the pursuers' own fault, and having steered as seemed best to avoid the danger so caused, was not in fault, and therefore that the owners were not liable.

No. 92.

Mar. 7, 1888.
Hine Brothers v. Clyde Trustees.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
M.

HINE BROTHERS, steamship owners, Maryport, raised an action against the Trustees of the Clyde Navigation in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, concluding for £215, 19s. 6d. as damages sustained through a collision between the steamship "Horatio," belonging to the pursuers, and a hopper barge belonging to the defenders. The barge was at the time coming up and the "Horatio" going down the river.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 3) "Both in the navigation of the 'Horatio' down the river, and the course taken for passing the barge, the 'Horatio' observed the well-known rules of good seamanship, and acted in accordance with the statutory sailing directions, Board of Trade rules, and local rules and practice applicable to the navigation of Cartsdyke Bay, while the barge failed to observe these rules, and was navigated in defiance of them by officers or servants of the defenders who were in charge of the barge. In particular, the defenders' said servants failed to observe Articles 15, 18, 19, 21, and 22 of the Board of Trade Rules for Preventing Collisions at Sea." * (Cond. 4) "The collision which occurred between the said two vessels was owing entirely to the faulty or negligent navigation of the said barge, and, in particular, owing to her course having been improperly altered to port while she was approaching the 'Horatio,' and to her failure to observe the said sailing rules and practice. The counter averments are denied. . . ."

The defenders, in answer, stated;—(Ans. 3) "Denied. At the time of the collision the 'Horatio' was on the wrong side of the channel." (Ans. 4) "Denied. The collision occurred through the fault of those on board the 'Horatio,' and their failure to observe the rules of good seamanship and the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, and particularly, without prejudice to said generality, articles 15, 18, 19, and 21 thereof. . . ."

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The collision not having been caused by the fault of the defenders, or by those for whom they are responsible, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

A proof was led. It appeared that the collision took place on the afternoon of 21st October 1886 after dusk. The "Horatio," a vessel of 261 tons burden, was going down the Clyde on an outward voyage, had rounded Garvel Point, and got into Cartsdyke Bay and was nearly opposite the harbour works of Greenock. She was under the charge of a pilot. She was on the south side of the channel, which was not the proper

---

* The Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, dated 11th August 1884, provided,—"Art. 15. If two ships under steam are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, each shall alter her course to starboard, so that each may pass on the port side of the other."

"Art. 18. Every steamship, when approaching another ship, so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed or stop and reverse, if necessary."

"Art. 19. In taking any course authorised or required by these regulations, a steamship under way may indicate that course to any other ship which she has in sight by the following signals on her steam-whistle, viz. :—One short blast to mean 'I am directing my course to starboard'; two short blasts to mean 'I am directing my course to port'; three short blasts to mean 'I am going full speed astern.' The use of these signals is optional; but if they are used, the course of the ship must be in accordance with the signal made."

"Art. 21. In narrow channels every steamship shall, when it is safe and practicable, keep to that side of the fairway or mid-channel which lies on the starboard side of such ship."

"Art. 22. Where by the above rules one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course."

"Art. 23. In obeying and construing these rules due regard shall be had to all dangers of navigation, and to any special circumstances which may render a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger."

No. 92.
Mar. 7, 1888.
Hine Brothers v. Clyde Trustees.

side for a vessel which like the "Horatio" was going down the river and was not intending to call at Greenock. A vessel going into Greenock might have been in such a position. The south side was the proper side for a vessel coming up the river. The defenders' barge was at the time coming up the river close to the south side. The "Horatio" saw the lights of the barge just as she got round Garvel Point, and the barge saw her lights. The "Horatio" ported her helm, and whistled.

The proper side for a vessel going up the river to pass another was the south, but the master of the barge believed that the "Horatio" meant to go to the south side, and treated her as a vessel going into Greenock. He therefore, before he had observed that the "Horatio" had ported her helm and was coming to the north, put his helm to starboard so as to keep out to the north side of her, a manœuvre which had the effect of taking his barge somewhat across the course the "Horatio" was taking. The result was that though on finding that by the position of the lights of the "Horatio" she had ported her helm, and that their courses were converging, he stopped and reversed his engines, the vessels came into collision, the barge striking the "Horatio" nearly amidships on the port side, and doing her considerable damage.*

The Sheriff-substitute (Lees) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that on 21st October 1886, while the steamship 'Horatio,' belonging to the pursuers, was proceeding down the Clyde, and the hopper barge No. 4, belonging to the defenders, was proceeding up the Clyde, they came into collision in Cartsdyke Bay, near Greenock: Finds that by article 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, issued in pursuance of the Merchants Shipping Act, 1862, it is required that 'in narrow channels every steamship shall, when it is safe and practicable, keep to that side of the fairway or mid-channel which lies on the starboard side of such ship': Finds that the place where the collision occurred falls within this rule: Finds that at the time of the collision both vessels were on the southern half of the channel: Finds that by article 15 of said regulations it is required that 'if two ships under steam are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, each shall alter her course to starboard, so that each may pass on the port side of the other': Finds that when the master of the barge saw that a collision was imminent, or that his vessel would be driven on shore, he tried to pass on the starboard side of the 'Horatio': Finds that at or about the same time the helm of the 'Horatio' was put to port: Finds that the peril in which the vessels were placed arose from the fault of the 'Horatio' in being on the wrong side of the channel, and would not otherwise have occurred: Finds that the actual occurrence of the collision was caused by the master of the barge trying to pass on the starboard side of the 'Horatio': Finds in these circumstances, as matter of law, that the peril having originated in the fault of the 'Horatio' in being on the wrong side of the channel, the pursuers are thereby barred from obtaining compensation for the injuries received by their vessel through any fault of the defenders' servants in trying to take the barge past the 'Horatio' on her starboard side: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns." †

---

* The evidence of the master of the "Princess Royal," a steamer which was going down river behind the "Horatio," who saw the collision, is quoted in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk.

† "NOTE.—The western boundary of the river Clyde is a line drawn from Newark Castle to the mouth of Cardross Burn. As it is now admitted, in the light of the evidence that has been led, that the locus of the collision was west

No. 92.

Mar. 7, 1888.
Hine Brothers v. Clyde Trustees.

The pursuers appealed to the Court of Session.

At the debate the argument turned in part on the "Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea" and their bearing on the circumstances of the case. These rules are quoted supra, p. 499. The Court being, however, of opinion that the decision did not turn on any construction of these rules, the argument on them need not here be detailed. The of this imaginary line, the defenders ultimately abandoned the pleas founded on their own byelaws.

---

"The general requirement as to how vessels shall pass one another where they meet end on, or nearly end on, is that each is to pass on the port side of the other. The pursuers contend that, as the barge transgressed this rule, the defenders are therefore liable to them in compensation. They found on the well-known case of the Stoomvart Maatschappy Nederland v. The Directors of the P. and O. Steam Navigation Co., 1880, 5 App. Cas. H. L. 876, as establishing liability against the defenders. That case, however, did not go quite so far as the pursuers contend, though it did emphatically lay down the rule that disregard of the directions given by the Regulations is not to be based on considerations of discretion and expediency, but on actual necessity. The House of Lords accordingly held, in regard to the claim for compensation made by the owners of each vessel, that both were to blame. In the present instance the only claim made is by the pursuers, and therefore the judgment must be the same, whether they fail to prove fault on the part of those in charge of the barge, or whether they prove it, if they themselves were also to blame.

"The defenders contend in reply that, as matter of fact, the ships were not end on, or nearly so; but I am inclined to believe, on the whole, that they were sufficiently so to let Article 15 of the Regulations apply.

"But the defenders maintain they are entitled to immunity in respect of the provisions in Article 21 of the Regulations, which requires that in narrow channels a steamship is to keep on that side of the fairway or mid-channel which lies on her starboard side. The pursuers say this rule is inapplicable, as the place where the collision occurred was beyond the limits of the river. But, in my opinion, the rule is not limited to the river. It is not a question of where is the mouth of the river, and that all above that is narrow channel, and all below it is not so. As matter of fact, I understand the channel is broader above the spot where the collision occurred than at it or below it. And I should have little hesitation in holding that the rule would apply as regards the Kyles of Bute or Loch Long. The only requirement to make the rule apply is that the place in regard to which it is mooted is a narrow channel, and, therefore, I should think it applicable to a narrow passage between islands anywhere, or between an island and the mainland. Indeed, it would be absurd to say that the rule was to be applicable at a place where measures of precaution were little needed, and not where they were most needed. It is the narrowness of the channel that creates the danger, and therefore requires that, to avoid risk of collision where there is no room to manœuvre, each vessel shall keep to her own side of the channel.

"Now, the 'Horatio' transgressed this rule. And this was the source of the danger. It was the fons et origo mali, and if the 'Horatio' had kept to her proper side, as the barge did to hers, nothing that the barge could have done would have brought about the collision.

"It is, therefore, unnecessary to determine whether the master of the barge was right or was wrong in trying to escape injury by passing the 'Horatio' on the starboard side. Possibly the case was one of actual necessity. This, however, is open to argument. But, even assuming that it were held that the barge was wrong in trying to pass on the starboard side, the important point is that her election or adoption of this wrong course could not have occurred if the 'Horatio' had kept to her own side of the channel. The barge was close to the shore on her proper side of the channel, the 'Horatio' was where she had no right to be; and as it was her being there created the danger, I think her owners are barred from obtaining the compensation that they seek."

No. 92. — Mar. 7, 1888. Hine Brothers v. Clyde Trustees.

pursuers further argued;—It was not proved that the "Horatio" was keeping a course too far to the south, and the finding of the Sheriff that the causa proxima of the accident was the act of the barge was entirely in their favour. The idea that the "Horatio" might be about to call at Greenock did not justify the barge in taking her wrong side. Even if the barge had kept on the course she was on when she saw the "Horatio" there would have been no collision, multo magis if she had kept further to the south. The barge was therefore alone to blame, and even if the "Horatio" had been originally on her wrong side, must bear the loss.[1] Nothing short of necessity would justify a vessel in taking her wrong side.[2] Even if the "Horatio" were to be deemed in fault, the barge was also in fault, and the loss should be divided.

Argued for the defenders;—It was not maintained on the other side that the barge was wrong before she put her helm to starboard to go to the north. She acted rightly in the circumstances in doing so. The probability was that if she had kept her course, or merely stopped and reversed, she would have been run down, and to the south she could not go when the course of the "Horatio" seemed to be to the south. The "Horatio" did not port her helm in time, or the barge would never have been obliged to starboard her helm and try to pass her on the north. Even if it was an error to try this course, it was an error due not to her own fault but to the fault of the "Horatio," and the defenders were not liable for an error committed in their captain's endeavour to do his best in the position in which the "Horatio" placed him.[3]

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I think the judgment of the Sheriff that the owners of the barge are not responsible for the damage caused to the "Horatio" by the collision ought to be affirmed.

The "Horatio," a steam vessel outward bound, was going down the Clyde and had reached a point near Greenock, at which port she had no intention of stopping, when at 5.30 on an October afternoon a collision took place between her and the defenders' barge. The collision took place after the "Horatio" had passed Garvel Point. The barge ran into her and did the damage complained of. It is said that the barge is responsible, because in the course of the manœuvring which preceded the collision, she acted in breach of the rules for the prevention of collisions between ships at sea. If it were necessary, as I think it is not, to decide any question on these rules, I should be inclined to think the rules were not strictly observed.

But the larger and more important matter is this, that the "Horatio," although outward bound, and with plenty of room, came too near the south shore, and, by doing so, caused the difficulty which arose. I am of opinion that if a large vessel having her own proper course quits it and causes a difficulty, such as that into which "Horatio" put the barge, to a smaller vessel coming towards her, putting her without any good reason, and contrary to good navigation, into a position of difficulty and danger, it is not a good contention for the larger ship to say "You broke this or that rule for the passing of ships at sea." When the confusion has been caused by the vessel which has so acted, allowance must be made for the ship which has been placed in an unexpected difficulty. If in a moment of extreme difficulty so caused, that ship does something contrary to rule that will not render it necessarily liable for the damage caused thereby. It was well observed by James, L.-J. in the case of the Bywell Castle which was quoted to us, "I desire to add my opinion that a ship has no right by its own misconduct to put another ship into a situation of extreme peril and then charge that other ship with misconduct. My opinion is that if in that moment of extreme peril and difficulty such other ship happens to do something wrong, so as to be a contributory to the mischief, that would not render her liable for the damage, inasmuch as perfect presence of mind, accurate judgment, and promptitude under all circumstances are not to be expected. You have no right to expect men to be something more than ordinary men." That passage exactly expresses my view here.

---

[1] Cayzer, Irvine, & Co. v. Carron Co., Aug. 1, 1884, L. R., 9 App. Ca. 873; Spaight v. Tedcastle, March 7, 1881, L. R., 6 App. Ca. 217; "The Khedive," July 23, 1880, L. R., 5 App. Ca. 876.

[2] "The Khedive," supra; "The Benares," Dec. 3, 1883, L. R., 9 P. D. 16.

[3] "The Bywell Castle," July 15, 1879, L. R., 4 P. D. 219.

Now, an account of the manner in which this accident happened is given by the master of the "Princess Royal," a steamer which was coming down behind the "Horatio." He says,—"I saw the hopper barge and the 'Horatio' in their course before the collision. The 'Horatio' was keeping considerably to the south side of the channel. The 'Princess Royal' was about mid-channel as near as possible. The 'Horatio' was to the south of us. When I noticed the hopper barge first I think she would be about the West India Quay—between that and Steel's yard. She was on the south side of the channel. As near as I can describe it, the two vessels came together somewhere about Steel's slip. When the vessels came into collision the 'Princess Royal' would be nearly her own length distant from the 'Horatio'—about 300 feet. When I saw that a collision was imminent, I backed full speed and put stern way on my ship. The second mate was steering beside me on the bridge. Before the collision happened, when I saw the angle of both vessels, and them so near, I said to the second mate 'There is a collision going to happen here.' The second mate made a remark to me; he said 'I do not think they have struck.' I said 'Yes, they have, because I saw the concussion.' The barge being a little light, I could see her mast giving a little shake. I said something about who was to blame. I did not know the name of the steamer coming down, but I said she was wholly to blame. I thought he had not a leg to stand upon, because if she had been navigated in her proper position in the river there would have been no collision." I think that that evidence (of which there is ample corroboration) shews that the "Horatio" was not keeping a proper course. The course she was keeping caused the crew of the barge to think she was going into Greenock. That impression was not unreasonable or unnatural, and the accident resulted from the course the crew of the barge felt bound to take,—in consequence of it. I give no opinion on the details of the rules, because the other grounds I have stated are sufficient.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, on the same grounds. I think the case involves no legal question on the navigation rules which were cited to us. The central fact is that the ships came into collision at a point shewn on the plan, and which is close in to the harbour works at Greenock. The barge was on her way up the river and the ship was going down the river, having no occasion to call at Greenock. The question is, whether there was fault, and if so, whose fault. I think it was not an unavoidable accident, and, therefore, that there was fault. The first fault at all events was that of the "Horatio," that she should not have been there. She was out of her proper course. I do not mean that it was unlawful for her to have steered a course which might take her there. That was not contended. But she was out of her proper course. Then she ought to have gone to starboard, so as not to get to the point to which I have referred. But to it she did get. The barge saw her green light, and she must have seen the red light of the barge. What was the barge to think from seeing her there? It could only be concluded that she was going into Greenock. Her position was proper for a ship going there, but not for a ship going outward down the river. What then was the duty of the barge? It was to do what she did, to keep outside by starboarding her helm so as to go to port, and keep outside the course which the vessel crossing her path would take. I think it is according to the evidence that had the "Horatio" continued in the course she was holding when quite near the barge, and had the barge continued in hers, there would have been inevitably a collision, and therefore the barge had to change her course, unless, indeed, she was bound to act on the belief that the "Horatio" would not continue in hers. The fault therefore imputed to the barge is that those on board of her ought to have had faith that the "Horatio" would alter her course, as in fact she did. But such a belief was not to be looked for on pain of being held a wrongdoer if it was not shewn. I cannot therefore impute blame to the barge for taking such a course as would take her outside the "Horatio." I think the course taken by the barge was reasonable and proper.

No. 92.

Mar. 7, 1888.
Hine Brothers v. Clyde Trustees.

If I had to say who was to blame, I should be prepared to place the blame on the "Horatio." But that is not necessary. I am for negativing the averment that the barge was in fault.

Lord Craighill and Lord Rutherfurd Clark concurred.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the collision between the steamship 'Horatio' belonging to the pursuers and the hopper barge belonging to the defenders was not caused by fault of the defenders or those for whom they are responsible: Therefore dismiss the appeal, and affirm the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against."

R. Bruce Cowan, W.S.—Webster, Will, & Ritchie, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 93.

Mar. 7, 1888.
Shaw v. Caledonian Railway Co.

John Shaw, Pursuer (Appellant).—C. S. Dickson.
Caledonian Railway Company, Defenders (Respondents).—
R. Johnstone—Clyde.

Process—All parties not called—Company—Action for registration of transfer.—The transferee of stock in a railway company raised an action against the company to have them ordained to register the transfer. The company in defence averred that the transferor had instructed them not to register the transfer, on the ground that the transferee was "illegally disposing of" the transferor's stock; and pleaded "all parties are not called." The Court held that it was not necessary to call the transferor as a defender in the action, but in respect that the action had not been formally intimated to him ordained the defenders to transmit to him a copy of the record and a copy of the interlocutor certifying him that if he failed within eight days to state objections to the registration of the transfer, judgment would be pronounced against the defenders.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
M.

On 9th November 1887, John Shaw, sharebroker, London, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, at Glasgow, against the Caledonian Railway Company, in which he prayed the Court "to ordain the defenders to register in their register of transfers a transfer at present in their hands granted by John Rayner, late of Hoburne, Christ Church,

No. 93.

Mar. 7, 1888.
Shaw v. Caledonian Railway Co.

Hants, and now of 89 Hugh Street, Eccleston Square, London, S.W., in favour of the pursuer, dated the 26th day of July 1887, whereby the said John Rayner transferred to the pursuer £80 Consolidated Stock of and in the defenders' undertaking, and to ordain the defenders to deliver to the pursuer a certificate or scrip in his favour representing that he is now the holder of the said stock."

He stated that on 26th July 1887 he wrote to the railway company enclosing the certificate for the stock in question in name of John Rayner, and transfer by Rayner in his favour, and requested them to record the transfer, but that the company refused to do so.

The defenders averred;—"On 27th July 1887 the defenders received from the pursuer a transfer of said stock, which, ex facie, appeared to be granted by the said John Rayner in favour of the pursuer. The stock certificate in name of the said John Rayner was sent along with the transfer, and the defenders were requested to register the transfer in name of pursuer. At the same time the pursuer sent to the defenders' registrar a transfer of said stock by him to a Mr G. L. Payne, and requested that the registrar should certify this transfer. The said transfer was not executed by the transferee Payne, and the object of the pursuer in asking the registrar to certify the transfer was to enable the pursuer to get payment of the price from the purchaser G. L. Payne." (Stat. 2) "Simultaneously with the receipt of the transfer and stock certificate by the defenders, they received from the said John Rayner, the transferor, a post-card of which the following is a copy,—'S. W., 4 Passmore St., Chester Square, London. The Secretary, &c., Caledonian Ry. Co., Glasgow. Sir,—There is a man named Shaw, an outside broker, illegally disposing of my stock; it is not to be transferred out of my name.—Yours very truly. JNO. RAYNER.'" (Stat. 3) "The registrar of the defenders sent to pursuer a copy of the above post-card on the day it was received, viz., 27th July 1887, and intimated that in the circumstances he must defer doing anything until the matter had been arranged between the pursuer and the said John Rayner." (Stat. 4) "In reply to the above letter the pursuer, on 28th July 1887, wrote to the defenders stating that he need hardly say he should be very unlikely to dispose of stocks illegally. He also intimated that the transfers, &c., were duly completed, and that there could be no question as to his title, and gave notice that Mr Rayner had transferred the £80 stock to him. Subsequently, on 30th September, the pursuer asked the defenders' registrar to return the transfer which he had executed into the name of Mr G. L. Payne, and this was done." (Stat. 5) "A copy of the above letter was, on 4th August 1887, transmitted by the registrar of the defenders to the said John Rayner, and he was asked if he still adhered to the terms of his post-card of 26th July, and to that letter he replied on 6th August in the following terms:—'I have nothing to add to mine of the 26th. Mr Shaw has no claim to my stock.—Yours very respecty. JNO. RAYNER.' The defenders also received from the said John Rayner a post-card in the following terms:—'Gand, Belgium, Oct. 13, 1887.—Sir,—I am surprised you have not sent divd. as usual; the man Shaw has no legal claim on my stock. I suppose I must take proceedings against him for its recovery.—Yours faithfully, JNO. RAYNER.'" (Stat. 6) "It is the practice of the defenders, in common with all other railway companies and other corporations, to issue in the case of every transfer received by them for registration a notice to the transferor of the receipt by the defenders of the transfer, the object of the notice being to give the transferor an opportunity of stopping the registration of the transfer. No such notice required to be issued by defenders about the stock in question, as the objection of the said John Rayner to the regis-

No. 93.
—
Mar. 7, 1888.
Shaw v. Caledonian Railway Co.

tration of the transfer was received simultaneously with the transfer itself." (Stat. 7) "The pursuer has not furnished to the defenders any explanation about the acquisition by him from the said John Rayner of the stock in question, nor has he produced any evidence to establish the bona fides of the transaction, although asked by defenders to do so."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer being the transferee of the stock formerly held by the said John Rayner in virtue of a valid probative transfer, the defenders are bound to give effect to the said transfer, and to register the same, and issue a certificate or scrip in favour of the pursuer, all in terms of the prayer of the petition. (2) The statements of the defender are irrelevant, and ought not to be admitted to probation.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) All parties are not called. (2) No jurisdiction. (4) The defenders being interpelled by the notices from the said John Rayner from registering the transfer of the stock in question, decree of absolvitor ought to be pronounced. (5) The pursuer having failed to satisfy the defenders of the bona fides of the transfer, the action is premature, and the defenders ought to be assoilzied.

No formal intimation of the action was made to Mr Rayner.

On 13th January 1888 the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) sustained the defender's first plea in law, and dismissed the action.*

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the pursuer;—The company ought not to be allowed to defend a man who neglected to come forward and defend himself. The transfer, which was admittedly granted by Rayner, was ex facie good. All the cases relied on by the defenders, in which a company had been found liable for wrongly registering a person as a shareholder, were cases of forged transfers. No such case was averred here. There was no necessity for calling Rayner in this action; the decree sought could only go out against the company.

Argued for the defenders;—The company were not the true defenders here. Possibly it was right to call them for their interest, but the transferor of the shares was the proper defender. The pursuer might have raised his action in the English Courts if there was no jurisdiction against Rayner in Scotland. A company was not bound to register transfers immediately they were sent to them, particularly where the transferor objected to their doing so, as he did here. If they registered wrongly, they would be liable to the extent of the shares.[1] Forgery was not suggested here, but they had averred enough to shew that they had good reason for delaying the transfer till the truth was discovered as to Shaw's dealings with the shares.

---

* "NOTE.—. . . I am of opinion that the true question is between the pursuer and his transferor, Mr Rayner, and that the company defending is not bound to register the transfer in the face of his interpellation. Two courses might be open here, viz., (1) to dismiss, or (2) to sist the process until either the question shall be determined in other proceedings between the pursuer and Rayner, or Rayner, on intimation, shall choose to appear in this action and have the issue between him and the pursuer determined. Rayner, however, is out of the jurisdiction, and most probably would not choose to sist himself if called upon to do so. And I do not understand that the pursuer desires to have an opportunity of intimating the dependence of the action to him with that view. I therefore think that the natural result of sustaining the defender's first plea in law is the dismissal of the action.

"If both parties desired that Mr Rayner should be certified of the dependence of the action, and that if he failed to make good his objection to the transfer, registration would follow, there might be convenience so far as they are concerned in adopting that course. But they do not so concur; and even if they did, it might be a hardship for an Englishman to be coerced into a litigation in Scotland about matters which may involve questions very remote from this £80 of railway stock."

[1] Société Générale de Paris v. Walker, 1885, L. R., 11 App. Cas. 20; see

No. 93.

Mar. 7, 1888.
Shaw v. Caledonian Railway Co.

At advising,—

Lord President.—We are all of opinion that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute cannot stand. There is no necessity for calling any person who is not already in the case, as a defender. The decree requires to go out against the company, and against no one else, and we should therefore have proceeded at once to give judgment for the pursuer, were it not desirable that, as there has never yet been formal intimation of this action to Mr Rayner, that should be done, and we shall therefore make an order to that effect.

Lord Adam and Lord Kinnear concurred.

Lord Mure and Lord Shand were absent.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 13th January 1888: Repel the two first pleas stated for the defenders, and appoint the defenders to intimate the dependence of this process to John Rayner, the transferor in the transfer sought to be registered, and that by transmitting to him in a registered post letter a printed copy of the record in the appeal, and a copy of this interlocutor authenticated by the Clerk of Court, certifying the said John Rayner that if he fail within eight days to appear in the cause and state objections to the registration of the said transfer, judgment will be pronounced against the defenders."

David Turnbull, W.S.—Hope, Mann, & Kirk, W.S.—Agents.

No. 94.

Mar. 8, 1888.
Crum Ewing's Trustees v. Bayly's Trustees.

Alexander Dick and Others (Crum Ewing's Trustees), First Parties.—Mackay.
John Bayly and Others (Bayly's Marriage-Contract Trustees), Second Parties.—Murray.
John Bayly and Others, Third Parties.—Murray.
Alexander Crum Ewing and Others (Crum Ewing's Trustees), Fourth Parties.—Mackay.

Trust—Election—Provisions of father's settlement in lieu of marriage-contract provision to child.—A father in the marriage-contract of his daughter directed trustees, who held for him a policy for £3000 on his life, to assign it, to the extent of £2000, to the marriage-contract trustees for behoof of the daughter in liferent and her children in fee, and bound himself to pay the premiums during his life, and, failing his doing so, to pay to the marriage-contract trustees the sum of £2000 at the first term after his death. This and other provisions were declared to be in full of all the daughter could claim from her father's estate, except such provisions as he might make of his own free will by deed of settlement or otherwise. The policy was never assigned to the marriage-contract trustees. The father continued to pay the premiums till his death. He died leaving a settlement by which he directed one-third of the residue of his estate to be held for behoof of the daughter in liferent and her children in

---

Lord Blackburn, at pp. 35 and 41; Bahia v. San Francisco Railway Company, 1868, L. R., 3 Q. B. 584, see Blackburn J., at p. 596, Mellor J., at p. 597, and Lush J., at p. 598.

No. 94. fee, declaring that the provisions for her should be in full of all his obligations under her marriage-contract remaining unimplemented, "which provisions shall by acceptance of the provisions hereunder be held to have been discharged." Held that if the daughter and her husband took the share of the residue, they were not entitled to any part of the policy fund.

Mar. 8, 1888. Crum Ewing's Trustees v. Bayly's Trustees.

2D DIVISION. M.

IN the antenuptial contract of General and Mrs Jane Coventry Ewing Crum or Bayly (executed in July 1854) Mrs Bayly's father, the late Mr Humphry Ewing Crum Ewing of Strathleven, merchant in Glasgow, made, inter alia, the following provision:—"Whereas the said Humphry Ewing Crum Ewing has effected an insurance upon his life for the sum of £3000 with the Scottish Widows' Fund and Life Insurance Company, conform to policy, &c., dated 1st December 1847, and granted by the said insurance company at the desire of the said Humphry Ewing Crum Ewing in favour of Alexander Hastie, M.P.," and other persons, "as trustees for such purposes as he, the said Humphry Ewing Crum Ewing, should direct and appoint by a writing under his hand: Therefore the said Humphry Ewing Crum Ewing hereby directs and authorises the said trustees to assign and transfer the said policy of insurance, to the extent of the sum of £2000 sterling thereof, and of the corresponding emoluments and profits, which may have accrued or may accrue thereon, to the trustees hereby nominated and appointed under this contract, or their foresaids, to be held said policy to the extent of said sum of £2000, and corresponding emoluments and profits thereof, by the said trustees in trust for behoof of the said Miss Jane Coventry Ewing Crum in liferent, for her liferent use only, exclusive of the jus mariti and the debts and deeds of the said John Bayly as aforesaid, and for behoof of the children of the marriage in fee, in such shares as shall be apportioned among them in manner aforesaid, or failing such apportionment, then equally among them, the issue of any of them deceasing succeeding to their father or mother's share, whom all failing, then for behoof of the said Humphry Ewing Crum Ewing, or his heirs or assignees whomsoever: And in the meantime the said Humphry Ewing Crum Ewing binds and obliges himself to keep the said policy of insurance in force, and to pay the annual premiums due thereon during his life, and that regularly as they become due; and failing his doing so, then he binds and obliges himself and his foresaids to make payment to the said trustees, for the purposes foresaid, of the said sum of £2000 at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas succeeding his death, with the lawful interest thereof from the said term until the same is paid."

The deed contained this clause,—"And the said Miss Jane Coventry Ewing Crum and John Bayly hereby accept of the foresaid stipulations and provisions by the said Humphry Ewing Crum Ewing in favour of his said daughter and her children, secured by the foresaid trust, in full of all legitim or bairns' part of gear, and all other claims whatever competent to her against her said father, or his means and estate, except what farther provisions he may of his own free will make in her favour by deed of settlement or otherwise."

The insurance policy referred to did not specify the trusts upon which it was held by Mr Hastie and the other trustees, but by a deed of declaration, executed in 1850, the trustees declared that the policy was held in trust for three sons of Mr Crum Ewing, but it was further declared that notwithstanding the previous declaration the trustees should have full power to dispose of and apply the trust-funds "in such other way, and for such other purposes, as we or our said quorum shall deem proper, and that by any subsequent writing."

In the exercise of this reserved power the trustees, on 1st January 1877, executed a new declaration of trust, which was appended to the former. It bore,—"We, as surviving acting trustees foresaid, do now hereby alter and recall the purposes of the trust specified in said declaration, and declare that we hold the said policy and sum thereby insured, and all the benefits accruing thereon, for behoof of the said Humphry Ewing Crum Ewing, to be disposed of and applied as he may think proper and direct by assignation, deed of settlement, or otherwise."

The trustees holding the said policy of assurance never assigned or transferred to any extent the said policy to the trustees under the said contract of marriage, nor was the direction to assign the policy by Mr Crum Ewing contained in the said contract of marriage ever formally intimated to the trustees holding the policy.

Mr Crum Ewing paid the premiums on the policy down to the date of his death.

Mr Crum Ewing died on 3d July 1887, leaving a settlement dated 8th April 1887, in which he directed one-third of the residue of his estate to be held for behoof of Mrs Bayly in liferent and her children in fee.

The settlement contained this clause,—"And it is also specially provided and declared that the provision hereinbefore conceived in favour of the said Mrs Jane Coventry Crum or Bayly and her children shall be in full to her and them, and to the said John Bayly and their issue, of all provisions conceived by me in their or any of their favours by the antenuptial contract entered into between the said John Bayly and my said daughter, dated 4th July 1854, and particularly in lieu and in place of all obligations in their or any of their favours so far as still unimplemented undertaken by me by the said antenuptial contract, all of which provisions shall, by acceptance of the provisions hereunder, be held to have been discharged."

On the death of Mr Crum Ewing the trustees under the policy of assurance uplifted the sum contained in it. The proportion of that sum falling under the directions in Mrs Bayly's marriage-contract amounted, with profits, to £3723, 17s. 3d.

A special case was presented to the Court by the policy trustees as first parties, Mrs Bayly's marriage-contract trustees as second parties, General and Mrs Bayly and their children as third parties, and the testamentary trustees as fourth parties, for the opinion and judgment of the Court on the following questions:—"Whether the second parties, the marriage-contract trustees of General and Mrs Bayly, are entitled to claim, for behoof of General and Mrs Bayly and their children, the sum of £3723, 17s. 3d., being the proportion of the proceeds of the said policy of assurance provided to Mrs Bayly and her children by her contract of marriage; and the third parties, General and Mrs Bayly and their children, also to claim one-third of the residue of Mr Humphry Ewing Crum Ewing's estate, provided in their favour by his trust-disposition and settlement? Or, whether an election must be made between the two claims?"

The second and third parties maintained that the former were entitled to payment from the first parties of the sum they received under the policy, and that the third parties were also entitled under the settlement of Mr Crum Ewing to one-third of the residue of his estate.

The fourth parties contended that the third parties were bound by the terms of the settlement to elect between the policy fund and the one-third of residue.[1]

---

[1] Somervell v. Somervell, June 28, 1884, 11 R. 1004; Bonhotes v. Mitchell's Trustees, May 27, 1885, 12 R. 984.

No. 94.

Mar. 8, 1888.
Crum Ewing's Trustees v. Bayly's Trustees.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is of little moment whether this be called a case of election or not. The main fact is that the testator intended his succession to be divided into three equal portions, and the question is whether this obligation for payment of an amount much less than one of these portions to the marriage-contract trustees is to be regarded as a separate and specific obligation which is to be fulfilled to and enjoyed by the daughter who is the recipient of it without being counted as included in her third of residue. Now, I think the testator intended his children to share equally, and that the proceeds of the policy are simply to go in computo of the share falling to the daughter, Mrs Bayly.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion and on the same grounds. The obligation—for it is a mere obligation—which was undertaken by Mr Crum Ewing by the marriage-contract of his daughter is worthy of attention. It refers to two sums. It is introduced by a narrative that Mr Crum Ewing was desirous of securing to his daughter in liferent, and the children of the marriage in fee certain sums, and then the narrative goes on to state that he is owner of a policy for £3000, which is held by voluntary trustees for him, and he directs these trustees to transfer the policy to the extent of £2000 to the trustees under the marriage-contract so that they may draw it after his death. He obliges himself to pay the premiums, and there is this alternative which is rather significant. After binding himself to keep the policy in force and pay the premiums, "and failing his doing so, then he binds and obliges himself and his foresaids to make payment to the said trustees for the purposes foresaids of the said sum of £2000 at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas succeeding his death." That is to say he directs his voluntary trustees to transfer to a partial extent the policy which they hold, with the alternative that he binds himself and his executors on his death to pay £2000 to his daughter's marriage-contract trustees. He could not escape from that obligation except by inducing the creditors in it to abandon it by giving them something more valuable in its place. In that view it may be called a case of election, but the name is not important.

If the marriage-contract trustees chose to enforce the obligation in the marriage-contract there would be no good answer to them. They are entitled to £2000 out of the policy, or to £2000 out of the executry of Mr Crum Ewing, which is the same thing.

But, being under that obligation, he settles his whole estate among his children, on condition that if they take that provision it is to be in lieu of any claims a child might have on his estate. Mr Crum Ewing may escape from the obligation by saying: "If you choose to take one-third of the estate, which is settled in practically the same way as was the marriage-contract funds, you may do so, but will receive nothing else." Now, the marriage-contract trustees must, it is clear, elect to take the larger provision. If they take it they can claim nothing out of the policy.

LORD CRAIGHILL and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT answered the first question in the negative, and the second in the affirmative.

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C., Agents for all the parties.

No. 95.

Mar. 9, 1888.
Brown v.
Duncan.

GEORGE BROWN AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Respondents).—Asher—
R. V. Campbell.
MRS MARTHA BARCLAY OR DUNCAN, Defender (Appellant).—
Sol.-Gen. Robertson—Wallace.

Writ—Testament—Signature on erasure—Onus.—Where in a testamentary deed the signature bearing to be that of the testator was written on an erasure, but was otherwise ex facie duly tested, and the deed was challenged as vitiated in essentialibus, held that the deed was ex facie probative, and that the onus was consequently on the party challenging it to prove either that the signature was not genuine, or, if genuine, that it had not been duly tested. The proof on these points having failed, deed sustained.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Ayrshire.
I.

JOHN DUNCAN, ship-carpenter, Saltcoats, died on 22d September 1885, survived by his wife, but leaving no issue. After his death there was found in his repositories a settlement, dated 1st January 1876, by which he left his whole property to his wife, and appointed her his sole executor. This deed was written on a lithographed form, such as may be bought in stationers' shops. Its testing-clause and signatures were as follows:—" In witness whereof, I have subscribed these presents, written (in so far as not printed) by Robert Barclay, ironmonger at Kilwinning, this first day of January eighteen hundred and seventy-six years, before these witnesses, James Hendrie, ironfounder in Kilwinning, and John Anderson Peacock, grocer in Kilwinning. JOHN DUNCAN. James Hendrie, witness; John Anderson Peacock, witness."

The signature " John Duncan " was written on an erasure.

Mrs Duncan having petitioned the Sheriff of Ayrshire to be confirmed executor-nominate, George Brown and others, the representatives of Alexander Duncan, a brother and next of kin of the alleged testator (who had died shortly after him) presented a competing petition to be decerned executors-dative qua representatives of John Duncan's next of kin.

The pursuers, Brown and others, averred " that the alleged disposition and settlement is vitiated in essentialibus, and is ex facie inept, in respect the signature ' John Duncan,' alleged to be that of the deceased, is wholly written on an erasure. Further, it is averred that the witnesses who are alleged to attest the signature did not see the deceased John Duncan adhibit the said alleged signature, nor did he acknowledge the same to be his subscription in their presence."

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The deed founded on by the defenders being ex facie vitiated and invalid, the petitioners are entitled to have the same disregarded or set aside.

The defender, Mrs Duncan, pleaded;—(1) The deed founded on by the defenders being ex facie valid and probative must receive effect until it is reduced by an action in the Court of Session.

On 9th June 1887 the Sheriff-substitute (Paterson) pronounced this interlocutor:—" Before answer, allows to the defender, Mrs Duncan, a proof that the deed of settlement, No. 7 of process, was subscribed by the granter or maker thereof, and by the witnesses by whom the deed bears to be attested; and to the pursuers a conjunct probation." *

---

* In his note the Sheriff-substitute stated that the defender asked for a proof under the 39th section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94). That section enacts,—" No deed, instrument, or writing subscribed by the granter or maker thereof and bearing to be attested by two witnesses subscribing, and whether relating to land or not, shall be deemed invalid or denied effect according to its legal import because of any informality of execution, but the burden of proving that such deed, instrument, or writing so attested was

No. 95.

Mar. 9, 1888.
Brown v.
Duncan.

The general result of the evidence is given in the note to the Sheriff-substitute's final interlocutor.* There was no doubt that the signature "John Duncan" was in fact the signature of the deceased.

On 7th September the Sheriff-substitute pronounced an interlocutor, in which were, inter alia, these findings:—"Finds in fact that the signature 'John Duncan' to the testamentary deed, No. 7 of process, is superinduced on erasure; that the defender Mrs Duncan has failed to prove that the signature 'John Duncan,' at present adhibited to the said testamentary deed, was the signature attested by the two subscribing witnesses: Finds in law that the deed is invalid, and the nomination therein of 'Martha Barclay or Duncan, my wife, to be my sole executor,' is ineffectual."† subscribed by the granter or maker thereof and by the witnesses by whom such deed, instrument, or writing bears to be attested, shall lie upon the party using or upholding the same, and such proof may be led in any action or proceeding in which such deed, instrument, or writing is founded on or objected to, or in a special application to the Court of Session, or to the Sheriff within whose jurisdiction the defender in any such application resides, to have it declared that such deed, instrument, or writing was subscribed by such granter or maker and witnesses."

---

* Robert Birkmyre, lithographic writer and engraver, Glasgow, deponed,—"I have carefully examined the paper of the document, No. 7 of process, at the place where the signature 'John Duncan' is adhibited. I can find no trace of a previous signature having been on the paper where the present signature is. I could find no trace of writing of any kind having been at this place before the present signature was adhibited. . . . I consider that the whole signature has been written all at the same time. . . . I do not think the erasure has gone so far up on the paper as the top part of the 'h.' If there was an 'h' there before, it might have been a smaller 'h.' The very top part of the 'D' also does not shew on the paper any erasure beneath it. If there was a 'D' there before, it might not have gone up so far as the present 'D.' . . . . I have examined the paper of the will at the place where the signature 'John Duncan' is adhibited with a magnifying glass. The appearance it presents is, that a name may have been there, or some writing, or blot about the same length as the signature to the will, and that that has been scraped out. . . . My own idea is that the scraping has been done with a penknife. It might have been done with an ink-eraser, but, from the appearance of the paper, I would suppose it had been scraped with a knife. Something has been there before that has been scraped out. The state that the paper is in could not have been its state when it was made. The paper appears as if it had been gone over with something after it had been scraped, in order to smooth the surface. There are no remains of any previous writing at the place where the signature is adhibited. The original printed line for the subscription has only been partly erased at the place where the signature is, and a pencil line has been drawn along the place where the printed line was partially erased."

Another expert gave similar evidence.

† "NOTE.—It would appear from the evidence that the deceased John Duncan signed the testamentary deed in question in presence of the two attesting witnesses, on 1st January 1876, and that the deed remained in his custody from the date it was signed until the date of his death, 22d September 1885, and that he intended the deed to be effectual after his death.

"The presumption, however, is that the signature adhibited by him in presence of the witnesses has been subsequently erased, and the present signature superinduced on the erasure.

"If the present signature is not the signature which was attested by the witnesses, it is thought that the deed is in law invalid, although Mr Duncan may have believed and intended it to be effectual. The signature being on erasure, and no mention being made of this in the testing-clause, the deed is er

No. 95.

Mar. 9, 1888.
Brown v. Duncan.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—(1) The preliminary question here was, whether this signature had been written on an erasure. It might be that the paper had been scraped, but the evidence made it probable that this partly lithographed form had been sold in that condition, and if so, there was no erasure from the testator's deed, merely a defect in the paper. But (2) taking it to be an erasure, that circumstance was not conclusive against the defender. It did not amount to a vitiation in essentialibus, which could not be cured by parole. Gibson v. Walker[1] would no doubt be referred to; but there the signature on the erasure was that of an instrumentary witness, and totally different principles applied to the testator's own signature. A testator might sign on an erasure if he chose, and speaking generally there was no way of proving that he had done so except by parole. The opinions of Lord Fullerton and Lord Mackenzie in Grant v. Stoddart[2] implied that he might, when they sustained the validity of words holograph of the granter written on an facie improbative, and it is questionable whether the 39th section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, applies to such a case, and whether extrinsic evidence is admissible to prove that the present signature on erasure was the signature attested by the witnesses. (See M'Laren, 3 Rettie, 1151.)

---

"Assuming, however, the competency of the proof allowed, the defender, Mrs Duncan, has failed to establish that the present signature was the signature adhibited by the deceased in presence of the attesting witnesses. It is extremely improbable that this printed form, purchased by John Duncan shortly before the deed was signed, on 1st January 1876, should have erasures at the place where the testator was to sign—erasures corresponding respectively in dimensions with the testator's signature, 'John' and 'Duncan,' and made after the form was lithographed, as is shewn by the deletion of parts of the lithograph guiding line and the superinduction of a pencil line below the place of signature.

"The proof that the deceased kept the deed in his own custody, and up till the last regarded it as his settlement, negatives the suggestion that the erasure of the original signature, and superinduction of the present signature, was done by any hand but his own, at least without his authority. What induced him to do this it is unnecessary for the decision of this case to determine.

"The evidence of Mrs Duncan, however, suggested to the Sheriff-substitute a possible explanation. She depones that when he shewed her the deed on the night of the day on which it was signed, 'He said he thought shame of his signature beside the other signatures, as he was not a good writer.' She adds, 'He was not in the habit of practising his signature during the three years after our marriage (12th June 1875). I never saw him practising his signature during that time, but I have seen him practising his signature since he ceased work.'

"It is possible, if not probable, that it was because the deceased was dissatisfied with the appearance of his original signature, adhibited before the witnesses, and thought he might make a better signature when alone and unobserved, that he erased the original signature and superinduced on the erasure the present signature. . . .

"The only case (so far as the Sheriff-substitute is aware) in which a similar question has been raised is the case of Stirling Stuart v. Stirling Crawfurd's Trustees, 6th February 1885 (12 Rettie, 610), and there it seems to have been assumed that if the signature to the deed, although adhibited by the testator, was not substantially the signature attested by the witnesses, the deed would have been invalid.

"The Sheriff-substitute regrets that the effect of the judgment which he feels bound to pronounce is to frustrate the intentions of the testator."

[1] Gibson v. Walker, June 16, 1809, F.C., aff. April 20, 1814, 2 Dow's App. 270.

[2] Grant v. Stoddart, Feb. 27, 1849, 11 D. 860, 21 Scot. Jur. 241, per Lord Mackenzie, p. 867, and Lord Fullerton, p. 868.

erasure in the body of a tested deed, but not referred to in the testing-clause. The case of the granter's signature was a fortiori, for the foundation of the doctrine of erasure—that the words on the erasure had been introduced for the purpose of fraudulently making a change in the terms of the deed after signature—could not possibly apply to the granter's signature. Either the erasure was on the paper when he signed before the witnesses, or he, from whatever motive, had subsequently erased one signature of his own and inserted another also his own. Parole evidence was admissible at common law to set up the signature to a deed just as it was admissible to reduce the deed, and it also was admissible under the 39th section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874.[1] But (3) while the onus under the statute was on the party seeking to establish the deed, the onus at common law, where the granter's signature to a deed was impugned on the ground that it was on an erasure, was on the party impugning, the principle being that the doctrine of erasure, as already explained, had no application to the signature of the maker of a deed. The party impugning the genuineness of the signature had to prove his case just as he would have had to do if there had been no erasure. The erasure was a piece of evidence, but was not sufficient to shift the onus. The defender indeed did not require to put her case so high, for here the signature was admittedly genuine, or at anyrate that was proved beyond question, and it was also admitted that a signature of the testator had been duly tested. The objection therefore came to this, that this signature might not be the signature which the instrumentary witnesses attested. That brought the case within the well-settled rule that where a signature ex facie duly tested was challenged on the ground that it had not been duly tested the onus, and a heavy onus, lay on the party challenging. The most recent illustration of that rule—the case of Stirling Crawfurd[2]—was very near the present, for there a signature was challenged on the ground that it had been touched up after attestation. The Court applied the rule, and, on the evidence, rejected the challenger's plea. (4) Here the evidence failed to shew that the original signature had been erased and another substituted. On the contrary, even if the onus was on the defender she had made out her case. For it was much more probable that the form had been bought with the erasure on it, than that the testator, a person unaccustomed to penmanship, should have had the mechanical skill to erase his signature without destroying the paper and substitute a new signature. There was no direct evidence that he ever attempted to do so. (5) Admitting, however, the pursuers' view of the evidence on this point, that merely assimilated the case to the case of a deed with the signature accidentally torn off, or of a deed wholly destroyed. There was here no animus revocandi. But in that view the defender might have to bring a proving of the tenor.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) There was here undoubtedly an erasure, and the signature "John Duncan" was written on that erasure. That was fatal to the deed, the presumption of law being that what was written on an erasure was written after attestation (unless mentioned in the testing-clause), and consequently to be held pro non scripto.[3] The contention of the defender really came to this, that the signature was not inter essentialia of the deed. Parole evidence was incompetent to set up words written on erasure.[4] It had so been held with reference to the

---

[1] Quoted supra, p. 511, note.

[2] Stirling Stuart v. Stirling Crawfurd's Trustees, Feb. 6, 1885, 12 R. 610.

[3] Erskine's Inst. iii. 2, 20.

[4] M'Laren v. Menzies, July 20, 1876, 3 R. 1151.

No. 95.

Mar. 9, 1888.
Brown v. Duncan.

signature of an attesting witness,[1] and no sound distinction could be drawn between that and the signature of the principal. In Shepherd v. Grant's Trustees[2] the Court had refused to allow a proof that the erasure was on the paper before signature; that rule applied here. The opinions of Lord Mackenzie and Lord Fullerton in Grant v. Stoddart[3] were obiter, and Lord Jeffrey's opinion was the other way.[4] (2) If a parole proof was competent the onus was on the defender. She had sought to bring herself within the principle illustrated by Stirling Crawfurd's[5] case. But that principle applied only to deeds ex facie good. The probative quality of a deed was ascribed to it when it appeared to be ex facie good. A deed with a signature written on an erasure could never be called ex facie good. If not absolutely null, it was at all events prima facie bad. (3) The 39th section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, did not apply to the present case. If the view of the pursuers was sound, the deed had not, in law, been "subscribed by the granter or maker thereof"; their objection was either unsound, or the defect which they urged was much more radical than a mere "informality of execution." (4) On the proof the defender had failed. The view of the evidence which the Sheriff had taken was the right one.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—This question regards the validity of a will, the testator's signature to which appears to be written on an erasure. It is a regularly attested will. Now, I think the party founding upon such a will would be entitled to prevail by force of the instrument itself, in the case of nothing adverse being established. It is ex facie a good deed, and that none the less that the signature of the maker is upon an erasure. The erasure may invite inquiry, but if nothing is established adverse to the deed by that inquiry, beyond the fact which appears without inquiry,—that the signature is on an erasure, which you can see by mere inspection,—I am of opinion that the deed must prevail.

Here the Sheriff very properly allowed inquiry. A proof was taken, and I take the import of that proof to be as is expressed by the Sheriff in his note. I take that the more readily because his judgment is adverse to the deed, and contrary to the view at which I have arrived. I do not take what he says in the first paragraph of his note because it is his opinion but because it is my own. He says—"It would appear from the evidence that the deceased John Duncan signed the testamentary deed in presence of the two attesting witnesses, on 1st January 1876, and that the deed remained in his custody from the date it was signed until the date of his death, 22d September 1885, and that he intended the deed to be effectual after his death." This deed then was signed by the testator in presence of the two attesting witnesses, and it was never revoked by him,—for that is included in the statement that it remained in his custody till the date of his death, and that he intended that it should have effect.

Now, that in my opinion would be a sufficient reason or ground for our judgment —that it was a genuine, well-executed instrument, according to what the Sheriff

---

[1] Gibson v. Walker, June 16, 1809, F.C., aff. April 20, 1814, 2 Dow's App. 270.

[2] Shepherd v. Grant's Trustees, Jan. 24, 1844, 6 D. 464, 16 Scot. Jur. 211.

[3] Grant v. Stoddart, Feb. 27, 1849, 11 D. 860, 21 Scot. Jur. 241, per Lord Mackenzie, p. 867, and Lord Fullerton, p. 868.

[4] 11 D. p. 869.

[5] Stirling Stuart v. Stirling Crawfurd's Trustees, Feb. 6, 1885, 12 R. 610.

No. 95.

Mar. 9, 1888.
Brown v. Duncan.

has found to be the import of the evidence,—that it was kept by the testator in his custody till the date of his death—and that he never revoked it. In these circumstances, it seems to me that the deed must receive effect. If the instrument itself has gone amissing, so that you require to establish the contents of it, resort may be had to the form of process which our law has established to meet that case—a proving of the tenor. But the very deed, which was well executed, is before us. It was kept by the testator till his death, and was never revoked by him. No proving of the tenor, therefore, is necessary. Why then should not this well-executed deed receive effect? I put the case in the course of the argument, Suppose the signature had been torn off? What, in the absence of any evidence, the law might conclude from the fact of the signature being torn off, I do not need to inquire. But the fact that the signature has disappeared from the deed in any way invites inquiry as to how it disappeared: quo animo? If animo revocandi, then the deed is revoked: it is gone. But if it be established that it had disappeared without any intention of revoking it, the testator meaning it to have effect in the last moments of his rational existence, then the disappearance of the signature can have no effect at all. If he had scraped it out, torn it off, tried some liquid to see the effect of that in removing writing or stains, that in the absence of inquiry might lead to conclusions as to the animus with which the thing was done. But if inquiry is made, and the result is that there is found to have been no intention to revoke, then I think that deed must have effect. That in my opinion is a simple and sufficient ground of judgment—that this deed was well executed and was never revoked. Whatever may have happened to it physically or mechanically, it remained in his repositories unrevoked till the day of his death, and he intended in the last moments of his rational existence that it should be effectual as his testament. I say I think we must give effect to it on that simple view.

But we have had the doctrine of erasure pressed upon us. I confess that I have always regarded our law of erasure as mischievous. I do not think it will prove mischievous here, but it has proved mischievous in a great many cases. It is peculiar to our law, and with all our excellencies we have our peculiarities, which are more or less regrettable. There are peculiarities in every system. This is a peculiarity of ours, and I do not know the equal of it. I know as great and as mischievous peculiarities in other systems, but not exactly anything like this. Did any of us in the course of his practice and experience ever find that doctrine of erasure operate otherwise than mischievously? The result has been to defeat and not to promote justice. Did it ever operate otherwise in any of the cases, except indeed in the case of entails? We know that when entails prevailed to a larger extent than they do now it was almost a profession to hunt up entails and try to find an erasure and then bring a reduction of the deed on the ground that there was an erasure in essentialibus. Such things were hailed enthusiastically, and were generally received with great favour.

The doctrine of erasure was founded upon this nervous apprehension—that the party who had possession of the deed had fraudulently vitiated it in his own favour. The fact that a material part of it was written on an erasure was held to raise this presumption, unless the fact was mentioned in the testing-clause. That was the notion on which the doctrine was founded—that the deed was vitiated after its execution in the presence of witnesses. But the testing-clause is always written after execution. It may be written in by the holder of the deed at any time he likes. Deeds have, we know, been sustained with the testing-clause written by the holder in virtue of the power implied in his holding the deed. Therefore the person who vitiates a deed in his own favour is only exercising the power allowed to him by law when he mentions that the vitiation was written on an erasure. And that makes it all right. It is a little ridiculous when you come to think it over that a deed may be set aside on the notion of the fraudulent vitiation of it by the holder, only because he had omitted to put it into the testing-clause,—which he may have written himself, and may have written at any distance of time after the execution of the deed,—that a certain thing has been done. That this is the foundation of the doctrine—that it is not positivi juris, but was founded on that rational or irrational consideration—is plain from the exception to it, that exception being that if a part of the deed, longer or shorter, word or words, was proved to be in the handwriting of the maker of the deed, then the erasure was of no effect. Why? Because that fact made it certain—and it might be proved by extrinsic evidence—that there was no fraudulent or improper vitiation by the holder. If the word or words written upon erasure were proved to have been in the handwriting of the maker of the deed,—and that could only be by parole,—that excluded the notion on which the whole doctrine was founded, namely, that there had been fraudulent vitiation. But then the signature of the maker of the deed, if it is admitted to be genuine, must of necessity be in his own handwriting. And the notion of the fraudulent vitiation by the testator in his own handwriting of his own will is the most extravagant supposition I ever heard of. Therefore, when it appears that the foundation of this doctrine of vitiation by erasure is as I have stated, it cannot possibly have any application to a testator's signature.

But then it is said that this is a tested deed. It is not relied on as a holograph deed but as a tested writing; and it is said that it must appear that the signature is not only the signature of the testator, but that it was adhibited by him in the presence of the witnesses, and that if it is established that he erased it and then wrote it in again the deed is gone. Well, any law to that effect would, in my view, be deplorable. But I do not think that that is our law. We were referred to one case, and it is a very instructive one upon this subject, the case of Grant, in 1849 (11 D. 860), where there was a deed regularly attested, but some parts of it were in the maker's handwriting, and erasures on those parts where his own handwriting occurred were held as having no effect on the deed itself, it being certain that those alterations in his own handwriting had not been put there improperly by anybody else. So that, if the doctrine of erasure is to have any application to signatures at all, you must take the doctrine as it is applied to other portions of the deed, to the effect that if you have security that the deed is genuine, and has not been vitiated, you must give effect to the deed. Here you have perfect assurance that this will is genuine, if that is the testator's signature, and if so, it is clear that it has not been vitiated to his prejudice, or to the prejudice of his successors, whether the testator wrote the signature on an erasure or not. Even if it were established that the signature when the witnesses signed was not upon an erasure, whereas it is upon an erasure now, so that for some explicable or inexplicable reason the testator scratched out what was there, and wrote his signature over again, I should nevertheless be of the opinion that the deed is a valid deed, and is entitled to have effect. But I think it right to say that it is not in my opinion proved that that signature is not the very signature which was adhibited in the presence of the witnesses to this deed.

No. 95.

Mar. 9, 1888.
Brown v. Duncan.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion, and that clearly, that this will is valid, and entitled to have effect given to it.

Lord Craighill.—I am of the same opinion. I am of opinion that the will in question is a probative deed. It is signed by the testator. In regard to that there is no controversy. The party objecting to the will must prove that it is not a genuine signature. There are witnesses who attest the signature, and supposing that it were necessary for the parties founding on the will here to say that the signature which was attested by the two witnesses was the very signature here, I think they would succeed on the evidence brought forward in this case. But in regard to that, I do not think it is on the party founding on the deed to prove that all was regularly done in the execution of the deed by the testator himself and the witnesses. It is for those who object to the will to shew that there was an irregularity sufficient to invalidate it. I think it is a probative deed in the sense of the statute. The issue in such a case is not whether the signature of the maker of the deed is written on an erasure, but whether the signature is the genuine signature of the maker of the will. The ordinary presumption when there are portions of a deed written on an erasure cannot here apply. Once it is established that the testator's name was put to the deed, and that all was done according to law, and that the deed remained in the custody of the maker long after its execution, then I think it is entirely immaterial to enter upon an inquiry as to how the erasure came to be there. There seems to have been an erasure, but the testator put his name upon that erasure. He chose to do so, and he was quite entitled to do so. It was his privilege to put his name anywhere he liked, so far as erasure is concerned. The fact of its being on an erasure does not destroy the effect of his signature.

On the whole matter I agree with Lord Young.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I also am of opinion that this is a good deed. But I think in disposing of the case we must attend to the requisites with respect to the execution of deeds.

This is not a holograph deed, and therefore the signature of the party is of no avail as making the deed a valid deed, unless it be duly witnessed in terms of the statute. Accordingly, I take it that the objection on the part of the pursuers necessarily goes to this, that the signature, although genuine, was not witnessed by the instrumentary witnesses, and if that fact were proved, or if it were to be presumed, then I think the objection would be a good one. The question is whether the fact has been proved, or whether it is to be presumed.

Ex facie, the deed is quite regular and in order, and would receive effect as a probative deed. But our attention is called to the fact that the signature of the testator is written upon an erasure. The signature is so written. If the pursuer were to allege that the signature so appearing on an erasure was not the signature of the testator, then of course he would be allowed to prove it, just as he would be allowed to prove that fact whether it was on an erasure or not. But as he does not allege that the signature that appears on the deed is not the genuine signature of the testator, he virtually admits that it is his genuine signature. Any such proof, then, as I have indicated is out of the question. Then we come to see what is the effect of the deed, with the fact admitted that the signature that appears on the deed is the genuine signature of the testator. The signature so appearing on the face of the deed—and I am speaking of what appears from the face of the deed—is duly witnessed in terms of law, and therefore, although there is an erasure in the deed in the place I have mentioned, we have a probative deed which must receive effect, by virtue of the proof or the admission which comes in place of the proof. Now, the only objection that can be stated in these circumstances is the one I have already mentioned, that the existing signature was not affixed in the presence of the instrumentary witnesses—that there was a previous signature which may have been adhibited in the presence of the witnesses, but that this particular existing signature was affixed by the testator in his own closet, or at all events outwith the presence of these witnesses. As I have said, I think that that, if it were proved, would be a fatal, or a formidable objection—I think probably fatal. But then the question is, on whom is the onus of proof? Again, for the reasons I have already given, and from the fact that this is a probative deed, and must receive effect as such, the onus necessarily falls on the party objecting to it. Thus the whole question comes to be whether he has proved the fact on which his objection depends. I think we would require very clear proof indeed to enable us to sustain this objection; and I am not in the least disposed to hold that this objector has proved the fact on which his case depends. I do not think the evidence comes near a proof of what he says. As there is no presumption in his favour, the deed must receive effect.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I entirely concur in the result, and that without difficulty.

That the name of the testator is written on an erasure is admitted, but the question is whether that fact although it is not mentioned in the testing-clause, is necessarily fatal to the authenticity of the signature and the deed. On that matter my view is that the erasure is not fatal to the deed, even although it is not mentioned in the testing-clause. It is an element of proof that may be and has been overruled. I should like to read an extract from the opinion of Lord Mackenzie in the case of Stoddart, where there was an erasure, and there was writing upon an erasure. Lord Mackenzie says (11 D. 867),—"It is a narrow case, however, and different from any that has occurred yet, for the deed is not all holograph: part of it only is so, viz., that which is upon erasure. But I think that is enough, for a party may make a deed partly holograph and partly tested and such a deed be valid. All that is holograph of it is just like other holograph writings, and such writings are valid whether written on erasures or not. A man may, if it suit his fancy, scrape other writing from a paper and write his own deed upon the part erased. The part here written on erasure being holograph is in itself probative." Lord Fullerton (11 D. 868) says he adopts Lord Mackenzie's opinion as to erasures in the deed. He adds,—"Those erasures I do not hold to be fatal."

In the present case there are only two alternatives presented. It must be borne in mind that this will is mostly a printed form. It may have had an erasure on it when the testator purchased it. That is suggested, and I think it a probable enough suggestion, for in my view it has not in any way been proved to be untrue. The other suggestion is a good deal more fanciful. There is no doubt that this is the man's signature, but it is said he was very vain about his writing, and afraid of his signature not being sufficiently well written, and that after he had written his signature in presence of the two testamentary witnesses, he erased it, and wrote it over again. I think that is a very fanciful and im-

No. 95.
—
Mar. 9, 1888.
Brown v.
Duncan.

probable proceeding, because a man could hardly expect his second signature written on an erasure to be as good as his first written on plain and smooth paper. I think the balance of proof is against that, and consequently that there is fair reason to believe that the erasure may have been on the paper when the signature was made. That, I think, is sufficient for this case, and I am therefore of opinion that the Sheriff's judgment should be recalled.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact (1) that the deceased John Duncan signed the disposition and settlement mentioned in record on the 1st day of January 1876, in presence of two attesting witnesses, and that the deed remained in his custody from that date until his death on 22d September 1885; (2) that he intended the deed to be effectual after his death: Find in law that the deed is valid and effectual: Therefore sustain the appeal: Recall the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against," &c.

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—A. KIRK MACKIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 96.
—
Mar. 9, 1888.
Kerr's Trustee
v. Yeaman's
Trustee.

ROBERT BOWER RITCHIE (William Kerr's Trustee), First Party.—Gloag.
THOMAS BUCHAN (James Yeaman's Trustee), Second Party.—
C. N. Johnston.

Property—Completion of Title—Notarial Instrument—Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101), secs. 3 and 19.—By trust-disposition for behoof of creditors, Yeaman the truster conveyed "to and in favour of John Shields" (designed) "and as trustees, to act in succession as after mentioned; whom failing, to such person or persons as I may appoint by any writing under my hand validly executed, as trustees . . . and to the assignees of the said trustees or trustee, All and Sundry my whole means, estate, and effects, heritable and moveable." Power was given to the trustee, inter alia, to take possession of the whole trust-estate, to complete titles thereto, and to sell the whole or any part thereof. Shields accepted, but without having made up a title to any of the truster's heritable properties, he, after having acted for a few months, resigned by minute of resignation endorsed on the trust-disposition. Yeaman thereupon, on the narrative of the trust-disposition and of the minute of resignation, nominated Buchan "as trustee under the said trust-deed, with full power, by himself alone, to manage and execute the trust thereby created, in the same manner and as fully and freely in every respect as if the said trust-deed had been granted in favour of him the said Thomas Buchan as sole trustee, and that for the purposes, and with the powers, and subject to the declarations and provisions contained in the said trust-deed." Buchan's agent made up a title by notarial instruments bearing to be in terms of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868. The notarial instruments, which were duly recorded, set out the sasine under which Yeaman was infeft, the trust-disposition in favour of Shields, and the deed of nomination in favour of Buchan. Buchan (for the purpose of having the validity of the title determined by the Court) refused payment of his agent's account on the ground that the notarial instruments did not form a valid title in his favour, in respect (1) that Shields had a personal right to the properties and had never divested himself thereof; (2) that the case did not fall within the provisions of the Act of 1868; (3) that the trust-disposition and the minute of appointment did not constitute a valid warrant for completing the title of the second party by notarial instrument; and (4) that even if it were competent to complete Buchan's title by notarial instrument, the notarial instruments were insufficient, inasmuch as the minute of resignation was not set forth as one of the warrants of instruments, such minute being an essential link in the progress of titles. The other party maintained that the titles had been validly completed

No. 96.

Mar. 9, 1888.
Kerr's Trustee v. Yeaman's Trustee.

2D DIVISION.
I.

in terms of the 19th section of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, as interpreted by the 3d section of the same Act.*

In a special case held (diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) that the titles had been validly completed, and that the agent was entitled to payment of his account.

ON 8th December 1885, James Yeaman, merchant in Dundee, on the narrative that his affairs had become embarrassed, granted a trust-disposition for behoof of his creditors, by which he assigned, disponed, conveyed, and made over "to and in favour of John Shields, manufacturer, Perth, and as trustees, to act in succession as after mentioned; whom failing, to such person or persons as I may appoint by any writing under my hand validly executed, as trustees, for behoof of my whole lawful creditors at the date hereof who shall accede hereto or be assumed into the benefit of this trust, and to the assignees of the said trustees or trustee, All and Sundry my whole means, estate, and effects, heritable and moveable, real and personal, of whatever kind and wherever situated, presently belonging or which may belong or accrue to me during the subsistence of the trust hereby constituted, with the whole writs, titles, and instructions thereof, and all that has followed or can competently follow thereon; and I bind myself to execute all deeds, conveyances, or other writings that may be necessary for more effectually vesting the said trustees or trustee and their foresaids with the trust-estate hereby conveyed: Declaring hereby, that the said John Shields shall in the first place, by himself alone, without the consent or concurrence of the said have the sole power to manage and execute the trust hereby created, in the same manner as if these presents had been granted in favour of the said John Shields as sole trustee; and that in case of the death, incapacity, non-acceptance, or resignation of the said John Shields, then the said shall have the sole power to manage and execute the said trust; and in case of his death, incapacity, non-acceptance, or resignation, then the management and execution of the trust shall devolve upon the trustee or trustees to be nominated and appointed by me as aforesaid (the trustees or trustee acting for the time being hereinafter included under the designation of 'the trustees')." Power was given to the trustees, inter alia, "to take immediate possession of the whole trust-estate, complete titles thereto . . . as also to sell the whole trust-estate hereby conveyed, or any part or parts thereof . . . to receive the prices, and to grant dispositions or other conveyances to the purchasers." The blank in the disposition for the name of the trustee who was to act in succession to Shields was never filled up.

Shields accepted the trust by holograph minute subscribed by him, appended to the trust-disposition, and acted as trustee for some time thereafter. The estate was found by him to be insolvent. On 10th March 1886, finding that it was inexpedient for him to continue to act as trustee on account of his residence being at a distance from Dundee, he intimated to Yeaman his resignation of the trust, and on 6th April 1886 he executed a minute annexed to the trust-disposition in these terms,—"I, John Shields, within designed, having as at 10th March 1886 intimated my resignation of the within trust, do hereby confirm as from the said 10th day of March last my resignation of the office of trustee under the foregoing trust-deed.—In witness whereof," &c.

By minute of appointment, dated 5th April 1886, Yeaman, upon the narrative of the trust-disposition, and that Shields after accepting the office of trustee found it inexpedient and difficult from his residing at a distance, and other reasons, to continue to act as trustee, and had re-

---

* These sections are quoted infra, p. 522.

No. 96.
——
Mar. 9, 1888.
Kerr's Trustee v. Yeaman's Trustee.

signed his trusteeship, nominated and appointed "Thomas Buchan, valuator, Dundee, as trustee under the said trust-deed, with full power, by himself alone, to manage and execute the trust thereby created, in the same manner, and as fully and freely in every respect as if the said trust-deed had been granted in favour of him, the said Thomas Buchan, as sole trustee, and that for the purposes, and with the powers, and subject to the declarations and provisions contained in the said trust-deed."

The trust-disposition, with the two annexed minutes by Shields and the minute of appointment, were recorded in the Books of Council and Session on 10th April 1886.

Buchan accepted the office of trustee under the trust-disposition and minute of appointment, and entered upon the administration of the trust-estate.

Yeaman was proprietor of and infeft in certain heritable properties in or about the town of Dundee. No feudal title to any of these properties was made up in the person of Shields, but after the appointment of Buchan as trustee titles to the whole properties were made up in his person as trustee by William Kerr, solicitor, Dundee, who acted as agent in the trust both for Shields and Buchan. The titles were made up by notarial instruments, ten in number, applicable to the respective properties, proceeding upon the sasine under which Yeaman was infeft, trust-disposition of 1885, and the minute of appointment of Buchan.

R. B. Ritchie, who had been appointed trustee on the sequestrated estates of Kerr (who had died), having rendered to Buchan the accounts (taxed by the Auditor of the Court of Session at £77, 2s. 5d.) incurred in preparing the notarial instruments, Buchan refused to pay them on the ground that the titles were not made up habili modo and did not constitute a good title in his favour.

A special case was accordingly presented, Ritchie being the first party, and Buchan the second party.

The foregoing narrative of the facts is taken from the case, which stated further that the validity of the titles had been challenged by the purchaser of one of the properties forming part of the trust-estate, and that several of these properties remained unsold.

The first party maintained that titles to the properties were properly and validly made up in the person of the second party, as trustee, by notarial instruments proceeding upon the trust-disposition and the minute of appointment, in respect (1) that, by the 19th section of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, the grantee, under a general disposition, whether by conveyance mortis causa or inter vivos, was empowered to complete his title by notarial instrument*; and (2)

---

* The Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101), sec. 19, enacts,—"Where a person shall have granted or shall grant a general disposition of his lands, whether by conveyance mortis causa or inter vivos, or by a testamentary deed or writing within the sense and meaning of the 20th and 21st sections of this Act, and whether such general disposition shall extend to the whole lands belonging to the granter, or be limited to particular lands belonging to him, with or without full description of such lands, and whether such general disposition shall contain or shall not contain a procuratory or clause of resignation, or a precept of sasine, or an obligation to infeft, or a clause expressing the manner of holding, it shall be competent to the grantee under such general disposition to expede and record in the appropriate Register of Sasines a notarial instrument in or as nearly as may be in the form of schedule (L) hereto annexed; and on such notarial instrument or any similar notarial instrument expede in virtue of any Act of Parliament hereby repealed being so recorded, such grantee shall be in all respects in the same position as

No. 96.

Mar. 9, 1888.
Kerr's Trustee v. Yeaman's Trustee.

that, under the 3d section of that Act, the word conveyance was defined as extending to and including "deeds of nomination and other writings annexed to or endorsed on deeds or conveyances, or bearing reference to deeds or conveyances, separately granted."*

The second party maintained that notarial instruments did not form a valid title in his favour, in respect (1) that Shields had a personal right to the properties, and had never divested himself thereof; (2) that the case did not fall within the provisions of the Act of 1868; (3) that the trust-disposition and the minute of appointment did not constitute a valid warrant for completing the title of the second party by notarial instrument; and (4) that even if it were competent to complete Buchan's title by notarial instrument, the notarial instruments were insufficient, inasmuch as the minute of resignation was not set forth as one of the warrants of instruments, such minute being an essential link in the progress of titles.

The questions of law were,—"Do the said notarial instruments constitute a valid feudal title to the said properties in the person of the second party; and is the first party entitled to demand payment from the second party of the taxed amount of the accounts incurred in the preparation of the said notarial instruments? or (2) Is the second party entitled to refuse payment of the said accounts in respect that the said notarial instruments do not constitute a valid feudal title in his person to the said properties?"

The arguments fully appear from the opinions of the Court.[1]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The first party to this special case is Mr Ritchie, the

---

if a conveyance of the lands contained in such notarial instrument had been executed in his favour by the grantor of the general disposition, . . . and as if such conveyance had been followed, . . . by an instrument of sasine of the said lands in favour of such grantee, . . . expede and recorded in the appropriate Register of Sasines at the date of recording such notarial instrument: Provided always, that where such notarial instrument shall be expede by a person other than the original grantee under such general disposition, it shall set forth the title or series of titles by which the person in whose favour it is expede acquired right to such general disposition, and the nature of his right."

* The full text of the 3d section of the Act, in so far as it referred to these documents, was as follows:—"The word 'deed' and the word 'conveyance' shall each extend to and include all charters, writs, and dispositions, whether containing a warrant or precept of sasine or not, and whether inter vivos or mortis causa, and whether absolute or in trust, feu-contracts, &c., decrees, . . . and all deeds, decrees, and writings by which lands, or rights in lands, are constituted, or completed, or conveyed, or discharged, whether dated, granted, or obtained before or after the passing of this Act, and official extracts of all deeds and conveyances; and all codicils, deeds of nomination, and other writings annexed to or endorsed on deeds or conveyances, or bearing reference to deeds or conveyances separately granted, and decrees of declarator naming or appointing persons to exercise or enjoy the rights or powers conferred by such deeds or conveyances, shall be deemed and taken for the purposes of this Act to be parts of the deeds or conveyances to which they severally relate, and shall have the same effect in all respects as to the persons so named and appointed as if they had been named and appointed in the deeds or conveyances themselves."

[1] Authorities cited by the first party.—Mackilligin v. Mackilligin, Nov. 23, 1855, 18 D. 83, 28 Scot. Jur. 25; Gilmour v. Gilmour, July 3, 1873, 11 Macph. 853, 45 Scot. Jur. 521; Marquis of Huntly v. Earl of Fife, July 20, 1877, 14 R. 1091.

No. 96.

Mar. 9, 1888.
Kerr's Trustee v. Yeaman's Trustee.

trustee on the sequestrated estate of the late Mr Kerr, who was a writer in Dundee, and the question directly at issue is, whether the second party, Mr Buchan, who is the trustee acting for the late Mr Yeaman, is entitled to refuse payment of an account incurred to Mr Kerr, in respect that the business for which it was charged has not been duly or correctly performed. This question involves a short but important point upon the late Conveyancing Act.

It is necessary in the first place to examine the state of the facts on which the question depends.

Mr Yeaman, who was a merchant in Dundee, found his affairs embarrassed, and in December 1885 he executed a trust-disposition in these terms,—He dispones, conveys, and makes over "to and in favour of John Shields, manufacturer, Perth, and , as trustees, to act in succession as after mentioned, whom failing, to such person or persons as I may appoint by any writing under my hand validly executed, as trustees, for behoof of my whole lawful creditors at the date hereof who shall accede hereto or be assumed into the benefit of this trust, and to the assignees of the said trustees or trustee, All and Sundry my whole means, estate, and effects, heritable and moveable, real and personal, of whatever kind and wherever situated, presently belonging or which may belong or accrue to me during the subsistence of the trust hereby constituted, with the whole writs, titles, and instructions thereof," and then he goes on to bind himself "to execute all deeds, conveyances, or other writings that may be necessary for more effectually vesting the said trustees or trustee and their foresaids with the trust-estate hereby conveyed, declaring hereby that the said John Shields shall in the first place, by himself alone, without the consent or concurrence of the said , have the sole power to manage and execute the trust hereby created, in the same manner as if these presents had been granted in favour of the said John Shields as sole trustee; and that in case of the death, incapacity, non-acceptance, or resignation of the said John Shields, then the said shall have the sole power to manage and execute the said trust; and in case of his death, incapacity, non-acceptance, or resignation, then the management and execution of the trust shall devolve upon the trustee or trustees to be nominated and appointed by me as aforesaid, the trustees or trustee acting for the time being hereinafter included under the designation of 'the trustees.'"

Mr Shields accepted that appointment, and took possession so far of the estate, and proceeded a certain length in the management of it. But he made up no title, and after he had held the appointment for a short time he intimated that he did not consider it desirable that he should longer continue in the trust, and accordingly on the back of the trust-disposition he signed a minute, which is in these terms,—"I, John Shields, within designed, having as at 10th March 1886 intimated my resignation of the within trust, do hereby confirm as from the said 10th of March last my resignation of the office of trustee under the foregoing trust-deed."

Thereupon Yeaman executed a minute of appointment, in which he narrates what he had done before, and goes on, "and considering that the said John Shields, after accepting the office of trustee conferred on him by the said trust-deed, found it inexpedient and difficult, from his residing at a distance and other reasons, to continue to act as trustee, and has resigned his trusteeship, therefore I, the said James Yeaman, hereby nominate and appoint Thomas Buchan, valuator, Dundee, as trustee under the said trust-deed, with full power by himself alone to manage and execute the trust thereby created, in the same manner and as fully and freely in every respect as if the said trust-deed had been granted in favour of him, the said Thomas Buchan, as sole trustee, and that for the purposes, and with the powers, and subject to the declarations and provisions contained in the said trust-deed."

Mr Buchan accepted, and proceeded to discharge the duties of the trust, inter alia, by granting dispositions to feuars on the title thus acquired. In making up his title he followed, or professed to follow, the directions of the Titles to Land Act, 1868, in expeding the notarial instrument. The question brought up in the case is whether Mr Buchan had a right to expede a notarial instrument, and whether it is in accordance with the prescribed form.

Now, there are four grounds on which it is said that it is not. The first is that Shields had a personal right to the properties, and never divested himself thereof. In regard to that I do not think that Shields had a personal right. He had two things. He had a good title of possession and administration. He had also a right to obtain a title; and if he had chosen, when the deed was executed by Yeaman, to proceed under the Titles to Land Act, he might have made his right available, but he had no personal title to the property, because the right that is given to him is indefinite,—to all and sundry the lands and heritages of Yeaman, the truster. That did not convey a personal right to the property. It gave him a right of action against the party who had granted that indefinite disposition to get him to make it definite by granting a direct disposition to the lands. Prior to the Act of 1868 that would not have conferred a title at all until supplemented by some proceeding on the part of the grantee. Under the Titles to Land Act he did obtain a power to make that a real right, but he never used it, and in my apprehension when he resigned his trusteeship his right to administration of course came to an end, and any right which he had to make up a title to these lands of course perished with it, and therefore I do not think there is any ground for the first objection that has been taken. The very object of the 19th section of the Titles to Land Act was to provide a mode of making a general disposition to lands where lands are not specially disponed available to the grantee without any action at law, and the mode is by notarial instrument, which was the mode followed by Buchan in this case. But if a grantee has only an indefinite right, and takes no step at all to put himself in the position of a special disponee, he acquires no right whatever. I do not think there was anything which the original trustee could assign, or anything which was available to assign, but independently of that, this is a disposition for a special and specific and temporary purpose. It is very much of the nature of an absolute disposition with a back-bond; the radical right remained with the truster. And I think therefore that, even irrespective of the other ground I have mentioned, if the truster chose to nominate a second trustee, and that trustee used the forms of law to complete his title by notarial instrument or infeftment, there was nothing that required to be taken out of the person of the original trustee. These are the views that have occurred to me. I do not think there is any solidity in the objection.

In regard to the other objections I did not understand that they were seriously maintained, viz., that the case does not fall under the Act of 1868, and that the trust-disposition and minute of appointment do not constitute a valid warrant for completing the title of the second party by notarial instrument. But they fall under the definition of "conveyance" in the Act of 1868, which is as wide as it well can be.

The last objection is, that the minute of resignation is not set forth in the notarial instrument as one of the links in the progress. It would perhaps have been more regular if it had been, but I do not think that in the circumstances it was essential.

Lord Young.—I think we indicated at an early stage of the argument that it was inconvenient, to say the least, to try a question of the validity of titles upon an objection to an agent's account, and that the answer to these objections to the validity of the titles would not necessarily determine that Kerr the agent, or those in his right, were not entitled to payment. But it was explained to us that the real object of the case was to ascertain whether or not Buchan, the present trustee, was in a position to give a good title to purchasers as the now acting trustee in this trust for creditors. We all sympathise with that object. I, for one at least, am disposed to sympathise with it—it being explained to us that the purchasers, or those who have been communicated with, are quite ready to take a title from Buchan, and to pay the price, if we are of opinion that he is in a position to give a good one. I have considered the case in that view, and my opinion concurs with that of your Lordship, that Buchan is in a position to give a good title. It is of course eminently desirable that he should be, for the only alternative is that there shall be further conveyancing and further expense in the administration of this insolvent estate. There is no question of justice or equity, or even reasonable safety to any interests whatever, involved in this case. It is merely a question as to whether the exigencies of our law permit or even require a more severe taxation of an insolvent estate in the course of its administration in the shape of conveyancing.

We are almost daily told now of the very sad state of our conveyancing laws—that they require a multitude of superfluous deeds, and of course superfluous expense, and that they should be revised and remedied so that things may be done more economically than at present. I have often thought that a good deal might be done in that direction by judgment—by judicious consideration as to whether deeds are or are not truly superfluous, and if they are by dispensing with them by judgment as unnecessary. The tendency is towards liberal construction where there is any doubt about the matter, and to prevent the incurring of extra cost, especially where an insolvent estate is in liquidation, which of course is thought a fair feast for a multitude of people.

Here there is no doubt about the late Mr Yeaman's title to the property. He was the owner of a number of properties in Dundee. Under the old law, somehow or other, it would have been necessary to make each of these the subject of a separate conveyance. Yeaman desired to realise them for behoof of his creditors, and he conveyed them together with his whole estate in lump to Mr Shields, to be realised and divided amongst his creditors. I should have thought, and so held if the question had depended on me, that any man being the proprietor of an estate might grant authority to another to ingather it, and if heritable estate, to sell it, and with his authority to convey it to purchasers in order to its being divided amongst his creditors. But that simple view has never prevailed. It has always been thought necessary that a feudal title should be made up in the person of the trustee, and where there were a number of properties the party must be made a feudal vassal in each of them, however numerous the titles may be. They may be all identical, with no more thought or intellect required in the preparation of them than is required in giving out a railway ticket to Dundee or elsewhere, but they are charged as conveyances, and the insolvent estate,—that is, the fund for the creditors,—is so much diminished in consequence. It occurred to me, in support of that simple view, that a trustee well nominated and appointed, with authority to sell and convey such properties to purchasers, and to divide the money amongst the creditors, would be as good as a commissioner to execute deeds who is appointed by people who are too aristocratic to sign their own deeds. There are some people in Scotland who never sign deeds or leases, but grant a commission to somebody else to do it. They execute such conveyances through their commissioner. I should have thought it a case of the same simplicity where a party in necessitous circumstances authorises an individual to ingather his estate and to dispose of it to purchasers. Mr Yeaman gave such authority to Mr Shields. There is authority to Shields, whoever else may be nominated to act under the deed as trustee, to sell the property in such lots as he shall think expedient, and to receive the price, and grant dispositions and other conveyances to purchasers. Mr Shields found it inconvenient to act, because he was not on the spot. After trying it for a short period he thought proper to resign. It had been contemplated that he would not always act, and the deed provided that if Shields failed by death or resignation then the truster should nominate somebody else. Upon Shields' failure Yeaman appointed Buchan as trustee under the deed, with all the powers which Shields had. Mr Kerr was then applied to to make up the title, and I think with great judgment he made it up by notarial instrument. There are a number of properties, as I have stated, and the notarial instruments, identifying the various properties, shops, flats, cottages and gardens, and requiring no more thought or intelligence than so many railway tickets, involve an account of £77. It is thought that that is not enough, but that there should be a conveyance or something else—I do not know what—to Shields.

I am of opinion that these notarial instruments are sufficient under clause 19 of the Act of Parliament. It is certainly eminently desirable that they should be. Where is the risk of it? They are all recorded—all upon the records for the information of everybody—that Yeaman first appointed Shields, and then upon his resignation nominated Buchan in his place, and that under a general conveyance to him there are comprehended these properties which are all enumerated in the notarial instruments, and that he was the trustee administering these properties with a power of sale, and a power to grant dispositions to purchasers. Is it not eminently desirable, upon every reasonable and rational consideration, that this should be so done? I really cannot doubt it for a moment, nor that there is no risk of fraud or error—no risk of the interest of anybody being prejudicially affected in any way by holding this to be sufficient. According to my construction of section 19 of the Act of 1868 it is sufficient. One may be driven by a subtle criticism of the language of the Act of Parliament, or by subtle reasoning to another conclusion, but one would deplore it, and would rather exercise minute criticism and subtle consideration to avoid more conveyancing and more expense. I therefore think that Buchan's title has been well and sufficiently made up. I regret that it was not more economically made up,

No. 96.

Mar. 9, 1888.
Kerr's Trustee v. Yeaman's Trustee.

but there is no question raised about that, and I may be wandering into regions of future reform, which I am not warranted in trespassing upon on the present occasion, in alluding to anything else than the instrument. At all events, I think Buchan is in a position to grant a good title to any purchaser.

Lord Craighill.—The circumstances of this case do not here require recapitulation, because they are fully set forth in the special case upon which the opinion and judgment of the Court has been asked. One or two of these, however, must be mentioned in order that the views that I am about to express may be realised.

The late Mr Yeaman in December 1885 granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors. The estate which was conveyed in trust was not any specific property or properties. No individual subject was named or described. What was conveyed, quoting from the dispositive clause of the deed, was, "All and Sundry my" (the truster's) "whole means, estate, and effects, heritable and moveable, real and personal, of whatever kind, and wheresoever situated, presently belonging or which may belong or accrue to me during the subsistence of the trust hereby constituted." Some of the properties might be in Dundee, and others might be elsewhere, but whatever their locality, their individuality remained undisclosed. The result necessarily was that, so far as the effect of the conveyance was concerned, there was no relation established between those to whom the conveyance was granted in trust and the properties which were to be put under their administration.

The conveyance was given to and in favour of "John Shields, manufacturer, Perth, and as trustees, to act in succession as after mentioned, whom failing, to such person or persons as I may appoint by any writing under my hand validly executed." This constitution of the trust, however, was followed by a declaration that "in case of the death, incapacity, non-acceptance, or resignation of the said John Shields, then the said shall have the sole power to manage and execute the said trust, and in case of his death, incapacity, non-acceptance, or resignation, then the management and execution of the trust shall devolve upon the trustee or trustees to be nominated and appointed by me as aforesaid." The blank in the trust-deed for the name of the second trustee never was filled up, and so Mr Shields was the only trustee named in the trust-deed. Mr Shields by holograph minute accepted the trust, and for some time acted as trustee. But on 10th March 1886, three months after his appointment, he intimated to Mr Yeaman his resignation of the trust, and on 6th April he executed a minute which is annexed to the trust-disposition, whereby he confirmed his resignation as from the 10th of March.

On 5th April 1886 Mr Yeaman, on the narrative of the trust-disposition, and of the fact that Mr Shields, after accepting the office of trustee, had resigned, nominated and appointed Thomas Buchan, valuator, Dundee, as trustee under the said trust-deed, with full power by himself alone to manage and execute the trust thereby created, in the same manner and as fully and as freely in every respect as if the trust-deed had been granted in favour of him, the said Thomas Buchan, as sole trustee, and that for the purposes and with the powers, and subject to the declarations and provisions contained in the trust-deed.

Mr Yeaman was proprietor of a number of heritable properties in and about Dundee, but no feudal title to any of these properties was made up in the person of Mr Shields. After the appointment of Mr Buchan, however, titles to the whole of these were made up in his person as trustee by the now deceased William Kerr, solicitor, Dundee, who acted as agent in the trust both for Mr Shields and Mr Buchan. Those titles were made up by notarial instruments applicable to the respective properties, proceeding on the trust-disposition and the minute of appointment. The account incurred by Mr Kerr, who is now dead, and the trustee in whose sequestration is the first party to this special case, is the subject-matter here in dispute. The second party is Mr Buchan, the trustee in whose person the titles had been completed. What the Court are asked to determine is, whether the notarial instruments referred to constitute a valid feudal title to the properties referred to in the person of the second party.

There appear to me to be two questions involved in this inquiry. The first is the right of Mr Yeaman, the truster, to convey his means and estate to Mr Buchan, and the second is, whether, if he was entitled to convey, the course which he followed for this purpose was legally sufficient to effect the end desired.

In judging of the first of these questions the material consideration is that the conveyance was a general conveyance by which there was established no connection between the trustee and the property conveyed in trust. The trust-deed was a title to administer, but when he ceased to be trustee his connection with the property ceased. His trusteeship was the only bond by which they were united. Part of the property was moveables and part heritage, and when he resigned he left behind him the one as much as the other. The difficulty suggested by the second party is that there had been a conveyance to Mr Shields, and that to divest him it was necessary to re-convey. That appears to me to be a proceeding that was unnecessary, and indeed inappropriate. He had himself received no title to any particular subject, and he could give no title to any particular subject. There was never an investiture. He could have made up a title, and had he done so, then it may be that, notwithstanding his resignation, a re-conveyance from him would have been necessary. Even that, however, appears to me to be doubtful, but on that matter I express no opinion. It is sufficient for me to say that when he resigned he left the trust-estate as he found it. If Mr Yeaman's right to convey to Mr Buchan could be held to be derived from him, a re-conveyance would of course be necessary, but Mr Yeaman had all along the radical right, and that was the title upon which, after Mr Shields resigned, the nomination in favour of Mr Buchan was granted.

Mr Yeaman therefore having a right, the next thing for consideration is whether the course he followed was apt for the purpose which was to be accomplished. What was executed was not a conveyance in the ordinary sense of the term, but was a writing by which Mr Yeaman nominated and appointed Mr Buchan as trustee under the said trust-deed, with full powers of administration, for the ends and purposes for which the trust had been created. If the conveyance had been in the ordinary form, Mr Yeaman having the power, there can be no doubt that it would have been a valid and effectual disposition of the trust property, but a nomination was all that was given, and hence the difficulty—or one of the difficulties—which has to be solved on the present occasion. Section 19 of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act (31 and 32 Vict. c. 101), enacts, that "where a person shall have granted or shall grant a general disposition of his lands, whether by conveyance mortis causa or inter vivos, or by a testamentary deed or writing, within the sense and meaning of the 20th and 21st sections of this Act, and whether such general disposition shall extend to the whole lands belonging to the granter, or be limited to particular lands belonging to him, with or without full description of such lands . . . it shall be competent to the grantee under such general disposition to expede and record in the appropriate register of sasines a notarial instrument in, or as nearly as may be in, the form of schedule L hereunto annexed." Thus, if there has been a disposition, the title of Mr Buchan may be completed by notarial instrument in the form of schedule L. Now, section 3 which is the interpretation clause, enacts that the word "deed" and the word "conveyance" shall each extend to and include (subsec. 7) "all codicils, deeds of nomination, and other writings annexed to or endorsed on deeds or conveyances, or bearing reference to deeds or conveyances separately granted." The nomination in question appears to me to answer those conditions. We have a trust-deed, we have a nomination endorsed on the trust-deed, we have reference made in the nomination to the trust-deed; and consequently, in the sense of the Act, and for the purposes of the Act, the reasonable, indeed the only result, seems to be that the materials presented to the notary were all that were required as warrants for him to expede the notarial instrument, the validity of which is now the subject for determination.

No. 96.
Mar. 9, 1888.
Kerr's Trustee v. Yeaman's Trustee.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the question put to the Court ought to be answered in the affirmative.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—In December 1885 James Yeaman granted a trust-disposition in favour of creditors. By that deed he disponed his whole estate in general terms to John Shields, "whom failing, to such person or persons as I may appoint by any writing under my hand." It is hardly necessary to say that any person so nominated is not a disponee. He can only take in succession to Shields, as coming within the destination contained in the disposition.

Shields accepted and acted under the trust, but he was not infeft. Thereafter he resigned, and Yeaman, by a writing under his hand, nominated Mr Buchan to be trustee in his room. In order to make up Mr Buchan's title to the trust property a notarial instrument was expede. It set out the sasine under which Yeaman was infeft, the general trust-disposition in favour of Shields, and the nomination of Mr Buchau consequent on the resignation of the former.

The question is, whether a good feudal title was thereby completed in the person of Mr Buchan.

It was urged that the instrument was defective, inasmuch as it did not recite the writing by which Shields resigned the trust. To say the least, it would in my opinion have been better had it done so, so as to shew that the notary had before him evidence of Shields' resignation under his own hand. But I do not dwell on this point, because there is a much more formidable objection.

The objection is this—the instrument gives infeftment to Mr Buchan as a disponee, though he does not possess that character. It professes to give him infeftment in the trust property conveyed to Shields, though there is no disposition in his favour either by Shields or by the truster, and though the personal fee in Shields was not taken up by Mr Buchan by any legal process whatever. In my opinion it is very plain that the objection is well founded, and that it is fatal to the title.

Before I proceed to notice the statute law under which this instrument was expede it may be well to consider how the title of Mr Buchan could have been made up at common law, the other circumstances being the same. To avoid any difficulty arising from a general conveyance, and from the fact that the nomination of Mr Buchan is contained in a separate deed, I shall suppose that the trust-disposition granted by Yeaman specifically disponed the property belonging to him to Shields, whom failing, to Buchan, and that it contained all the usual clauses. In such a case Mr Buchan could not expede an infeftment under the disposition, because he had neither obtained a disposition from Shields nor had he been assigned to the precept of sasine. So far as I see there were only two ways of completing his title in such circumstances. Disregarding the unfeudalised disposition in favour of Shields, he might have obtained a new disposition from Yeaman as still vested with the radical right, or as the successor of Shields, and as such coming within the destination contained in the disposition he might have raised a declaratory adjudication under which the property would be adjudged to him. In each case he would have had a conveyance to the lands.

This may be more clear if the disposition had been feudalised in the person of Shields, although in substance there is no difference. In that case the precept would have been exhausted, and there could have been no pretence for saying that it could be again used by Buchan. As the mere successor of Shields he could not have made up any title except by taking the estate out of the person of Shields. Whether the original deed be feudalised or not the principle is identical. For it is trite law that there cannot be two disponees in succession. One person, and one only, can make up a title directly under the disposition, and in order to pass on the estate to a successor there must be service or a new disposition or some other equivalent capable of taking up the estate of the original disponee.

I have taken as an example a title in its simplest form, so as to shew that Mr Buchan was under the legal necessity of obtaining a disposition from Yeaman or Shields, or of taking up by some legal process the right which was vested in Shields. Assuredly he cannot be in a better position in the case which has actually occurred. That the trust-deed contained a general disposition only, and that he was nominated as the successor of Shields by a separate deed, would occasion more difficulties in the completion of his title, but could not relieve him of those other necessities to which I have adverted.

It must be kept in view that the estate which by reason of the notarial instrument is said to be vested in Mr Buchan is the trust-fee which was vested in Shields. That trust-fee was created by the conveyance of the subjects to the latter, and it must remain in his person until it is taken out of it either by conveyance or by some legal process. Conveyance there was none, and we shall have to consider whether a notarial instrument is a legal process for the transference of an estate.

The Act of 1868 made many changes in the law relating to the transmission of heritable property. But in this case we are only concerned with the provision which makes it possible to make up a title directly under a general disposition, and without the aid of the feudal executorial clauses. By the 19th section the grantee under such a disposition may expede a notarial instrument in a certain prescribed form, and that instrument, when duly recorded in the register of sasines, will be sufficient to confer on him a feudal title to the subjects of the grant. But it is provided that if "such notarial instrument shall be expede by a person other than the original grantee, . . . it shall set forth the title or series of titles by which the person in whose favour it is expede acquired right to such general disposition, and the nature of his right."

It is to me obvious that such a notarial instrument does not in any sense operate as a conveyance or service or other legal method of transmitting lands. The Act assumes that the right is in the person who expedes the instrument. The instrument in itself is no more than a statement of the titles which confer the right, and on being recorded it will operate as an infeftment. If the right does not otherwise exist it will do nothing. Where the disposition is general it furnishes the means of making it special by setting out the sasine of the granter. It supplies the executorial clauses, or rather it enables the grantee to dispense with them. But as it is a mere statement of the existing titles which are exhibited to the notary, it cannot operate either as a conveyance or as a service or other legal process for transmitting or taking up heritable rights, unless the statute so declares. The statute is silent on this subject. It does not declare that the notarial instrument has any force in conveying or transmitting heritable rights. The instrument therefore remains a mere statement or exhibition of the titles alleged to create a right in the person in whose favour it is expede, having no operation unless the right is vested in that person.

We were referred to the interpretation clause as aiding the argument of the first party. It shews very clearly that the trust-deed granted by Yeaman is a conveyance under which the disponee could have made up his title by expeding a notarial instrument in terms of the 19th section. But it shews nothing more. And observe what is said of deeds of nomination. They "shall be deemed and taken for the purposes of this Act to be parts of the deeds or conveyances to which they severally relate, and shall have the same effect in all respects as to the persons so named and appointed as if they had been named and appointed in the deeds and conveyances themselves." What effect, then, shall we give to the deed of nomination in favour of Mr Buchan? We shall incorporate it in the trust-disposition of Yeaman, which will then run as a disposition to Shields, whom failing, to Buchan. But we can give it no other or further effect. And so we are brought back again to the question whether the titles of a successor can be made up by means of the notarial instrument alone. I have already given my reasons for holding that a notarial instrument has no disponing or transmitting power.

In the case of an absolute disposition to A, whom failing, to B, it would be impossible to dispute—at least as the law stood prior to 1874—that B could not make up a title by notarial instrument or otherwise without expeding a service to A so as to take up the fee which was vested in him. I do not pause to consider whether the Act of 1874 makes any difference on the ground that it vests a fee in B by mere survivance. For whatever may be the effect of that Act, it is plain that it has no application to the present case.

But an argument was founded on the fact that the right conferred on Shields and his successors is a trust-fee, and that the radical right remained in Yeaman. I cannot see how this is material. The trust-fee is created only by a disposition of the lands, and can only be taken up by taking up the lands which are the subject of the trust. Therefore the question is, whether a good title has been made up to the lands, and that can only be decided by the law which regulates the transmission of heritable rights. Mr Buchan is not less a successor than an heir of provision though he is a successor in a trust-fee. The only difference is in the legal processes which would be available for the transmission of the respective fees. That the radical right remained with Yeaman is of no consequence. It only shews that Yeaman might have granted a disposition in favour of Mr Buchan. But he did not. He did nothing more than name him as the successor of Shields, and so place him within the destination contained in the trust-disposition.

No. 96.

Mar. 9, 1888.
Kerr's Trustee v. Yeaman's Trustee.

In my opinion the title is utterly bad, and I do not think the agent has a right to be paid for it.

The Court answered the first question in the affirmative, and the second in the negative, and found and declared accordingly.

Drummond & Reid, W.S.—J. A. Campbell & Lamond, C.S.—Agents.

No. 97.

Mar. 9, 1888.
Smith & Son v. Waite, Nash, & Co.

William Smith & Son, Pursuers (Respondents).—Sir Charles Pearson —C. N. Johnston.

Waite, Nash, & Company, Defenders (Reclaimers).—M'Kechnie—Salvesen.

Sale—Warranty—Disconformity to Contract—Description—"Old Meldrum turnip seed."—A firm of seedsmen offered to take from W., N., & Co., a firm of wholesale merchants, 100 bushels of "Old Meldrum green top yellow turnip seed," if "of a really reliable stock." The merchants accepted the offer; the paper on which the acceptance was written bearing this notice:—"Terms of sale.—Messrs W., N., & Co. give no warranty, express or implied, as to description, quality, productiveness, or any other matter, of any seeds they send out, and they will not be in any way responsible for the crop. If the purchaser does not accept the goods on these terms, they are at once to be returned."

The seed furnished turned out to be a mixture of Old Meldrum seed and that of another turnip, the two varieties of seed being quite indistinguishable. In consequence of this mixture the crops raised from the seed failed. Held (rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren), that the notice headed "Terms of sale" was effectual to protect the sellers against the buyers' claim for damages.

1st Division.
Lord M'Laren.
M.

On 3d December 1885, Messrs William Smith & Son, seedsmen, Aberdeen, wrote to the traveller for Messrs Waite, Nash, & Co., seed-merchants, London, stating that they required "100 bushels real true Old Meldrum green top yellow turnip," and that they would give 16s. per bushel "if you can assure us of the quality of the stock."

On 11th December Messrs Waite, Nash, & Co. answered that they could supply the seed required at 18s. per bushel.

This letter was written on paper on which appeared the following notice:—"Terms of sale.—Messrs Waite, Nash, & Co. give no warranty, express or implied, as to description, quality, productiveness, or any other matter, of any seeds they send out, and they will not be in any way responsible for the crop. If the purchaser does not accept the goods on these terms, they are at once to be returned."

On 17th December Messrs Smith & Son wrote to Messrs Waite, Nash, & Co.,—"In reply to yours of 11th inst., if the Old Meldrum green top yellow turnips offered are of a really reliable stock, we will take 100 bus. at your original offer, viz., 17s. per bus., f.o.b."

On 19th December Waite, Nash, & Co. wrote saying that they were in receipt of the order, which would receive their earliest and best attention.

This acknowledgment was written on a post-card, which bore the notice above quoted as to warranty.

No. 97.

Mar. 9, 1888.
Smith & Son v. Waite, Nash, & Co.

In March 1886 the seed was delivered, and an invoice sent, which also bore the non-warranty clause.

In March 1887 Messrs William Smith & Son raised an action in the Court of Session against Messrs Waite, Nash, & Company, concluding for payment of £2500 of damages.

The pursuers, after narrating the correspondence above quoted (which was admitted), and stating that they had received the seed, averred,—"The pursuers took delivery of the seed, and on the faith that it was of the true Old Meldrum green top yellow turnip, in conformity with the contract, they resold the same in various quantities to merchants carrying on business in different districts of Aberdeenshire, and the other northern and north-eastern counties of Scotland. The said seed was sold and delivered to these purchasers in implement of orders given by them to the pursuers for seed variously named or described, but always so as to designate the green top yellow Scotch turnip, and the said seed was nearly all resold and delivered in retail as such by the purchasers to their customers respectively, by whom it was sown on their several farms or other holdings." (Cond. 5) "The said seed, delivered as aforesaid by the defenders to the pursuers, and by them resold as aforesaid, was a mixture consisting, as was subsequently shewn by its growth, to the extent only of from one-half to two-thirds of seed of the Old Meldrum green top yellow turnip. The remainder was the seed of an entirely different species or kind of turnip, viz., of a Tankard species. The seeds themselves were to the eye so much alike as to be indistinguishable, and there was no way in which the mixture could have been detected by the pursuers."

The defenders admitted the delivery of the seed, and stated,—"The defenders exercised the greatest care and caution in selecting and proving the said turnip seed, and they believe and aver that they duly implemented the contract, but the pursuers were aware that no warranty was given."

The pursuers further stated that the Old Meldrum turnip was well suited to the climate in the north of Scotland, but that the Tankard could not withstand the severity of the climate, and that the crops raised from the seed in question had failed. They further averred;—(Cond. 8) "On the nature of the crop, as grown by the ultimate purchasers, becoming apparent, claims of damages were intimated by many of the proprietors, farmers, and others (being the purchasers of about 90 per cent of the whole seed in question) against the merchants who had supplied them with the seeds, on the ground that the seed was a mixture as above stated, and that they had suffered or were about to suffer injury thereby. The merchants in turn intimated claims of damages against the pursuers, and threatened to raise actions against them. The pursuers intimated to the defenders these complaints and claims as they arose, and that they held the defenders liable." (Cond. 9) "After renewed intimation of the several cases to the defenders, so as to give them an opportunity of coming forward and settling the claims themselves, the pursuers proceeded to effect, and succeeded in effecting, settlements of certain of the claims in so far as they considered them to be well founded. The pursuers have already paid in such settlements sums amounting to £172, 5s. 8d. The said settlements were reasonable, and were not above the amount of damage actually suffered. There are still a large number of unsettled and threatened claims."

They averred that they estimated that they had suffered loss, through the loss sustained by them in injury to business reputation, withdrawal of custom, and the settlement of claims against them by buyers of the seed, to the extent of £2500, the sum concluded for.

No. 97.

Mar. 9, 1888.
Smith & Son v. Waite, Nash, & Co.

The defenders denied that the Tankard turnip, if properly cultivated, was unsuitable to the climate in question.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders having contracted to supply 100 bushels real true Old Meldrum green top yellow turnip seed of a really reliable stock, and having supplied a different seed as condescended on, and the pursuers having suffered loss and damage in consequence, the defenders are liable to the pursuers for such loss and damage. (2) The defenders having contracted to sell and deliver to the pursuers a specific article, and having failed to do so, and supplied another as the article contracted for, whereby the pursuers have suffered loss, injury, and damage, the pursuers are entitled to decree, with expenses, in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defenders ought to be assoilzied in respect they duly implemented the contract between them and the pursuers. (3) In respect the defenders gave no warranty, and stipulated that they should not be responsible for the crop, the pursuers are not entitled to recover damages. (4) The sum concluded for being in respect of remote and consequential damages is not recoverable.

Proof was led in the cause, from which it appeared that there was a considerable percentage (about 25 per cent) of Tankard turnip in the seed sold, or rather in the crop which came up from it. It was impossible to say exactly what the percentage in the seed was, as the seed of Old Meldrum turnip was indistinguishable from the seed of the Tankard turnip, even under the microscope. The defenders bought their seed from a farmer in the country, and were under the belief when they sold the seed in question that it was the seed of the turnip ordered by the pursuers. Evidence was led at great length as to the failure of the crop produced from the defenders' seed, and as to the complaints made to the pursuers by merchants to whom they had retailed the seed. In view of the judgment of the Inner-House in the case, it is unnecessary to enter on this evidence in detail; it is sufficient to state that the complaints of failure of the crop were very general.

On 1st November 1887 the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defenders have failed to perform their contract to supply Old Meldrum green top yellow turnip seed, and that the clause of indemnity founded on in defence does not protect the defenders against liability for damages: Finds that loss and damage has been sustained by the pursuers to the extent of the sum of £600 sterling; and decerns against the defenders for payment of said sum." *

---

* "OPINION.—This case has been so long before me that, with the aid of the argument I have just heard, I think I may now dispose of it. The claim is certainly one of general importance to the defenders, because it was pointed out to me that their profit only amounted to £2, 10s. on such a transaction. This summons concludes for damages to the extent of £2500 in respect of breach of contract, but the hardship is really less than it appears, because, in the first place, damages have not been proved, and could not in such a case be proved, to the amount concluded for; and, in the next, it is to be considered that, from the precautions which are taken in the trade, an occurrence of this kind must be very rare, and it may well be that in the course of a long continued and prosperous business very few claims of this magnitude will really arise. However, I am not so much concerned with the hardship as with the question of liability, and the first element of consideration is the meaning of the clause on which the defenders found, and which is intended to protect them against responsibility for loss arising through defects of quality, insufficiency, or description. While I agree with the first part of the argument offered for the defenders, that some effect must be given to each of these words, I cannot treat the protecting clause

No. 97.

Mar. 9, 1888.
Smith & Son v. Waite, Nash, & Co.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—It was not disputed that they were in good faith in selling this seed to the pursuers. They employed a as one applicable merely to quality and sufficiency, because it also makes reference to errors of description. It appears to me that, in every case of this nature, one must look to the usage of trade, the nature of the transaction, the whole circumstances of the case, as brought out in evidence, to find out what kind of differences between goods ordered and goods supplied would amount to an error of mere description, and what will amount to an error in substance, such as the supply of one article in place of another. On both sides reference was made to a case decided by Lord Abinger (in 4 M. & W.) as an illustrative case, and a clear case. In the noble Lord's opinion, it was supposed that a seedsman or produce merchant, who has contracted to supply peas, and has delivered beans, could not maintain that that was a mere error of description, and Mr M'Kechnie said that, in such a case where seed of a different plant had been supplied, he could not contend that even this broad clause of indemnity would apply. Now, just let us see whether the rule here pointed to is not sufficient for the decision of the present case. In considering whether the goods supplied were specifically different from the goods ordered, it is quite evident that the test to be applied is not one that can be furnished by pure logic or by natural history. We are dealing with a mercantile transaction. It might very well be that, under such a contract, seed might be supplied of a kind that, in the opinion of a naturalist, was distinct, but which, in the opinion of farmers and practical men, was the exact equivalent of what was ordered, and in such a case the clause of indemnity might apply, the difference might be treated as a mere difference of description, although, from the point of view of the botanist, it might be a difference in kind. And conversely, there may be different kinds of seed, and different kinds of produce, raised from the seeds, which, according to a natural history classification, are the same plant, but which, for commercial and agricultural purposes, are widely different—specifically, or even generically different. In this case, I have to consider upon the evidence whether the seed of the Tankard turnip can be held in a fair and reasonable construction of this clause to be identical with the seed of the Scotch green top yellow, so that the giving of the one seed for the other was nothing more than the giving of the same article under a different description; or whether these two vegetables in the agricultural sense are specifically different, being suited to growth in different climates, used at different periods of the year, and differing to some extent, at least, in their feeding properties. Now, it is useless, in a matter of this kind, to enter upon a review of the evidence. I have stated the principle on which I think this question is to be determined; and I now say that, according to the best opinion I have been able to form of the evidence, the Tankard turnip is, from the farmers' point of view, a thing specifically distinct from the Scotch green top yellow in these particulars that I have named, and that to give the one for the other is not a mere error of description, but a failure to comply with the contract of sale. It is really worse than not delivering the seed at all, because that could be remedied by going into the market; but a seed is supplied which it is impossible by any test to distinguish from that ordered, and which when it is reared turns out to be useless or unavailable in the climate of Aberdeenshire and the neighbourhood, because it will not stand the severity of the winter. It has been proved to my satisfaction that the Tankard turnips that came up from the seeds supplied by the defenders were to a large extent perfectly useless. It was a plant not very well known in the district, and was treated in the same way as other turnips with which the farmers were acquainted, and the greater part of them, after the winter frosts set in, entirely perished. Now, considering the large value of the crop which may be raised from 5000 lbs. of seed, it is to me rather surprising that the claims sent in should not have amounted to a larger sum, and, once the question of liability is reached, I should not be disposed to be critical in examining those claims. But first, I ought to say in passing, dealing with another argument of the defenders, that I cannot look upon the claims which have been sent in to e pursuers as being anything different from damages naturally resulting from

---

No. 97.

Mar. 9, 1888.
Smith & Son v. Waite, Nash, & Co.

farmer in the country to supply the seed, and the seeds being exactly alike, it was impossible for them to have discovered that there was an admixture of other seed with the Old Meldrum.[1] The non-warranty note printed on all the letters sent by them to the pursuers was sufficient to protect them against any claim such as this, where the mistake was not wilful.[2] The word "description" in the "terms of sale" meant that the sellers did not warrant that the seed sent was of the description (i.e., Old Meldrum turnip) ordered. The notice was expressly and carefully framed to meet such a case as the present, and had been held to do so in England.[3] If they had sold cabbage seed instead of turnip seed, the terms of sale would not have protected them, but as they had supplied a kind of turnip seed, the clause was broad enough to cover the error.

---

the breach of contract. Now, the sums actually paid and vouched amount to £193, 2s. The claims made upon the pursuers, but not yet settled, amount to £488, 15s. I presume with regard to this second sum, that the reason why the claims are not settled is that, in the opinion of the pursuers, they are immoderate—not perhaps very extravagantly overstated, but still more than the pursuers think, in justice to themselves, and in justice to Messrs Waite, Nash, & Company, they ought to pay. I think it is inevitable that this should be the case, and that the pursuers were not bound to wait before bringing their action until every claim against them had been settled. It does not clearly appear what is the acreage or the proportion of seed represented by £193, and what is represented by the £488. But, in dealing with this claim approximately, as one must do, I think I ought to take off twenty per cent from the £488 of unsettled claims, which would reduce the sum by about £90; and allowing £400 for unsettled claims, and adding £193 of settled claims, we have a total sum of £593. There are some other claims for expenses, time, and trouble, which, in a strict view of liability, might be allowed. I think, in the strict view of liability, law expenses and valuators' fees might be allowed. I am not so clear about loss of time and personal expenses, because I think the time expended by a man of business in settling claims ought to go to profit and loss. But then, as to the claim of £1000 for damage to trade and reputation, I shall only say that that claim was not established to my satisfaction. I do not say that such a claim, in other circumstances, might not have been successfully maintained, but in this case all that was shewn was that the profits of the pursuers' business, which had been steadily increasing, had shewn, if not a decline, at all events a stationary aspect during the last twelve months. Considering that there are other causes in operation that have affected the profits of all classes of the mercantile community, and considering further, that this was a mistake incident to such a business as the pursuers carry on, that it was not their mistake, and that the circumstances were all explained to the buyers, it seems to me very unlikely that any sensible effect could be produced upon the business or commercial reputation of the pursuers, such as I ought to take into account in estimating damages. I think, in cases of this kind, where there is no fault, but simply such a mistake as all men, being fallible, are liable to, and where the loss is very large in proportion to the amount of the original contract, that it has always been the practice, in fairness to the defending party, to estimate damages on the lowest scale possible, and even to allow some share of the loss to fall upon the person whose contract has been broken. In all the circumstances, I think justice will be done to the pursuers for the damage which they have sustained, and may yet sustain, if I award, as the consequence of this breach of contract, the sum of £600 of damages. I shall accordingly give decree for that sum, with expenses."

[1] Carter v. Campbell, June 12, 1885, 12 R. 1075.

[2] Nichol v. Godts, 1854, 23 L. J. Exch. 314; Taylor v. Bullen, 1850, 5 Welsby, Hurlstone, & Gordon, 779.

[3] Reynolds v. Wrench, 1888, 23 L. J. 27—heard before Mr Justice Denman in the Queen's Bench.

No. 97.
—
Mar. 9, 1888.
Smith & Son v. Waite, Nash, & Co.

The respondents argued;—The offer made by them was distinctly conditional. What they bargained for was a "distinctly reliable stock"; that meant that the seed should be Old Meldrum and nothing else. They did not sue on the warranty, but relied on the contract, and sued on a breach of it. The turnip supplied was wholly unsuited for the purpose it was wanted for. The words "Old Meldrum" were words of specification, not of description.[1] Description was not equivalent to "kind"; it pointed at a particular class within a genus.[2] Adulteration to such an extent as there was here was sufficient to change the nature of the article.[3]

At advising,—

Lord Adam.—The pursuers are wholesale seed merchants in Aberdeen, the defenders are wholesale seed merchants in London.

In December 1885 the latter contracted to supply the former with 100 bushels of turnip seed.

The contract between the parties is to be found in the pursuers' letter of 17th December 1885, and the defenders' answer thereto of the 19th. There had been previous communications between the parties, and replying to a letter of the 11th the pursuers say,—"If the old Meldrum green top yellow turnips offered are of a really reliable stock, we will take 100 bushels at your original offer, 17s. per bushel, f.o.b.," to which the defenders reply,—"We are in receipt of your order, for which we are obliged. The same shall have our earliest and best attention." There were, however, prefixed to the defenders' acceptance certain conditions in these words,—"Terms of sale.—Messrs Waite, Nash, & Company give no warranty, express or implied, as to description, quality, productiveness, or any other matter, of any seeds they send out, and they will not be in any way responsible for the crop. If the purchaser does not accept the goods on these terms, they are at once to be returned."

It is proved that the pursuers knew of these conditions, and if the defenders can get customers to deal with them on such conditions, which I should scarcely have expected, I see nothing illegal in them.

I think, therefore, that these conditions formed terms of the contract for the sale and purchase of the turnip seed in question.

The contract accordingly was for 100 bushels of Old Meldrum green top yellow turnips (meaning thereby turnip seeds), on the conditions above specified.

On 11th March 1886, the defenders, professedly in implement of their contract, sent to the pursuers 100 bushels of turnip seed; the seed was accompanied by an invoice, which also set forth the above-mentioned conditions.

It has turned out, however, that the turnip seed so sent was not pure Old Meldrum turnip seed, but a mixture of that seed and of the seed of another kind of turnip called the Tankard turnip, in the proportion of about three of the former to one of the latter. If the mixture of the two kinds of seeds could have been detected by sight or otherwise, the seed would, no doubt, have been returned at once as not being conform to contract, in respect that it was not the description of seed ordered. But unfortunately the two seeds could not be distinguished.

---

[1] Shepherd v. Kain, 1821, 5 Barnewall & Alderson, 240.

[2] Josling v. Kingsford, 1863, 32 L. J., C. P. 94.

[3] Carter v. Campbell, 12 R. 1075; Jaffé v. Ritchie, Dec. 21, 1860, 23 D. 248, 33 Scot. Jur. 107; Dickson & Co. v. Kincaid, Dec. 15, 1808, Fac. Coll.

No. 97.

Mar. 9, 1888.
Smith & Son v. Waite, Nash, & Co.

The seed so sent was accordingly accepted by the pursuers and sold by them in their turn as being Old Meldrum turnip seed. It was not until the crop had been grown that it became apparent that the seed had been mixed, and hence the loss and damage suffered. That a great deal of loss has been suffered is certain—the question is whether this loss is to fall on the pursuers or defenders. It is a hard case either way, as it appears to me that neither party is to blame for the unfortunate occurrence, the blame lying on the original grower.

It appears to me that the turnip seed in question was ordered by description,—the description being Old Meldrum green top yellow turnips,—and the objection to the turnip seed sent is that, so far as it was mixed with Tankard turnip seed, it was not of the description ordered. But the seed was sent to the pursuers and accepted by them on the condition that the defenders did not warrant it to be of the description ordered, i.e., did not warrant it to be Old Meldrum green top yellow turnip. I think, accordingly, that the case which has occurred is just the case which the defenders' "Terms of Sale" were intended to meet, and against which they desired to protect themselves, and I think they have done so successfully.

I cannot follow the reasoning of the Lord Ordinary by which he arrives at an opposite result. It seems to me that if two turnips are identical, as he says, they must be the same description of turnip by whatever names they may be called, and a clause like the one in question could not be required for such a case. While to say that one turnip is specifically distinct from another, appears to me to be just saying, in a different form of words, that they are not the same description of turnip—which is just the case provided for by the "Terms of Sale."

Being of opinion, therefore, that the defenders are not liable, it is unnecessary to consider the question of damages dealt with by the Lord Ordinary.

On the whole matter I think the interlocutor reclaimed against should be recalled, and the defenders assoilzied.

LORD KINNEAR.—The whole argument for the pursuers may be summed up in one sentence, viz., that the defenders have not performed their part of the contract, as they have delivered seed of a different description from that bargained for. That argument would be unanswerable were it not for the stipulation which, I agree with Lord Adam, was specially designed and is fitted to meet the case. The stipulation comes to this, that while the defenders agreed to deliver "Old Meldrum" turnip seed, they did not guarantee the seed they delivered to be Old Meldrum seed, and, if it turned out not to be seed of that description, they would not be in any way responsible for the mistake. I think that stipulation affords an answer to the pursuers' claim.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion. If it had not been for the conditions expressed in the "Terms of Sale" the case would have been very clear for the pursuers. To a certain extent the defenders have delivered a different article from what they agreed to sell. So they have to that extent committed a breach of contract. But everything depends on the words of the notice, and particularly on the word "description," which occurs there. No doubt that word is susceptible of various meanings. In many cases it means a detailed description as to form, colour, &c. of the article sold—but it is also often used as equivalent to kind or species. Now, it is in that sense, I think, that it is used here. In mercantile contracts of this kind there is no description of the article sold except that contained in the order. One party orders a particular article and the other party delivers that article. The specification of the goods ordered constitutes the whole description of the article. I can conceive no other sense in which the word can be meant to be used in such a mercantile contract as this.

No. 97. — Mar. 9, 1888. Smith & Son v. Waite, Nash, & Co.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the summons.

SCOTT MONCRIEFF & TRAIL, W.S.—W. G. ROY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 98. — Mar. 10, 1888. Winans v. Lord Tweedmouth.

WILLIAM LOUIS WINANS AND ANOTHER, Pursuers (Respondents).—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—Sir Charles Pearson—C. J. Guthrie—Macphail.
RIGHT HONOURABLE LORD TWEEDMOUTH, Defender (Reclaimer).—Asher—Mackay—Ure.

Property—Entail—Burden on entailed property—Disentail—Bridge—Acquiescence of subsequent heirs.—The heir of entail in possession of K, an estate situated on the north bank of a river, in 1858 granted permission (not in writing) to M, the proprietor of lands on the other bank and tenant of the shootings on the entailed estate, to build over the river a carriage bridge, one of the abutments of which rested on part of the entailed lands. The bridge was connected by a good road, forty-five yards long, with a public road which ran along the north bank. The succeeding heir of entail, who in 1884 disentailed the estate, did not object to the continued use of the bridge by M. In 1885, after the death of the disentailer, M assigned the remainder of his lease of the shootings over K to W, who shortly thereafter placed a deer fence across the access to the bridge on the north side. In an action against M at the instance of W and the fee-simple proprietor of K, who up to that time had not objected to M's use of the bridge, for declarator that they were entitled to have the use of the bridge discontinued, held that M's right to the use of the bridge rested on sufferance only, and that, therefore, the pursuers were entitled to declarator that he was not entitled to continue to use it.

Question whether, if the summons had concluded for removal of the bridge, M would have been bound to remove it.

Road—Public right of way—Public termini—Dedication to public uses—Maintenance of road by road trustees.—A member of the public in 1886 sued for declarator of a right of way, acquired by prescriptive use, for carriages, &c. over a road running westwards from a village, through the avenue of an estate, past a disused mill, which was not averred to be a public place, and on to join another alleged right of way. It was proved that for many years prior to 1858 public money had been expended on the maintenance of the road by the road trustees with the knowledge and occasionally at the request of the proprietor of the estate. After that date no money had been so spent, the road having been closed to the public and maintained by the proprietor on being made the avenue of the estate, and the road was not one of those scheduled and taken over by the road trustees under the provisions of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878. The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) negatived any right of way to the west of the old mill, but found that there was a right of way from the village to a point "hereafter to be determined" near the old mill, on the ground that by giving up the road to be maintained by the road trustees the proprietor had dedicated it to public uses. The Court (reversing the judgment of the Lord Ordinary) held that there was no evidence of prescriptive use of a road from one public point to another, and that, on the assumption that the road had at one time been a district road under the management of the road trustees, on its abandonment by them it reverted to the proprietor free of any public right of way over it.

Servitude—Right of way—Mill.—Opinion (per Lord Mure) that where there is a servitude right of way to a mill for the purpose of grain being taken there to be ground, the right of way ceases when the use of the mill is discontinued.

No. 98.

Mar. 10, 1888.
Winans v. Lord Tweedmouth.

Road—Public right of way—Alternative routes.—The pursuer and the defender in an action for declarator of a public right of way maintained alternative routes for a part of the road. It was proved that the route proposed by the pursuer had been closed, without remonstrance by the public, for nearly thirty years, and there was no evidence that the one route was more convenient than the other. The Court declared a right of way by the route admitted by the defender, and negatived the pursuer's contention.

1st Division.
Lord M'Laren.
M.

The estate of Knockfin is situated on the north or left bank of the river Dhiag, which flows through Glenaffaric, Inverness-shire, in an approximately north-easterly direction. There are very few inhabitants, only about six or eight, on that side of the river, the ground being used as a deer forest.

The river is the boundary between Knockfin (and, generally, the Glen-Affaric shootings) and the estate of Guisachan, which marches with Knockfin for about thirteen miles. The population on the Guisachan side of the river numbers about 200 to 300, but all are connected with the estate in one way or another.

Guisachan House lies about 200 yards to the south of the river, and is surrounded by pleasure-grounds. Within the grounds are the ruins of an old mill, hereafter called the "Old Meal Mill." The ruins are about 250 yards to the south of the house.

About 350 yards above the House the river is crossed by a bridge called the Black Bridge. This bridge is only a foot bridge, and the point at which it reaches Knockfin grounds is about 300 yards from the Strathglass County Road, which runs along the north bank of the river as afterwards described. The bridge is connected with the county road by a footpath.

About 540 yards below the House the river is crossed by the White Bridge. This is a substantial wooden structure, resting on stone abutments on each side, and is suitable for carriage traffic. Its northern end is distant about 45 yards from the Strathglass County Road, with which it is connected by a good road. There is also a carriage road connecting the bridge on the south bank with Guisachan House.

Near the Black Bridge there was formerly a ford, which in 1854, and occasionally later, was in use, but only for foot and horse traffic.

Near the White Bridge there was also a ford, known as Cullessie Ford, which was occasionally used for cart traffic, but little, if at all, after the bridge was built.

About one mile and three quarters below Guisachan House, and also on the south bank of the river, lies the village of Tomich. From this village a road known as the Strathglass County Road runs up the south bank of the river, passing, in about a quarter of a mile, the entrance to the avenue of Guisachan, and crossing the river at a bridge known as Knockfin Bridge, below the White Bridge. The road then runs up the north bank of the river, passes the connections with the White and Black Bridges, and ceases to be available as a carriage road about half a mile above Guisachan House, where it becomes a mere drove road leading out of the glen to the westwards.

From Tomich, as already narrated, this road runs up the south bank of the river till it reaches the avenue gate of Guisachan. The avenue runs up the south bank and (disregarding a short piece of avenue leading to the house) reaches the site of the Old Meal Mill. Thereafter, in about a quarter of a mile, it passes the farm steading of Hilton or Tom-Guisachan, at which point a drove road strikes off southward (hereafter called road

No. 5) leading to Glenmoriston. The road in question then continues westwards up the south bank of the Dhiag to Cougie—many miles off, where there is only a shepherd's or keeper's house. This road from Tomich to Cougie will hereafter be alluded to as road No. 1. From Cougie there were drove roads leading to Kintail and Glenmoriston.

From Tomich a road branches off the Strathglass County Road, close to the village, and runs westwards south of and nearly parallel to the County Road and the avenue of Guisachan for about half-a-mile, and then strikes southwards at a point hereafter called H across country to a point where it meets road No. 5, the drove road to Glenmoriston from Tom-Guisachan. This is a drove road, and will hereafter, from H to the point where it joins the Glenmoriston Road, be called road No. 6.

From a point in the avenue of Guisachan about 200 yards from the gate a road runs off to join No. 6 where it strikes southwards at H, and this short piece of road is also included in road No. 6, which thus extends from a point in the avenue of Guisachan to the point where it joins the Glenmoriston Road (No. 5). It will thus be seen that the point H where No. 6 strikes southwards may be reached from Tomich either by following the road which branches off the Strathglass County Road and runs parallel to the Guisachan avenue, or by going along the Strathglass County Road, through the avenue gate, along the avenue for about 200 yards, and then following road No. 6.

In 1854 Mr Marjoribanks, afterwards Lord Tweedmouth, bought the estate of Guisachan from Fraser of Culbokie. At that date Duncan Chisholm was heir of entail in possession of Knockfin.

In 1858 Lord Tweedmouth, who at that time rented the Glenaffaric Forest as subtenant, erected the White Bridge. About the same time the use of the Old Meal Mill of Guisachan was put an end to, and a new mill was built to supply its place near Tomich, at Guisachan steading.

In 1858 (after the White Bridge was built) Duncan Chisholm died.

In 1869 Lord Tweedmouth obtained a lease (dating from 1870) from Sutherland Chisholm, who had succeeded Duncan Chisholm as heir of entail, for twenty-one years, of the shootings, inter alia, of that part of Knockfin on the other side of the Dhiag from Guisachan house and policies. Nothing was said in the lease as to the White Bridge, or its use.

In 1877 Lord Tweedmouth erected the Black Bridge over the Dhiag. This bridge was carried away by a flood and was put up again in 1881.

In 1881 William Louis Winans, an American, became tenant of the grazings of Knockfin.

James Sutherland Chisholm disentailed the estates in 1884, and died in 1885. He was succeeded by his son Roderick D. M. Chisholm.

By deed of assignment Lord Tweedmouth, in June 1885, with consent of Roderick D. M. Chisholm, assigned his right to the Knockfin (and other) shootings to Winans. Under this assignation Lord Tweedmouth made over to Winans certain subjects, "as well as any other buildings or constructions, and the additions and improvements of buildings at Aultbea and other places on or pertaining to the subjects hereby assigned, made by the said first party or his subtenant. And the first party hereby undertakes to put the second party into full and actual possession of the subjects hereby assigned . . . at the date of the assignment, and the whole buildings and other constructions which are to be delivered by the first party to the second party under this assignment are to be received by the second party in the order and conditions in which they may be at the date of this transfer or assignment."

On 30th April 1886 Winans, as tenant of the Knockfin shootings, with consent of Roderick Chisholm, raised an action of declarator in the Court of Session against Lord Tweedmouth.* The summons contained five conclusions with reference to the pursuers' rights in bridges over the river Dhiag, and for public rights of way over roads on the south bank of the river, i.e., through the Guisachan estate.

The conclusions (so far as it is necessary that they should be set forth, certain of them having been abandoned, and the decision of the Lord Ordinary having been acquiesced in with regard to others) were for declarator, "(First), That under and by virtue of a deed of assignment entered into between the pursuer William Louis Winans and the defender, dated 22d and 24th June 1885, there were assigned to the said William Louis Winans the defender's whole right, title, and interest in and to (1), the northmost half of the two bridges erected by him across the river Dhiag, in the parish of Kiltarlity and county of Inverness, . . . or one or more of them, the said bridges over the river Dhiag being situated, the one called the White Bridge, 540 yards or thereby north-east of Guisachan House, belonging to the defender, and the other, called the Black Bridge, 350 yards or thereby south-west of Guisachan House, and the said bridge over the Leth Allt Burn, being situated one mile and a third of a mile or thereby to the west of the bridge over the river Dhiag last above mentioned; and (2), in and to the roads and paths connecting the said bridges on the north with the public roads running through the lands of Knockfin belonging to the pursuer Roderick Donald Matheson Chisholm. (Second), That the northmost half of the said two bridges erected by the defender across the river Dhiag, ... are situated entirely within the said lands of Knockfin, and that the roads and paths connecting the northmost ends of the said bridges with the said public roads running through the lands of Knockfin are also situated entirely within the said lands. (Third), That the pursuers are entitled at any time and without any process of law, to shut up the said bridges, so far as situated on the lands of Knockfin, or one or more of them, and the said connecting roads and paths on the said lands, or one or more of them, by placing a fence or fences across the said bridges and connecting roads and paths, so far as situated on the lands of Knockfin, or one or more of them, so as to prevent the use of the said bridges and connecting roads and paths, or one or more of them, as accesses to or from the said public roads, the pursuers always leaving sufficient openings in any fence or fences which may be placed by them opposite the north end of the ford over the Dhiag, situated 450 yards or thereby north-east of Guisachan House, and opposite the north end of the other ford over the Dhiag, 875 yards or thereby, measuring along the course of the river, to the west of the ford above mentioned, . . . and upon the line of the roads or paths connecting the said fords with the public roads running through the lands of Knockfin; or otherwise, in the event of it being found that the pursuers are not entitled to shut up the said bridges and connecting roads and paths, or one or more of them, it ought and should be found and declared that there exists a public right of way for passengers, both on foot and by horse, and for cart and carriage traffic, and for the passage of cattle and sheep, or, at all events, for foot-passengers over and along the same, or across and along such of the said bridges and connecting roads and paths as it may be found that the pursuers are not entitled to shut up, and also over and along the portions of the said bridges situated on the lands of Guisachan, and along the roads or paths connecting the said bridges, so far as situated on the lands of Guisachan, with the public roads on the south sides of the river Dhiag, . . . and that the pursuers and all others are entitled to use the same for all purposes of passage for which the said bridges and connecting roads and paths are available; and in that event it ought and should be further found and declared that the pursuers are entitled to erect gates across the said bridges and connecting roads or paths on the north side of the river Dhiag . . . (or across such of them as they may not be found entitled to shut up), without any restriction as to the height or method of construction of the same, provided only that the said gates shall be furnished with the same facilities for egress and ingress as exist in connection with the gates at present existing in connection with the said bridges and connecting roads and paths."

---

* Before the case was decided by the Lord Ordinary, but after the proof, The Chisholm died, and his mother, Mrs Annie Chisholm, as his general disponee and representative, was sisted as a pursuer in his stead.

The fifth conclusion was for declarator of right of way for cart and carriage traffic, for passengers on foot and horseback, and for cattle and sheep, or, at all events, for foot-passengers, (1) by road No. 1 from Tomich by Guisachan Old Meal Mill and Tom-Guisachan or Hilton to Cougie; (5) by road No. 5 from the point where it leaves road No. 1 near Tom-Guisachan or Hilton to Glenmoriston; (6) by road No. 6 from a point about 200 yards within the avenue gate of Guisachan and joining the road to Glenmoriston from Tom-Guisachan (road No. 5) about 2 miles south of Guisachan House.*

The summons then concluded that the defender should be ordained to remove any gates or other obstructions which interrupted the free use of these roads, which had, it was alleged, been acquired for the public by prescriptive use.

The facts and dates above stated were not disputed.

The pursuers averred with regard to the Black and White Bridges (omitting reference to a third bridge over the Leth Allt Burn which was removed by Lord Tweedmouth before the Lord Ordinary decided the case), —(Cond. 3) "During his tenancy under the said lease the defender erected two bridges [one the Leth Allt Bridge] in order to connect the estate of Guisachan, belonging to him, with the shooting grounds of Knockfin, of which he was tenant. One of these bridges is now known as the Black Bridge, and is situated on the river Dhiag, the medium filum of which at that point forms the boundary between the estates of Guisachan and Knockfin. . . . These bridges were erected about the years 1880 or 1881, and were used by the defender and his servants as a means of ingress and egress to and from his Knockfin shootings. Another bridge, popularly known as the White Bridge, had been erected by the defender about 1858 across the river Dhiag to the east of the Black Bridge. These three bridges are all built of wood, and the White Bridge is the only one of them available for cart traffic. When the defender constructed these bridges he, at the same time, formed paths on both sides of the said rivers connecting the bridges with the public roads which run along the north and south sides of the river Dhiag. The northmost half of each of these three bridges is situated entirely within the lands of Knockfin belonging to the pursuer The Chisholm. . . ." (Cond. 5) "Under and by virtue of the said deed of assignment [of June 1885 above narrated] the defender's right, title, and interest in the said three bridges, or at least the Knockfin ends of them, from the medium filum of the river Dhiag and the Leth Allt Burn respectively, and the roads and paths connecting them

---

* Roads 2, 3, and 4 were branches off road No. 1, and road No. 7 was a road from Tomich to the south-east, but these roads not being ultimately in dispute need not be further referred to.

No. 98.

Mar. 10, 1888.
Winans v. Lord Tweedmouth.

with the public roads on the north, were assigned to the pursuer Mr Winans. The said pursuer thereupon became entitled to deal with the said bridges, roads, and paths in such way as he thought fit, saving always such rights, if any, as the public might have acquired over the same. In point of fact the public had not up to the date of the said assignment acquired any right of use or passage over the said bridges, roads, or paths, nor have they done so since. The pursuer Mr Winans is entitled to shut up the said bridges, roads, or paths by running a fence or fences across the same, or in any other way,—openings being left by the said pursuer opposite the fords after mentioned. At all events, if the said pursuer be not entitled to shut up the said bridges, roads, and paths, he is entitled to run a fence or fences across these bridges, roads, and paths, provided only that he leaves gates in the fence or fences opposite the bridges, roads, and paths."

The pursuers further averred that in running a deer fence along the Knockfin side of the Dhiag Winans had left the northern accesses to the fords situated near the White and Black Bridges free.

The defender answered,—(Ans. 3) "Admitted that the bridge now known as the Black Bridge is situated on the river Dhiag, and was erected by the defender after his purchase of Guisachan, but explained that this bridge was erected in place of an old bridge which formerly stood at or near the same site, and had been carried away by a flood. This old bridge was in existence long before the defender purchased Guisachan, and had been erected and used in lieu of a ford road over the river Dhiag, which had been used by the proprietor and tenants of the estate of Guisachan from time immemorial as a means of access to and from the Strathglass County Road on the north side of the river. . . . Admitted that the bridge called the White Bridge, which crosses the Dhiag to the east of the Black Bridge, was erected by the defender about the year 1858. Admitted also that these three bridges are built of wood, and that the White Bridge is the only one of them available for cart and carriage traffic. Explained and averred that the White Bridge was constructed with the consent of Duncan Chisholm of Chisholm, the predecessor of Mr Chisholm in the lands of Knockfin at the date of its erection, and that this bridge was built as a substitute for a ford road for foot-passengers, carriages, and horses, which had from time immemorial existed and been used by the proprietors, tenants, and others, residents on the estate of Guisachan, as a means of access to and from the Strathglass County Road on the north side of the river. Admitted that the defender, in or about the year 1858, made a small piece of carriage road on the lands of Knockfin, with the consent of the proprietor of these lands, in place of the road formerly existing at the ford and connecting the said bridge with the Strathglass County Road north of the Dhiag. The said ford road and the bridge road now substituted for it have been used by the proprietors of Guisachan as a right of way for carts, carriages, and horses, as well as foot-passengers, for much more than the prescriptive period. Explained that from the dates of their construction, and at and after the date of the said deed of assignment, the said three bridges were in constant use by the defender and his servants and tenants on the estate of Guisachan as roads or paths of access to and fro from the estate of Guisachan from and to the north side of the river Dhiag. The road running by the White Bridge was, in particular, so used, as the ford road had been previously, as one of the principal avenues or approaches to and from Guisachan House, and the road to Tomich, on the north side of the river Dhiag. They were so used without interruption or hindrance until quite recently, when the pursuer Winans erected a deer fence along the north side of the

No. 98.

Mar. 10, 1888.
Winans v.
Lord Tweedmouth.

bridges, so far as situated on the lands of Guisachan, with the public roads on the south sides of the river Dhiag, . . . and that the pursuers and all others are entitled to use the same for all purposes of passage for which the said bridges and connecting roads and paths are available; and in that event it ought and should be further found and declared that the pursuers are entitled to erect gates across the said bridges and connecting roads or paths on the north side of the river Dhiag . . . (or across such of them as they may not be found entitled to shut up), without any restriction as to the height or method of construction of the same, provided only that the said gates shall be furnished with the same facilities for egress and ingress as exist in connection with the gates at present existing in connection with the said bridges and connecting roads and paths."

The fifth conclusion was for declarator of right of way for cart and carriage traffic, for passengers on foot and horseback, and for cattle and sheep, or, at all events, for foot-passengers, (1) by road No. 1 from Tomich by Guisachan Old Meal Mill and Tom-Guisachan or Hilton to Cougie; (5) by road No. 5 from the point where it leaves road No. 1 near Tom-Guisachan or Hilton to Glenmoriston; (6) by road No. 6 from a point about 200 yards within the avenue gate of Guisachan and joining the road to Glenmoriston from Tom-Guisachan (road No. 5) about 2 miles south of Guisachan House.*

The summons then concluded that the defender should be ordained to remove any gates or other obstructions which interrupted the free use of these roads, which had, it was alleged, been acquired for the public by prescriptive use.

The facts and dates above stated were not disputed.

The pursuers averred with regard to the Black and White Bridges (omitting reference to a third bridge over the Leth Allt Burn which was removed by Lord Tweedmouth before the Lord Ordinary decided the case),—(Cond. 3) "During his tenancy under the said lease the defender erected two bridges [one the Leth Allt Bridge] in order to connect the estate of Guisachan, belonging to him, with the shooting grounds of Knockfin, of which he was tenant. One of these bridges is now known as the Black Bridge, and is situated on the river Dhiag, the medium filum of which at that point forms the boundary between the estates of Guisachan and Knockfin. . . . These bridges were erected about the years 1880 or 1881, and were used by the defender and his servants as a means of ingress and egress to and from his Knockfin shootings. Another bridge, popularly known as the White Bridge, had been erected by the defender about 1858 across the river Dhiag to the east of the Black Bridge. These three bridges are all built of wood, and the White Bridge is the only one of them available for cart traffic. When the defender constructed these bridges he, at the same time, formed paths on both sides of the said rivers connecting the bridges with the public roads which run along the north and south sides of the river Dhiag. The northmost half of each of these three bridges is situated entirely within the lands of Knockfin belonging to the pursuer The Chisholm. . . ." (Cond. 5) "Under and by virtue of the said deed of assignment [of June 1885 above narrated] the defender's right, title, and interest in the said three bridges, or at least the Knockfin ends of them, from the medium filum of the river Dhiag and the Leth Allt Burn respectively, and the roads and paths connecting them with the public roads on the north, were assigned to the pursuer Mr Winans. The said pursuer thereupon became entitled to deal with the said bridges, roads, and paths in such way as he thought fit, saving always such rights, if any, as the public might have acquired over the same. In point of fact the public had not up to the date of the said assignment acquired any right of use or passage over the said bridges, roads, or paths, nor have they done so since. The pursuer Mr Winans is entitled to shut up the said bridges, roads, or paths by running a fence or fences across the same, or in any other way,—openings being left by the said pursuer opposite the fords after mentioned. At all events, if the said pursuer be not entitled to shut up the said bridges, roads, and paths, he is entitled to run a fence or fences across these bridges, roads, and paths, provided only that he leaves gates in the fence or fences opposite the bridges, roads, and paths."

---

* Roads 2, 3, and 4 were branches off road No. 1, and road No. 7 was a road from Tomich to the south-east, but these roads not being ultimately in dispute need not be further referred to.

The pursuers further averred that in running a deer fence along the Knockfin side of the Dhiag Winans had left the northern accesses to the fords situated near the White and Black Bridges free.

The defender answered,—(Ans. 3) "Admitted that the bridge now known as the Black Bridge is situated on the river Dhiag, and was erected by the defender after his purchase of Guisachan, but explained that this bridge was erected in place of an old bridge which formerly stood at or near the same site, and had been carried away by a flood. This old bridge was in existence long before the defender purchased Guisachan, and had been erected and used in lieu of a ford road over the river Dhiag, which had been used by the proprietor and tenants of the estate of Guisachan from time immemorial as a means of access to and from the Strathglass County Road on the north side of the river. . . . Admitted that the bridge called the White Bridge, which crosses the Dhiag to the east of the Black Bridge, was erected by the defender about the year 1858. Admitted also that these three bridges are built of wood, and that the White Bridge is the only one of them available for cart and carriage traffic. Explained and averred that the White Bridge was constructed with the consent of Duncan Chisholm of Chisholm, the predecessor of Mr Chisholm in the lands of Knockfin at the date of its erection, and that this bridge was built as a substitute for a ford road for foot-passengers, carriages, and horses, which had from time immemorial existed and been used by the proprietors, tenants, and others, residents on the estate of Guisachan, as a means of access to and from the Strathglass County Road on the north side of the river. Admitted that the defender, in or about the year 1858, made a small piece of carriage road on the lands of Knockfin, with the consent of the proprietor of these lands, in place of the road formerly existing at the ford and connecting the said bridge with the Strathglass County Road north of the Dhiag. The said ford road and the bridge road now substituted for it have been used by the proprietors of Guisachan as a right of way for carts, carriages, and horses, as well as foot-passengers, for much more than the prescriptive period. Explained that from the dates of their construction, and at and after the date of the said deed of assignment, the said three bridges were in constant use by the defender and his servants and tenants on the estate of Guisachan as roads or paths of access to and fro from the estate of Guisachan from and to the north side of the river Dhiag. The road running by the White Bridge was, in particular, so used, as the ford road had been previously, as one of the principal avenues or approaches to and from Guisachan House, and the road to Tomich, on the north side of the river Dhiag. They were so used without interruption or hindrance until quite recently, when the pursuer Winans erected a deer fence along the north side of the

No. 98.

Mar. 10, 1888.
Winans v. Lord Tweedmouth.

said river and burn, so as to cut off the access to the estate of Guisachan by these roads or paths."

The defender further denied that Winans had acquired right to these bridges by virtue of the assignation, or that it was contemplated at the date of that deed that any such right should be conveyed to him.

In cond. 11 the pursuers set forth, as members of the public, that there were public rights of way over about twelve roads or paths on the Guisachan side of the Dhiag. Among these roads were roads No. 1, No. 5, and No. 6 above referred to. It was not averred in the condescendence that Guisachan Old Meal Mill was a public place, or that there was any public place near it.

The defender answered,—(Ans. 10 and 11) "Admitted that on the south or Guisachan side the said fords and bridges over the river Dhiag substituted therefor connect with certain roads or paths situated on the estate of Guisachan, and, in particular, with the avenues and private roads or paths leading to the house of Guisachan and the old meal mill of Guisachan. The meal mill has been disused for a long period. Denied that any of the said roads or paths are public. No members of the public have used the said roads and paths on the estate of Guisachan for time immemorial, or, at all events, for much more than forty years, as public roads or paths, and no member of the public now claims right so to use them. The only persons now resident on the Knockfin estate are the keepers, watchers, and other persons engaged in the preservation of game for the pursuer Winans, as he does not allow any agricultural or pastoral tenants or crofters to reside on it. The said keepers, watchers, and persons engaged in game preserving do not in fact use, and have never used, the Guisachan private roads as public roads. The real pursuer of the present action, Mr Winans, does not truly claim to use the said roads as a member of the public. He has inserted alternative and additional conclusions of declarator of public right of way over twelve or thereby different roads or portions of roads, most of which are situtated in or near the policies of Guisachan, in his present action solely in æmulationem vicini, and as a means of retaliation against the defender, who has obtained interim interdict in the Sheriff Court of Inverness-shire against him for cutting off, or attempting to cut off, by means of a deer fence, the rights of access which the proprietors of the estate of Guisachan have enjoyed from time immemorial, or at least for more than forty years, leading from the south or Guisachan side of the river Dhiag and Leth Allt Burn to the north side of the said river and burn and the Strathglass County Road."

With reference to the road from Glenmoriston to Tom-Guisachan (No. 5) the defender admitted that it was public from Glenmoriston to the point where No. 6 (the road to Tomich) branched off, but not from that point to Tom-Guisachan; also that road No. 6 was public from the point where it left road No. 5 to the point H where as above described it turned eastwards parallel to the avenue of Guisachan. He also admitted that this last-mentioned road to Tomich was public, but denied that the short piece of road No. 6 from H through the avenue of Guisachan was public.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) On a sound construction of the said deed of assignment, the pursuer William Louis Winans is entitled to decree in terms of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons. (2) The northmost half of the said bridges being entirely constructed on the lands of Knockfin belonging to the pursuer The Chisholm, and tenanted by the pursuer Mr Winans, and the said connecting ways on the north being entirely situated on the said lands, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the second declaratory conclusion of the summons. (3) The

No. 98.

Mar. 10, 1888.
Winans v.
Lord Tweedmouth.

defender having no longer any right to the use of the bridges and connecting ways, so far as situated to the north of the said river and stream, and the public not having acquired any rights over the same, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the first alternative of the third declaratory conclusion of the summons, or otherwise to decree in terms of the second alternative. (4) The said fords and connecting ways being public roads or rights of way, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the fourth conclusion. (5) The roads libelled being public roads or rights of way, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the fifth conclusion.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The said deed of assignment not having conveyed or assigned to the pursuer Winans any right or interest in the bridges in dispute, or any part of them, the defender should be assoilzied from the first declaratory conclusion of the summons. (3) The said bridges and connecting ways on the north of the river Dhiag having been made as substitutes for existing rights of way belonging to the proprietor of the estate of Guisachan, the pursuer is not entitled to decree in terms of the second and third declaratory conclusions. (4) The said bridges and connecting ways having been made at great expense by the defender, and consented to and acquiesced in by the successive proprietors of Knockfin from the dates of their formation down to the present time, neither he nor anyone in his right can now object to or interfere with their use as roads of access to the estate of Guisachan. (5) The said bridges and connecting ways having been openly used with the knowledge of the pursuers, both at and after the date of the said deed of assignment, as roads of access to the estate of Guisachan by the defender and his servants and tenants, the pursuers are personally barred from insisting on decree in terms of the third declaratory conclusion. (8) None of the roads libelled, with the exception of the roads admitted to be public in the defender's answer to articles 10 and 11 of the condescendence, being public roads or rights of way, or at all events not being so in so far as they pass over any part of the lands of Guisachan, the defender is entitled to absolvitor from the fifth declaratory conclusion.

Proof was led in the cause to the following effect:—

(1) The White Bridge—This bridge was erected at the defender's expense in or about 1858. At that date the defender was tenant of the Knockfin shootings. Before beginning the bridge he asked permission from The Chisholm (Duncan), who held the lands of Knockfin as heir of entail, to build it at his own expense. It appeared from the evidence that the defender built the bridge on a simple authority from The Chisholm (not given in writing, or at least no writing to that effect was produced). At the time of these communications a Mr Robertson was acting for The Chisholm and Mr Brown for Lord Tweedmouth (then Mr Marjoribanks).*

---

* Lord Tweedmouth deponed on this subject:—"I became anxious to have a bridge over the Dhiag for the purpose of getting out to the Knockfin Road, which was the only public parliamentary road, and a road which appears in the Highland Roads and Bridges Report from 1817. Duncan Chisholm was proprietor of The Chisholm property at that time. I was acquainted with him for many years before I purchased Guisachan, and after I purchased it he was in the habit of visiting at my house in London. He died in the end of 1858 or beginning of 1859. His factor at that time was Mr Robertson, and Mr Brown was acting for me. I was in communication with Mr Brown on the subject of this bridge, and also with The Chisholm. No. 186 of process is a letter which I received from Mr Brown on the subject of the bridge. I saw The Chisholm in London more than once on the subject of erecting this bridge. My firm impression is that it was by correspondence—but the letter I cannot find, and

No. 98.
—
Mar. 10, 1888.
Winans v. Lord Tweedmouth.

After Duncan Chisholm's death the succeeding heirs, viz., James Sutherland Chisholm and Roderick Chisholm (one of the pursuers) did not take

---

I am not going to say positively that it was by letter—but my firm impression is that the request was made by letter to Duncan Chisholm for an excambion. I applied to The Chisholm for permission to erect the White Bridge. (Q.) Did you get his permission in writing? (A.) I believe I did. I have searched my repositories for any written permission, but I have not been able to find any. . . . I have not found any letter from The Chisholm in my repositories. Mr Brown was acting for me at the time. I was frequently in the habit of sending papers to him connected with the estate matters. I have caused examination to be made, through my agent, of Mr Brown's repositories also, but without finding a letter. I am quite positive that I had direct communication with The Chisholm on the subject of the erection of the new bridge. (Q.) Did you receive his permission? (A.) Yes. I am positive of that, and I may also say that The Chisholm was anxious for an excambion. Mr Robertson, the factor, said there were difficulties in the way, and Mr Brown said there were none. I am positive as to these facts. There was some earth taken from the Chisholm side for filling up in making the bridge. (Q.) Was that done with The Chisholm's permission? (A.) Certainly. I would never have thought of putting this bridge on The Chisholm's property without consulting him. I was not present when the bridge was built or earth carted. I have never had any personal communication with Mr Robertson on the subject. My communication was with The Chisholm direct in London. (Q.) Was the bridge in fact built shortly after you obtained The Chisholm's permission? (A.) Yes, it was commenced in the beginning of 1857. There was a road made, connecting the north end of the bridge with the Knockfin Road from 1857 down to the recent dispute. I have used the bridge and road for an access to Guisachan House daily and without objection by anybody."

The letter from Mr Brown, No. 186 of process, referred to in Lord Tweedmouth's evidence was as follows,—"26th February 1858.—My dear Sir,—I went to Guisachan last Monday evening, accompanied by Mr Geo. G. Mackay of Inverness, and Mr William Robertson, The Chisholm's factor, met me there in good time on Tuesday morning. He is under the impression that the entail prevents The Chisholm from conveying any portion (however small) of the estate under a feu-charter, without the consent of the next heirs of entail, and as The Chisholm's next heirs are not known, he believes, or at all events asserts, that it is impossible for The Chisholm to grant a feu of the site for the lodge. I am persuaded that Robertson is wrong, as I know there is an old statute still in force, under which any proprietor in possession of an entailed estate can feu to the extent of half an acre by one deed. But it was quite unnecessary for me to argue the point with the factor, as he seemed confirmed in his own conceit. He, however, expressed his decided opinion in favour of the road and bridge, and assured me that The Chisholm would not only offer you no opposition to the formation and erection of them, but also that he would never think of finding fault with them after they are constructed during his lifetime; and Robertson said that he was certain The Chisholm would give you an obligatory letter to that effect.

"In this case, and seeing that the lodge would answer as well, and might be made to look better if built on your own side of the water, I would advise you not to press for a feu-right, but make the road and build the bridge under a simple authority from The Chisholm. The road must ever after The Chisholm's death appear a necessary connection of your estate with the parliamentary road, which no Court would order to be shut up without your consent. But if you think differently, and wish to have a feu of as much ground as would hold the lodge and make a small garden for the gate-keeper—say half an acre—I shall look into the Acts bearing on the subject, and get the opinion of a lawyer, which will satisfy both The Chisholm and his factor that he has a perfect right to grant you a feu-holding. Meantime, as I found Robertson so well inclined towards you and your improvement, and as Williamson, as tenant of the lands, agreed any steps to have the bridge shut up until Winans blocked up the Knockfin access to the bridge by putting a deer fence across it.

No. 98.

Mar. 10, 1888.
Winans v.
Lord Tweedmouth.

In the lease to the defender from James Sutherland Chisholm of the Glenaffaric shootings granted in 1869, provision was made for the tenant taking over all bridges, roads, &c. in the shootings, but no special mention was made of the White or Black Bridges.

In 1885, as already explained, Lord Tweedmouth assigned the unexpired portion of the lease to Winans.

(2) The Black Bridge—This bridge for foot-passengers was erected by the defender in 1877 at his own expense. It was carried away by a flood, and re-erected in 1881. No permission was obtained from The Chisholm of the day for its erection, but nothing was done by him or by his successor to interfere with its use or maintenance.*

The Lord Ordinary subsequently found, and it was taken as a fact in the case thereafter, that there were no public rights of way to the fords near these two bridges on the Guisachan side of the river. The White Bridge and connecting roads were largely used by the defender for bringing coals, luggage, &c. to the house from Tomich, by the county road, Knockfin Bridge, and north side of the river, recrossing at the White Bridge, so that such heavy traffic did not go along the avenue.

(3) Road No. 1—This road may be considered in two sections; section (1) "the Guisachan Road" from Tomich through the avenue gate and ending at or near Guisachan Old Meal Mill; section (2) the "Cougie Road" from Guisachan Old Meal Mill, then past Tom-Guisachan or Hilton, where No. 5 road from Glenmoriston joins it, and so on to Cougie. The Lord Ordinary subsequently found, and this also was thereafter taken as a fact in the case, that the drove roads from Cougie to Glenmoriston and Kintail were not public.

Section (1). There was no dispute as to this road being public from Tomich to the avenue gate, where it was in reality part of the Strathglass County Road. The minutes of the Inverness-shire Road Trustees, extending from 1803-1878, shewed that in 1814-15, 1818, and 1821, the trustees expended public money to a considerable extent on this section of the road. The Strathglass District Road Trustees were constituted by private Act of Parliament in 1830. From that date to 1860, during most of which time Fraser of Culbokie was proprietor of Guisachan, the district road trustees expended public money on and in fact maintained most readily to accept of such compensation for the little damages that will be done to his farm by the operations as shall be determined by arbitration, I resolved to contract for making the road on the line you had fixed upon when last at Guisachan."

---

* With reference to the Black Bridge, Lord Tweedmouth deponed,—"(Q.) With regard to the Black Bridge, has there all along been a ford there? (A.) Yes. I used that for riding as far back as 1851. It was the ford principally used in crossing back and forward from either side. There was a loose plank tied to the Guisachan side which, when any person wanted to cross, was turned over the deep portion, because the stream came rather deeper to our side. That plank was once or twice washed away. It was my understanding that there had been a bridge a long time back at that place. There is at present a bridge there called the Black Bridge. You can ride ponies over it. It was erected in 1877, and was washed away, and the present bridge was put up about 1881. I substituted the Black Bridge for the plank, because one of my daughters did not like to go over the plank. (Q.) Was it done in pursuance of any express arrangements with The Chisholm, or because you understood there had been a bridge there before? (A.) There was no leave or permission of any kind given for that bridge."

the road. The money was occasionally voted on the application of the proprietor, and was sometimes voted at meetings at which he was personally present. The last date at which money was so voted was 1858. From a minute of the trustees of date 17th May 1856, it appeared that Lord Tweedmouth had applied for leave to alter the line of this road slightly, at his own expense, and that leave to do so was granted. In 1860 Lord Tweedmouth converted it into the private avenue of Guisachan House. In 1879 the county adopted the Roads and Bridges Act of 1878. Neither this road nor the other part of it to Cougie was included in the list of roads made under the provisions of sec. 41, and taken over by the trustees under the Act. At Guisachan Old Meal Mill, before it was abandoned, there were only two or three houses. These were pulled down when the mill was given up. There was little evidence of any use being made of the road by the general public, any use that there was being chiefly by farmers driving to the mill to have meal ground there.

With regard to section (2) of the road, it was proved that money had been spent on it by the road trustees in the same way, but to a less extent than on section (1). This road, which led to Cougie, passed only two or three scattered houses on the way, and at Cougie there was only a shepherd's house. The road was much used for shooting purposes by the proprietors of Guisachan, but the evidence of use other than for such purposes was even slighter than in the case of section (1).

Road No. 6—The defender admitted, as before stated, that there was a drove road from Glenmoriston by road 5 and then by road 6, and by the road described above as running from H nearly parallel to the avenue. The only question therefore came to be which of the two alternative roads, that admitted by the defender or that claimed by the pursuers, viz., the short road leading from the avenue to H, the point where the Glenmoriston Road struck southwards after running parallel to the avenue, should be adopted. As a mere matter of convenience it did not appear which line was the more convenient for the public, nor which was formerly the more frequently used. It was, however, proved that the route claimed by the pursuers had been shut up by the defender in 1860, and that no complaints as to that act had ever been made before or since this action was raised by any member of the public. It was not proved that Winans (who did not tender himself as a witness) had suffered from the road he claimed being shut up, or indeed that he had ever used any of the roads claimed as public on the Guisachan side of the river. Lord Tweedmouth further deponed,—and no attempt was made to contradict the statement,—that he had never turned off any person from any of the roads claimed by the pursuers.

On 25th May 1887 the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds with reference to the first, second, and third conclusions of the summons, that the right of the pursuers to the northmost half of the bridge sometime erected across the Leth Allt Burn is not disputed, and that the said bridge having been removed it is unnecessary to dispose of the same by decree; and with respect to the two bridges erected by the defender across the river Dhiag, finds that the northmost half thereof, and the roads or paths connecting the said bridges on the north with the Strathglass County Road, are the property of the pursuer Mrs Chisholm, and are within the possession of the pursuer Mr Winans, as her tenant: Finds also that the pursuers are entitled to close the said bridges against traffic, under the conditions and with the reservations as concluded for: Under the fifth conclusion finds that there is a public right of way from points to be hereafter determined, the one between the bridge of Knockfin and the village of Tomich, and the other near Guisachan Old Mill, being a part of the way No. 1 of said conclusion: Finds also that there is a public right of way for passengers, horses, and cattle by the way No. 6 of said conclusion, and by so much of the way No. 5 thereof as connects Glenmoriston directly with No. 6, and ultimately with the Strathglass County Road: Finds of consent that there is a public right of way by the road No. 7 of said conclusion: Quoad ultra assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds neither party entitled to expenses."*

---

* "OPINION.—This is an action instituted by Mr William Louis Winans, who is tenant of extensive moors and forests in the North Highlands, and the late Mr Chisholm of Chisholm, the proprietor of one of these subjects, against Lord Tweedmouth, who is proprietor of the estate of Guisachan, in Ross-shire.

"The conclusions are twofold—First, the pursuers claim a right to shut up two bridges over the Dhiag, and one bridge over the Leth Allt Burn, which were put up by Lord Tweedmouth at a time when his Lordship was tenant of the lands now occupied by Mr Winans, for the purpose of establishing communications between the two estates. Secondly, the pursuers (suing as members of the public) claim certain rights of way, seven in number, over the estate of Guisachan. Mrs Chisholm has now been sisted as general disponee and representative of her son, whose death took place some time after the proof was led, and while the case was under consideration.

"It may conduce to clearness if I begin by announcing my decision on these points. I find for the pursuers on the matter of the right to close the two bridges which cross the Dhiag. The bridge over the Leth Allt Burn was given up by defender's counsel, and, as I understand, has been destroyed. I find that there is a public right of way from points to be hereafter determined—the one near the bridge of Knockfin, the other near Guisachan Old Mill, being a part of the way claimed as No. 1 in the summons. I also find that there is a public right of way for passengers, horses, and cattle by the road No. 6 of the series, and by so much of the road No. 5 as connects Glenmoriston directly with road No. 6, and ultimately with the Strathglass County Road. I shall define the right of way here found in such a way as will make it clear that it forms a thoroughfare between two public highways. I shall also declare the public right of way by road No. 7, in conformity with the consent which I understood to be given by defender's counsel. In regard to all the other rights of way claimed by the pursuers on behalf of the public, I shall assoilzie the defender, Lord Tweedmouth, from the conclusions of the summons.

"With respect to the two bridges over the Dhiag, the facts are these:—The Dhiag, which flows in a north-easterly direction through Strathglass, is crossed by the county road at the Bridge of Knockfin about a mile and a half below Guisachan House—Guisachan House being situated on the right bank of the stream, while the county road is carried along the left bank from the Bridge of Knockfin to a point about half a mile higher than Guisachan House, where it terminates. Access to Guisachan House is obtained by a carriage road (being one of the roads in dispute) which leaves the county road on the hither side of Knockfin, and leads straight to Guisachan. Soon after Lord Tweedmouth acquired the estate of Guisachan, it was found that it would be for the convenience of those residing in the mansion-house to have a bridge over the Dhiag near the mansion, enabling them to get to the county road without going round by Knockfin. The defender asked permission of The Chisholm (Mr Duncan Chisholm being then the proprietor and head of the family) to form a bridge at his own expense connecting Guisachan with the county road. I am satisfied, on the evidence of Lord Tweedmouth and of Mr George G. Mackay, that The Chisholm did in fact give his permission to Lord Tweedmouth to form the bridge, and the bridge (known as the White Bridge) was built accordingly, at Lord Tweedmouth's expense, in the year 1858. It has since been constantly used for the cart and carriage traffic of Guisachan until its use was challenged

The defender reclaimed to the First Division, and argued;—(1) The White Bridge—The right of use of this bridge was conferred by Duncan by Mr Winans in a way which is not to be admired, viz., by carrying a deer fence across the approach to the bridge.

---

"It is for consideration what is the nature of the right acquired by the defender, in virtue of the permission given to erect the bridge, and in considering this question it is to be observed that Mr Duncan Chisholm's right to his own estate was that of an heir of entail.

"There is no evidence that Lord Tweedmouth desired either a right of property in, or a servitude over, the small part of the Chisholm property on which he proposed to form the bridge, and its connection with the county road. If such a right had been desired, the right could not have been acquired except for a valuable consideration, because the Chisholm estates were entailed. But there is no evidence that Lord Tweedmouth desired anything more than that a bridge and approach should be formed for his convenience, he undertaking their formation, because it was for his convenience, and receiving from The Chisholm all the right which he was able gratuitously to confer, namely, a use by tolerance during the granter's lifetime.

"Mr Duncan Chisholm was succeeded in the possession of his estates by Mr James Sutherland Chisholm, a distant relative, who, again, was succeeded by Mr Roderick D. M. Chisholm, one of the pursuers in this action. Neither of these gentlemen took any steps to terminate or interrupt the defender's use of the White Bridge; nor did they or either of them do anything to confirm that right. During the greater part of this time the defender was tenant of the Glen Affaric forest, being the part of the Chisholm estate on which the White Bridge was formed—first as a subtenant holding from Colonel Inge, and later as a tenant under a lease for twenty-one years obtained from Mr James Sutherland Chisholm on the expiration of Colonel Inge's holding.

"In the lease, which provides for the use of bridges made and to be made on the Glen Affaric property, nothing is said regarding the White Bridge over the Dhiag; and I conclude that the use of this bridge was continued, as it had begun, on no higher title than tolerance. In 1885 Lord Tweedmouth sublet the Glen Affaric shootings to Mr Winans, and again nothing is said as to the White Bridge over the Dhiag. But it is evident that the conditions were altered by this arrangement. While Lord Tweedmouth was in the occupation of the lands on both sides of the Dhiag, there were reasons for allowing him the use of the bridge, which ceased to exist when he assigned his interest in the Glen Affaric shootings to Mr Winans. Accordingly, it is not surprising that the late Mr Chisholm, and his successor, Mrs Chisholm of Chisholm, should have thought fit to support Mr Winans in this part of the case. Lord Tweedmouth's use of the bridge being, as I hold, merely tolerance, it could not compete with the right of possession acquired by Mr Winans under the assignment of 1885. It would then rest with Mr Winans, as tenant in possession, to say whether, as a matter of courtesy or good neighbourhood, he would allow Lord Tweedmouth to have the use of the bridge. He is not entitled to pull down the bridge; nor do the pursuers ask a declarator that they are entitled to do so. The bridge was put up with the consent of a former proprietor, who had a right to make improvements on his property. It is partly on Lord Tweedmouth's property, and it is an improvement pertaining to the two estates. It must stand (unless the two proprietors agree to remove it) on the chance that at some future time they may agree to open it. This cannot be done (in my opinion) as long as Mr Winans retains his objection to the use of the bridge. But at the expiration of the lease it will be in the power of Mrs Chisholm, if she chooses, to throw open the bridge, under such conditions as to the use to be made of it as the joint owners may mutually agree on.

"All that I have said about the nature of the occupation of the White Bridge, and the absence of any title or usufruct on the part of the defender applies to the Black Bridge, which is besides only a foot-bridge in connection with a forest-path. It is therefore unnecessary that I should state separately my reasons

Chisholm, who was an heir of entail, but it was never interfered with by Sutherland Chisholm, either when an heir of entail or after he became a for making the declaration desired by the pursuer regarding this bridge. This disposes of the first, second, and third of the conclusions of the summons.

---

"I proceed to the consideration of the second branch of the pursuer's case—that relating to the seven rights of way claimed on behalf of the public over Guisachan estate. I may here remark that the mode of description of these ways followed by the pursuer is somewhat arbitrary, and the division into seven ways does not appear to me to correspond to the natural lines of communication of the estate, but rather to have been selected with reference to the pursuer's own views and claims in this action. I shall, however, endeavour to deal with the questions as nearly as possible in the order in which they are presented in the summons.

"I postpone consideration of the fourth conclusion, which relates to rights of way by certain fords over the Dhiag claimed in connection with the other ways in question, because it is obvious that the fords are merely parts of the ways claimed, and the right to their use cannot be advantageously considered apart from the right to the ways to which they are said to be accessory.

"Under the fifth conclusion of the summons, I consider, first, road No. 1, as there described. For reasons which will immediately be apparent, I must deal separately with the sections of this road, four in number, as to which the evidence and the legal considerations applicable to that evidence are distinct. These are—section 1, from the county road near the village of Tomich (near Knockfin Bridge) to Guisachan Mill; section 2, from Guisachan Mill to Cougie, where the road claimed branches in two different directions; sections 3 and 4, the two branch ways leading respectively to Kintail and Glenmoriston.

"The question is really more simple than it at first appears, because from Cougie, whence the two ways diverge to Kintail and Glenmoriston—(1) there is not, and never was, a made road to either of these places; and (2) there is no evidence (not enough, as I think, to deserve serious consideration) of a public right of way constituted or perpetuated by immemorial use. On this part of the case I find without doubt or difficulty for the defender. The question is thus limited to sections 1 and 2 of the way in question, or the part extending from Tomich or Knockfin by Guisachan Mill to Cougie. Cougie was, before Lord Tweedmouth's acquisition of the property, a shepherd's cottage. It is now, I understand, a keeper's house—not in any view, present or retrospective, a public place whereto a right of way could be acquired by prescriptive use.

"But it is contended that there is a public right of way from Tomich or Knockfin to Cougie, because the road connecting these places, and especially the section from Knockfin to the Mill of Guisachan, is a made road, maintained by and under the administration of the Strathglass District Road Trustees. This is a question to which I have given a great deal of consideration, and I shall state briefly the conclusions at which I have arrived.

"When a claim is made on behalf of the public, whether to a right of way, or to the use of any common or unenclosed ground or other heritable property for purposes of utility or recreation, the public right must, of course, be referable to some known legal category; and in general such a right, if it exists, must be referred either to purchase, to presumed grant as proved by prescriptive use, or to actual grant or dedication to public uses, the evidence of which is not necessarily connected with prescriptive enjoyment. In former cases—one of them relating to the right of the inhabitants of Callander to the square in which the church is situated[1]—I have expressed the opinion that if a superior or proprietor lays out a piece of ground—a road, a square, or a garden—for the use of his feuars or disponees, this is evidence of an appropriation of the subject to their use, which, in conjunction with evidence of actual use, may satisfy a Court of law that the subject was irrevocably appropriated to public uses, so as to disfee-simple proprietor. Neither did the original pursuer of this action, Roderick Chisholm, interfere with the use until some time after he suc-

---

[1] Lady Willoughby D'Eresby v. Feuars of Callander, compromised in the Inner-House, and therefore not reported.

---

entitle the owner to shut up the subject or convert it to other uses. There is not much authority on this topic; but I think there is none which is contrary to what I have said. The law is stiff on the subject of written titles to heritable property; but it is not of such cast-iron rigidity as to oppose itself to the acquisition of rights of use by the public in the only way in which such rights can be acquired—by de facto appropriation of the land to the service of the community. Especially is this the case with respect to the appropriation of land for the purposes of inland communication, because it is matter of general experience that the acquisition of a road by purchase is a very unusual thing, and that the more usual, if not universal arrangement, is that in which the proprietor gives the site of the road in consideration of the benefit to his estate of having a way made through it, while the road trustees undertake the cost of making and maintaining the road, or, as the case may be, of putting in repair and maintaining an existing road. In such cases no deed of conveyance is necessary, because the proprietor of the estate through which the road is carried does not intend to part with the solum of the property, but only to make an irrevocable grant of the use of the surface for public purposes.

"Now, taking first the section of road from Knockfin or Tomich to Guisachan Mill, it is my opinion that such an appropriation to public uses was made by Mr Fraser of Culbokie, the former proprietor of Guisachan. The printed excerpts from the minutes of meetings of the Strathglass District Road Trustees prove conclusively that from 1831 to 1861 (a period of thirty years) this road was maintained at the public expense, and that it was treated in all respects as one of the public roads of the county falling within the administration of the district trust. The money voted year by year for the repair of this road was voted on the application of the proprietor, and very often at meetings of the road trustees at which he was personally present. The trustees never disputed their liability to maintain the road, nor, so far as the minutes shew, did the proprietor reserve a right to close the road, or lay claim to any higher interest in it, or any right different from the bare right of property which the other proprietors of the district had in the county roads passing through their respective estates. If this was the position of Mr Fraser of Culbokie, Lord Tweedmouth did not claim any different position after he acquired the property. In a minute, dated 17th May 1856, it is stated that Mr Marjoribanks of Guisachan (Lord Tweedmouth) wished 'to have the line of the Guisachan Road, in so far as it passes through his place, altered.' The minute then describes the alteration in terms which I need not read, an alteration which it is stated had been already made, 'in hopes that when it has been completed to the satisfaction of the trustees or their overseer, they would sanction this alteration on the road, and adopt the same as part of the district road, and allow the present line either to be shut up or made private at Mr Marjoribanks' pleasure.' Nothing can more clearly shew that the defender, on taking over the property, recognised that the road to Guisachan was a public road under the management of the district trustees. The trustees evidently so understood the application, because they took it into consideration, and, recognising that the proposal was 'just and reasonable,' resolved 'to sanction the alteration if satisfied with the execution of the work'—that is, of the substituted road and bridge over the Guisachan Burn.

"Now, the argument against the right of the public is that the administration of the road by the road trustees was not continued for forty years, and that Guisachan Mill is not a public place. To the first objection, I think it is a sufficient answer that immemorial use (limited in proof to forty years) is only required where the public are claiming a right adversely to the proprietor, and when there is no direct evidence of a grant or appropriation of the road to public uses. In a case like the present, where the proprietor is shewn to have consented to the appropriation of his land to the purposes of a public road, a much shorter period of use than forty years is probably sufficient to establish the public right. I do not hold that the obtaining money from the rates in one year would be sufficient ceeded. On a sound construction of the letter of 26th February 1858 it was clear that consent had been given by Duncan Chisholm, which was evidence of appropriation, nor do I say that any set period is necessary. There must be evidence to satisfy the Court of the proprietor's consent to make an irrevocable appropriation of land to purposes of public utility; and this, when followed by actual possession on the part of the public, and actual administration by the local authority continued for a reasonable time, will, in my opinion, suffice to constitute the right.

---

"Then as to Guisachan Mill not being a public place, if this argument were good for anything, there would not be half-a-dozen roads in all the Highland counties from which the public might not be excluded at the pleasure of the proprietors. Very few of the Highland roads are thoroughfares; only the main lines of communication from one county to another cross the watersheds which divide the mountain districts. It is the normal condition of things in these counties that a district road is carried upland through a valley or glen as far as the habitable tract of land extends, and there it comes abruptly to an end. Of course, if it be a private road, the public never can acquire a right of way over it, because it does not terminate at a place of public resort. But if the road is public in the sense that it is made and maintained at the public expense, and is, with the proprietor's consent, placed under the administration of the local authority charged with the duty of providing means of communication for the district, then it appears to me that the law as to public termini is not applicable. In such a case the only question is whether the road is one which the trustees may lawfully make and maintain; and it is obvious that they may do so, if one of the termini be a public place, and if along the line of the road there are habitations and a population for whose accommodation a road is needed. In the present case the road led to a mill, a place to which the farmers had to drive, and there is evidence of the existence of a village or scattered cottages at Mid-Guisachan, which have since been removed. There was also the mansion-house of Guisachan to which the road led; and I see no reason to doubt that the trustees were properly administering the assessments in so far as these were applied to the maintenance of the Guisachan Road.

"It was explained in the evidence that since 1861 Lord Tweedmouth had improved the road in question, and had formed an entrance to it, with a lodge and gates, and had to some extent altered the direction of the road near Guisachan House. I am thus left in some uncertainty as to the actual limits of the old district road; but if counsel are not agreed as to this, I may make a remit to some person in the locality to suggest a suitable place for the terminus of the road in so far as public.

"Nothing that I decree will prejudice the right of the defender to apply to the county road trustees to have the road shut up, as being no longer necessary for the accommodation of the public, should the facts warrant such an application.

"I come now to the section of right of way No. 1, which extends from Guisachan Mill to Cougie. Now as to this section there is evidence that during the period already referred to, 1831-1861, small sums of money were voted by the Strathglass Road Trustees for the repair of the 'Cougie Road.' But it is also clearly proved that there never was a road in the proper sense from Guisachan Mill to Cougie, and that the sums voted were such as would be totally inadequate even to the maintenance of a footpath. There was, moreover, no population whose wants were to be supplied, because the path led only to a shepherd's house, and it is at least questionable whether the sums voted under this head were a proper application of the road trust funds.

"I have already explained that, in my view, the question whether a road has been irrevocably appropriated by a proprietor to public purposes, by making it over to road trustees, is a question of fact in which all the circumstances are to be weighed. In regard to this small portion of a mountain track not leading to any place, and not really required for public purposes, there is not, to my mind, satisfactory and unequivocal evidence of its appropriation to the uses of the public. There is the fact that Mr Fraser of Culbokie received small sums not merely limited to his own lifetime, but was good against succeeding heirs. Consent to mere use need not necessarily be in writing. Here of public money for its repair during a period of thirty years; but there are no other circumstances of weight, and I rather incline to look upon this as an instance of somewhat lax administration of the road money. With respect to the rights of way claimed under Nos. 2, 3, and 4, I shall say nothing except that paths of this description traversing a private estate are not proper subjects of a public right of way, and that the case relating to them has failed.

"Nos. 5 and 6 taken together constitute a way from the Bridge of Knockfin to Glenmoriston. Starting from the Glenmoriston side there is one way only over the hill; but at a point about 1½ miles distant from Guisachan the path bifurcates—one branch leads directly down a steep descent to Guisachan Old Meal Mill, whence access to Bridge of Knockfin is obtained by the road No. 1, already considered. The other branch or fork leads in a more gradual slope, and in a direct line to Knockfin. The way No. 5 of the summons is the way from Glenmoriston to Guisachan Mill. No. 6 is the branch to Knockfin.

"Now it is clearly established, as is indeed admitted by the defender, that there is a drove road from Glenmoriston to Strathglass in the direction indicated. And having regard to past practice, and the reason of the thing, I am clearly of opinion that the pursuers are not entitled to Nos. 5 and 6 together, but are only entitled to one way from Glenmoriston to Strathglass. The question is, to which of these ways. The defender contends that No. 6, or the straight line to Knockfin, ought to be declared the line of the right of way, urging that the evidence of use preponderates in favour of that way, which is also the nearest and the most convenient. In this view of the evidence, and on all the grounds enumerated, I think the defender's case is well founded. Indeed, I am at a loss to see any reason, except a controversial one, which could induce the pursuers to hunt up evidence in favour of carrying the public way past Guisachan House, after the defender had intimated in the record that he conceded the alternative way leading to Knockfin by No. 6. There is evidence that both ways have been used during the prescriptive period, but in the view I take it is not necessary to analyse the evidence, because the convenience of the proprietor and of the only section of the public who use the way—drovers, with their sheep and cattle—alike point to No. 6 as the preferable route.

"Way No. 7 is admitted on record, and no evidence was led regarding it. If a declaratory finding is desired regarding it, I understand the defender does not object.

"I now return to conclusion fourth, the consideration of which was postponed, because the conclusion has reference to certain fords on the Dhiag to which it is alleged that the public are entitled in connection with the various rights of way claimed under conclusion fifth. Now, the only ways whereby the fords would be accessible to the public are those which I have negatived, being the way (part of No. 1) leading from Guisachan to Cougie, and the way (part of No. 5) leading from the fork in the Glenmoriston Road into a connection near Guisachan House, with the aforesaid way No. 1. The disallowance of these two ways carries with it the disallowance of the claim to the fords, which, besides, have not been shewn to be necessary for the service of the public.

"The pursuer Mr Winans, whose name stands first in the summons, and who is understood to be the chief promoter of the action, did not tender himself as a witness. He has not asserted that he desires to use any of the ways claimed, and it has not been shewn that any of them would be subservient to his convenience as tenant of the adjoining property. He professes to be a suitor on behalf of the public, but there is no evidence that any member of the British public ever asked him to sue on his behalf, or ever complained of being prevented from passing over Lord Tweedmouth's estate. Lord Tweedmouth gave evidence that he never turned any person on his estate, and that no one who asked permission to view it was ever refused. In this general statement, I presume, the pursuers are meant to be included. His Lordship's evidence on this subject is uncontradicted. It therefore appears to me that the action is wholly unneces-

No. 98.

Mar. 10, 1888.
Winans v. Lord Tweedmouth.

what was done by Duncan was merely to substitute one burden, viz., the bridge, for another, the ford, which previously existed. The one burden was as great as the other. Vehicular traffic could cross the ford perfectly well. This was not a case of extending the servitude.[1] The defender did not assert a right of property in the ground of Knockfin on which the bridge rested, but merely of use founded on acquiescence continued over thirty years. The law in such cases was well stated in Bell's Principles.[2] The cost of building the bridge was very considerable, and the undertaking was manifestly one which once done could not be undone (the pursuers took that view because they did not ask to have the bridge removed), and in such a case the law, as was stated by Mr Bell, presumed an agreement as a fair ground of right. There were many cases to that effect.[3] The extreme rights of a proprietor were limited by equities rising out of the circumstances.[4] An heir of entail was only bound so far as he was bound by the fetters of the entail, but the law further assumed the power of an heir to do any act, unless an action of irritancy was raised against him by a substitute under the entail, and carried to decree.[5] Here there had been nothing of that kind done either in Duncan's or in Sutherland's lifetime. There could be no declarator of irritancy after the death of the heir who was charged with contravention.[6] For administrative purposes an heir of entail represented his successors, and his consent, with rei interventus, to an administrative act would bind the succeeding heirs.[7] Assuming that the erection of the bridge was in contravention of the entail, a plea founded on that circumstance was lost after the date of the disentail. No person could found on an entail except a person in the position of a substitute heir, and if that applied to Sutherland Chisholm after the date of the disentail, much more did it apply to the pursuer Roderick.[8] This use of the bridge was really a right of servitude in substitution for another right, and servitudes could be acquired against an entailed estate.[9] A right of passage by the ford was admitted, and there being no right of way on the south bank, the inference was that the right to rest the bridge on Knockfin was a right of servitude.[10]

(2) Black Bridge—The defender, in regard to this bridge, did not found on express consent, but it had been allowed to remain without sary in the interests of the public and of the pursuers, and that while on some points the pursuers have had a technical success, they are not entitled to the expenses of the litigation."

---

[1] Lloyd v. Martin, Feb. 4, 1886, 13 R. 512.

[2] Bell's Prin., secs. 946 and 947.

[3] Duke of Buccleuch v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, Feb. 17, 1865, 3 Macph. 528, 37 Scot. Jur. 266; Sanderson v. Geddes, July 17, 1874, 1 R. 1198; Grahame v. Magistrates of Kirkcaldy, July 26, 1882, 9 R. (H. L.) 91; Macnair v. Cathcart, 1802, M. 12,832.

[4] Kincaid v. Stirling, 1750, M. 8403; Aytoun v. Douglas, 1800, M. App. voce Property, 5; Cowan v. Lord Kinnaird, Dec. 15, 1865, 4 Macph. 236, 38 Scot. Jur. 131.

[5] Sandford on Entails, pp. 431-2 and 3; Lothian v. Willyson, 1725, M. 15,554.

[6] Fullarton v. Hamilton, July 26, 1822, 1 Shaw's App. 265.

[7] Earl of Kinnoul v. Small Keir, Jan. 18, 1814, Fac. Coll; More's Notes to Stair, p. 190; Marquis of Huntly v. Nicol, Jan. 9, 1858, 20 D. 374, 30 Scot. Jur. 211; Innes v. Hepburn, May 18, 1859, 21 D. 832, 31 Scot. Jur. 463; Earl of Leven v. Cartwright, June 12, 1861, 23 D. 1038, 33 Scot. Jur. 521.

[8] Earl of Breadalbane v. Jamieson, March 16, 1877, 4 R. 667.

[9] Stewart v. Steuart, July 5, 1877, 4 R. 981.

[10] Clelland v. Clelland, 1619, M. 12,769; Stair, ii. 7, 10.

objection just as the White Bridge had. Here, too, there had existed a right of ford close to the bridge, and the bridge was in substitution of that right. There had always been some kind of bridge here.

With regard to both bridges. The Lord Ordinary's judgment was erroneous, in respect that he had found that there was a right of property in the proprietor of Knockfin in the north half of the two bridges, seeing that there was no conclusion to that effect in the summons.

(3) Road No. 1—The Lord Ordinary had held that the Cougie section of the road was not public, and that was acquiesced in. With regard to the other section he had found that there was a right of way by the avenue from Tomich to a "point to be hereafter determined" "near Guisachan Old Mill." That finding was incompetent. There was no averment that the old mill was a public place, and its natural description did not shew it to be so. There must be an averment of two public termini.[1] There was no averment of that here, and, further, the proof on the point of prescriptive use had failed. Further, the Lord Ordinary had declared a right of way by dedication to public uses. There was no such principle known to the law of Scotland,[2] and there was no conclusion in the summons to warrant the finding. What the road trustees had expended on the Guisachan section did not prove it to be a public road; otherwise, why did the pursuers not insist in their conclusion as to the Cougie branch, on which public money was also spent? That money was spent on the road only proved laxness on the part of the trustees. They were acting ultra vires when they gave public money for this road. At all events, the use of the road by the public being so small, if indeed there was any use at all by the general public, the fact that when the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, was adopted, the trustees did not schedule this road as one of those taken over by them, shewed that they did not consider it a public road, and that they were willing it should revert to the sole use of the defender.

(4) Road No. 6—With regard to the small piece of road joining the avenue with H. To shew a right of way over this piece of road it was necessary for the pursuers to shew that road No. 1 was public; else there would be a right of way with one of its termini private. This was a drove road, and there was no evidence to shew that the alternative way admitted by the defender was not as convenient as that proposed by the pursuers. In such circumstances, it was competent for the Court to decide which was to be the public route.[3] The pursuer Winans sued as a member of the public, but he did not aver that any of the public objected to the defender's alternative route, or that he or any other member of the public had suffered by the route he proposed having been shut up for many years. The only practical effect of opening this short bit of road would be to spoil the defender's avenue.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) The White Bridge—The bridge ought either to be shut altogether, or open to all, which it could not be held to be, as there were no public roads connecting with it on the south side. What the defender claimed here was a private right over The Chisholm's property. That was a unilateral servitude, and it involved the right to have the accesses on the north bank kept in good repair by the proprietors of the servient tenement. The letter of 26th February 1858 was exclusive of the idea that The Chisholm meant to grant a right in perpetuity over the estate. Lord Tweedmouth's own evidence and that letter negatived the idea that what was asked for or what was given was more than a permission for the granter's life. Such a servitude as was claimed could only be constituted by writing, or acquired by prescriptive possession. There was neither the one nor the other here. The idea that the bridge was in substitution of the ford was quite new, and was not thought of by either of the parties in 1858. There was no evidence even of a servitude of ford before 1858, though there was proof of a certain amount of use by the Guisachan people, not objected to by the proprietor of Knockfin. As to the acquiescence relied on subsequent to 1858, it was to be noticed that until the defender assigned his lease to Winans he was tenant of the Knockfin shootings. It was, therefore, very natural that the owners of the shooting should not object to anything which tended to the convenience of their tenant, but when the defender ceased to be tenant the inducement to allow an unnecessary burden on the estate to remain was taken away. Further, the erection of a bridge to replace a ford, even assuming that there was a servitude of ford prior to 1858, was not a legitimate extension of the servitude, as it made the road available for traffic which could not have used the ford. The class of bridge put up too, viz., a wooden erection, excluded the idea of perpetuity. This, and the fact that the two parties never met to consider the matter when the encroachment first took place, removed the case from the authority of the previous cases, particularly that of The Duke of Buccleuch v. Magistrates of Edinburgh,[1] the case relating to the Edinburgh Music Hall. Further, if what was done by Duncan Chisholm in 1858 amounted to the constitution of a servitude over the entailed lands, then it was an act of dilapidation, and Roderick, who took as a fee-simple proprietor, could found on the entail, or, at all events, Winans could, as he had been assigned into the position of his principal, who was an heir of entail. It was not the case that the only remedy where there was a contravention of an entail was to irritate the proprietor who committed it. The next heir could reduce the deed.[2] That right was vested in Sutherland Chisholm, and Winans having all the rights of his principal, and Roderick Chisholm having succeeded to all the rights of his predecessor, they could do so too. The only right to the bridge that Lord Tweedmouth had was one founded on tolerance.

---

[1] Duncan v. Lees, &c., Dec. 13, 1870, 9 Macph. 274, 43 Scot. Jur. 107; Id. v. Eosd., June 20, 1871, 9 Macph. 855, 43 Scot. Jur. 503; Darrie v. Drummond, Feb. 10, 1865, 3 Macph. 496, 37 Scot. Jur. 245.

[2] Henderson v. Earl of Minto, June 1, 1860, 22 D. 1126, 32 Scot. Jur. 519; Torrie v. Duke of Athole, June 4, 1852, 1 Macq. 65, see Lord Chancellor, p. 77; Dyce v. Hay, May 28, 1852, 1 Macq. 305, Lord Chancellor, p. 311; Brodie v. Mann, June 13, 1884, 11 R. 925, May 4, 1885, 12 R. (H. L.) 52; Cumming v. Smollett, June 17, 1852, 14 D. 885, 24 Scot. Jur. 529.

[3] Mackintosh v. Moir, March 2, 1872, 10 Macph. 517, 44 Scot. Jur. 278.

(2) The Black Bridge—This bridge was in precisely the same position as the White Bridge, with this exception that no consent had been obtained to its erection. Any traffic there was over it was merely traffic to facilitate Lord Tweedmouth's use of the shootings.

The pursuers did not claim that the defender should be ordained to pull down either of these bridges, nor did they claim a right of property in them, which the Lord Ordinary had given them, but they maintained that the use of them had only the sanction of tolerance on the part of the proprietor of Knockfin, and that he was entitled to put a stop to it.

(3) Road No. 1—With regard to this road, it was evident from the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor that the process was not exhausted. He left over one of the termini to be hereafter fixed. It was admitted that the ordinary rule was that a public right of way must have public termini

---

[1] Feb. 17, 1865, 3 Macph. 528.

[2] Mordaunt v. Innes, July 5, 1822, 1 Shaw's App. 169.

No. 98.
—
Mar. 10, 1888.
Winans v.
Lord Tweedmouth.

at both ends. But the rule must suffer relaxation according to the nature of the locality. There were many public roads up glens in the Highlands which simply ended at the head of the glen where there was no village, and the road could, owing to the nature of the ground, go no further. There was no need to use the argument of dedication to which the Lord Ordinary had given effect. The road trustees found a road subserving the public convenience, and spent public money upon it. The owner by allowing and, indeed, on several occasions requesting them to maintain it, shewed that he realised that the road was public. The fact that the trustees had not taken it over in 1879 merely shewed that they thought the use of it by the public was not sufficient to justify their spending more money on it. It did not derogate from its character as a public right of way. With regard to the use, it was proved that there was a certain amount of traffic by this road so long as the mill remained, and that that use had continued for far longer than the prescriptive period.

(4) Road No. 6—The road from the avenue to H had undoubtedly once been public, and the mere fact that for a considerable number of years it had been closed did not take away its character as a public road. The proprietor had no business to close it, and the public were entitled to have it opened up. This route was at least equally convenient for the public with the road proposed by the defender, and the public were entitled to the use of both the alternative ways.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The pursuer of this action, Mr Winans, is tenant of the shootings and grazings of the lands of Knockfin. The other pursuer, Mr Chisholm, is proprietor of these lands. The defender, Lord Tweedmouth, is proprietor of the adjoining lands of Guisachan.

The pursuers seek to have it found and declared that they possess certain rights and interests in these bridges, two over the Dhiag river and one over Leth Allt Burn, the river and burn forming the boundary between their respective estates of Knockfin and Guisachan. The pursuers also, as representing the public, seek to have it found and declared that there exist certain public rights of way or roads over the estate of Guisachan, as described in the summons, and shewn on a plan produced. These roads, with their branches, are fifteen in number.

The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary submitted to review disposes of all these claims. The interlocutor has been acquiesced in by both parties, except as regards three of the findings therein. These have reference (1) to the White and Black Bridges, two of the three bridges above mentioned; (2) to the road marked No. 1 on the plan; and (3) to the road marked No. 6 thereon.

With reference to the White and Black Bridges, I think it is necessary in order to a just appreciation of the rights of parties to ascertain the circumstances and conditions under which they were erected.

The river Dhiag, as I have said, forms the boundary between The Chisholm's lands of Knockfin, which lie on the left or north bank of the river, and Lord Tweedmouth's lands of Guisachan, which lie on the right or south bank.

The Strathglass County Road crosses from the south to the north bank of the river, by the Knockfin Bridge, some distance below the White Bridge, and then runs westwards through the lands of Knockfin, and ends at a point about half a mile higher up the river than Guisachan House, on the opposite side. From the point where the road terminates there is a drove road leading to Kintail. The White Bridge is about 45 yards distant from this county road, and the Black Bridge about 300 yards.

The population on the Knockfin side of the river is and always has been very sparse, only amounting to half a dozen, more or less. The population on the Guisachan side is more numerous, amounting to 230 or 240, but it is all employed on or connected with the estate. There appears to be no general public on either side.

Lord Tweedmouth purchased Guisachan in 1854. At that time, although the people on the estate crossed the river when it was low wherever they found it convenient, there existed three fords by which they got access to the county road, one called Cullessie Ford, near where the White Bridge now is, another near the Black Bridge, and a third further up, but with it we have no concern. The ford near the Black Bridge seems to have been used only for foot and horse traffic, but the ford at the White Bridge was also occasionally used for cart traffic. But the traffic was small, as the Guisachan people had access to the county road before it crossed to the Knockfin side, by roads on their own side of the river, and so to the south and east, from or to which nearly all the traffic went and came.

The Lord Ordinary has found, and it must be taken as a fact in this case, that there were no public rights of way to or across these fords.

The White Bridge was erected in the beginning of 1858. It is a substantial carriage bridge, constructed of wood, about 72 feet long, and 16 feet 6 inches wide, and resting on stone abutments on both sides. Those on the Knockfin side occupy about 8 or 10 square yards. There is a road, about 15 feet wide connecting it with the county road. It cost Lord Tweedmouth between £200 and £300.

That this road and bridge are of considerable convenience to Lord Tweedmouth there is no doubt. "For what purpose," he is asked, "did you use the White Bridge and the public road down the opposite side? For ourselves. It was a variety. We could walk or ride down one side of the river and up the other. It was also of the greatest importance for Guisachan in this respect that all our coal, luggage, and supplies came that way, by the Knockfin public road, and crossed by the White Bridge. We found that a very great convenience."

It would seem, therefore, that this bridge was erected solely for the benefit of the Guisachan estate. That being so, I think it would be extremely difficult to support a claim to erect and maintain such a bridge, and the road leading from it to the county road, without the consent, express or implied, of the proprietor of Knockfin.

Lord Tweedmouth, accordingly, does not do so. He says,—"I would never have thought of putting the bridge on The Chisholm's property without his consent." Then he says,—"I became anxious to have a bridge over the Dhiagh for the purpose of getting out to the Knockfin Road, which was the only public parliamentary road, and a road which appears in the Highland Roads and Bridges Reports from 1817. Duncan Chisholm was proprietor of the Chisholm property at that time. I was acquainted with him for many years before I purchased Guisachan, and after I purchased it he was in the habit of visiting at my house in London. He died in the end of 1858 or beginning of 1859. His factor at that time was Mr Robertson, and Mr Brown was acting for me. I was in communication with Mr Brown on the subject of this bridge, and also

No. 98.

Mar. 10, 1888.
Winans v.
Lord Tweedmouth.

with The Chisholm. No. 186 of process is a letter which I received from Mr Brown on the subject of the bridge. I saw The Chisholm in London more than once on the subject of erecting this bridge. My firm impression is that it was by correspondence, but the letter I cannot find, and I am not going to say positively that it was by letter, but my firm impression is that the request was made by letter to Duncan Chisholm for an excambion. I applied to The Chisholm for permission to erect the White Bridge. (Q.) Did you get his permission in writing? (A.) I believe I did. I have searched my repositories for any written permission, but I have not been able to find any. . . . I am quite positive that I had direct communication with The Chisholm on the subject of the erection of the new bridge. (Q.) Did you receive his permission? (A.) Yes, I am positive of that, and I may also say that The Chisholm was anxious for an excambion. Mr Robertson the factor said there were difficulties in the way, and Mr Brown said there were none. I am positive as to these facts."

I have no doubt that, as Lord Tweedmouth says, he obtained the Chisholm's permission to erect the bridge. It is to be regretted that if the permission was given by letter the correspondence has not been recovered, that it might have been seen what were the terms and conditions, if any, on which the permission was granted. Lord Tweedmouth was not asked any questions on the subject—but the letter from Mr Brown, referred to by him (which has been produced), shews what was the state of mind of The Chisholm's advisers,—and presumably his own,—on the subject.

The letter is dated 26th February 1858, and records the result of a meeting between Mr Brown, Lord Tweedmouth's factor, and Mr Robertson, The Chisholm's factor. It appears that Lord Tweedmouth had also desired to obtain a feu of a site for a lodge from The Chisholm, and Mr Brown, after stating Mr Robertson's opinion that it was impossible for The Chisholm, as an heir of entail, to grant a feu, goes on to say,—"He, however, expressed his decided opinion in favour of the road and bridge, and assured me that The Chisholm would not only offer you no opposition to the formation and erection of them, but also that he would never think of finding fault with them after they are constructed during his lifetime, and Robertson said he was certain The Chisholm would give you an obligatory letter to this effect." Then he adds,—"I would advise you not to press for a feu-right, but to make the road and build the bridge, under a simple authority from The Chisholm. . . . Meantime, as I found Robertson so well inclined towards you and your improvement . . . I resolved to contract for making the road on the line you had fixed upon when last at Guisachan."

It would appear, therefore, that Lord Tweedmouth was advised to build the bridge under a simple authority from The Chisholm, with an undertaking that it should not be interfered with during The Chisholm's life. I do not think that there is any evidence that Lord Tweedmouth ever sought or obtained any higher or more permanent right. I concur in what the Lord Ordinary says on this part of the case. "There is," he says, "no evidence that Lord Tweedmouth desired either a right of property in or a servitude over the small part of The Chisholm property on which he proposed to form the bridge, and its connection with the county road. If such a right had been desired, the right could not have been acquired except for a valuable consideration, because the Chisholm estates were entailed. But there is no evidence that Lord Tweedmouth desired anything more than that a bridge and approach should be formed for his convenience, he undertaking their formation because it was for his convenience, and receiving from The Chisholm all the right which he was able gratuitously to confer, viz., a use by tolerance during the granter's lifetime."

If, then, the bridge and road were originally constructed on this footing, the question arises whether anything has since occurred by which Lord Tweedmouth has acquired a right to have them maintained as permanent burdens on The Chisholm's property.

It appears that The Chisholm who granted the permission died in the same year, 1858, as the bridge was built. He was succeeded by Sutherland Chisholm, who died in 1885, and who disentailed the estates in 1884. He, again, was succeeded by Roderick Chisholm, who died in 1887, and was one of the pursuers of this action. And he, again, was succeeded by Mrs Chisholm, one of the present pursuers.

I am not aware that there is any positive act condescended on from which it is to be implied that any of these successive proprietors consented that the road and bridge should become permanent burdens on the Chisholm estate. All that they did was to allow Lord Tweedmouth to use and enjoy the bridge and road as he had done before. I do not see that that conferred on Lord Tweedmouth any different or more permanent right than he had before. But there were special reasons why they should not have interfered with his use of the bridge and road. In 1854 Lord Tweedmouth became tenant of the shootings of Affaric, which included Knockfin, by an assignation to the unexpired period of the lease of the then tenant, Colonel Inge—and on the expiry of this lease he took a new lease of these shootings for twenty-one years from 1870, the unexpired period of which he in 1885 assigned to Mr Winans. There were obvious reasons, therefore, why the proprietors of Knockfin should not interfere with the access of their shooting tenant to the shootings which they had let to him. I think, therefore, that Lord Tweedmouth's right to use the bridge and road remained what it was originally, a right only so long as he had the permission or tolerance of the proprietor of Knockfin.

It was contended, however, by the defender that he was entitled to maintain the bridge as in substitution for the ford. Naturally, the traffic which used to pass by the ford has been diverted to the bridge. The bridge, however, was not originally erected as a substitute for the ford (because as Lord Tweedmouth tells us he did not then know of its existence), but for his own convenience—and I know no authority which suggests that a permanent structure such as this can be maintained on another man's land against his will in place of a ford, which is as practicable and passable as ever it was.

With reference to the Black Bridge, it was erected by Lord Tweedmouth in 1877, afterwards carried away by the river in a flood, and replaced by him in 1881. It was erected by Lord Tweedmouth at his own cost, without any permission from The Chisholm, he being tenant of the Knockfin shootings at the time. The Chisholms are not said to have done anything implying consent to the erecting or maintenance of this bridge, except that they did not interfere with its erection or use—that is, that they have tolerated it. It is also said that this bridge was substituted for the ford near it. It is not disputed that there is this ford, and that, at the ford, there was a plank chained to the Guisachan side, and extending not wholly, but I think partly only, across the river, which was used to facilitate the passage of the ford. I am not of opinion that these facts can justify the retention of the bridge.

No. 98.

Mar. 10, 1888.
Winans v. Lord Tweedmouth.

I am therefore of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that Lord Tweedmouth has not instructed any legal right to retain these roads and bridges. But I do not altogether agree with his Lordship's findings on the subject. His Lordship finds that the northmost half thereof, and the roads or paths connecting the said bridges on the north with the Strathglass County Road, are the property of the pursuer Mrs Chisholm, and are within the possession of the pursuer Mr Winans as her tenant. It is said that the finding that half of the bridges are the property of Mrs Chisholm is not within the conclusions of the action, and I think that is so. But I think further that the reasoning of the Lord Ordinary as to these bridges does not lead to the conclusion he has drawn. If, as his Lordship thinks (and I concur with him), the bridges were erected and used by the permission or tolerance of The Chisholm, and that permission or tolerance be withdrawn, the result is not that the property of the bridges, or of any part of them, passes to The Chisholm, but that, if so desired, Lord Tweedmouth must remove them. I think, therefore, that this finding of the interlocutor should be recalled. But I concur in the next finding that the pursuers are entitled to close the bridges against traffic, under the conditions and reservations as concluded for, and that is practically all that they seek.

The next finding in the interlocutor, to which the reclaimer objected, is that in which the Lord Ordinary, "under the fifth conclusion, finds that there is a public right of way from points to be hereafter determined, the one between the bridge of Knockfin and the village of Tomich, and the other near Guisachan Old Mill, being part of the way, No. 1 of said conclusion."

It will be observed that the public right of way, which the Lord Ordinary has thus found, is the first part of the road claimed in that conclusion. That road is therein further defined as leading from Guisachan Old Mill to Cougie, and from Cougie by two branches, one leading to Glen Affaric and Kintail, and the other joining the county road, running through Glenmoriston. On record the right of way is said to have been acquired by the public by prescriptive use, as such rights of way are generally acquired. It is not said to have been acquired by dedication, or in any other way than that of prescriptive use. Now, by the law of Scotland, beyond question, a public road, capable of being acquired by prescriptive use, must be a thoroughfare, a road leading from one public place to another. The claim therefore to the road, as described in the conclusion of the action and on record, was a perfectly relevant claim, because it defined such a road. But if only that part of the road which the Lord Ordinary has found to be a public road had been claimed, it would not have been a relevant claim, because the road does not terminate in a public place, and I do not see how the Court could have done otherwise than dismiss such a claim as irrelevant. The Lord Ordinary, however, has sustained the claim, and it is necessary to consider the grounds on which he has done so, and to ascertain the facts on which he has proceeded.

It appears that the Strathglass District Road Trustees were constituted under a private Road Act obtained in 1830, and their minutes from 1831 to 1861 have been produced.

The names of two roads appear in these minutes—one the Guisachan Road, and the other the Cougie Road—the one being the road in question therein described as leading to a bridge over the burn at Guisachan. On crossing this bridge the road branches, one branch leading to Guisachan House, and the other to the Old Mill at Guisachan, and thence westwards to Cougie. This last branch is the Cougie Road. These roads appear in the minutes generally as separate roads, but sometimes they both pass under the name of the Guisachan Road. It further appears that these roads were treated exactly in the same way as any other district road under charge of the trustees. Money was regularly allocated for and expended upon their maintenance and repair down to the year 1858, after which no money was allocated or expended upon them.

The minutes of the Inverness-shire Road Trustees from 1803 to 1878 have also been produced, and these minutes shew that in 1814-15, 1818, and 1821 considerable sums were expended by the County Road Trustees on the Guisachan Road, and other evidence in process shews that money at these early dates was expended by the trustees on this road. Presumably, therefore, the road has been treated as a road under charge of the Road Trustees from a very early period.

But no money has been expended on the Guisachan Road by the trustees since 1858. Since 1860 it has formed the private avenue to Guisachan House, and has been maintained by Lord Tweedmouth.

In 1879 the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, was adopted by the county. In the list of roads taken over by the trustees, under section 41 of that Act, this road is not included. If it legally was a district road, it must be held to have been finally abandoned by the trustees, because it is enacted by that section that the roads, highways, and bridges on such list, and no other, shall be maintained and repaired out of the assessments levied under the Act. Presumably the road was not included in the list, because there was no such public use of it as to justify its retention as a district road.

Such being the facts, in my opinion, neither the Guisachan Road nor the Cougie Road was a public road, such as the Road Trustees were entitled to maintain out of the public assessments. The Guisachan Road led only to Guisachan House and the Old Meal Mill, where there were three or four houses only, and the Cougie Road led only to a shepherd's cottage, passing one or two houses on the way. Of this road the Lord Ordinary says that there never was a road, in the proper sense, from Guisachan Mill to Cougie, and that it was a mountain track not leading to any place, and not really required for public purposes. He says again that there was no population whose wants were to be supplied, because the path led only to a shepherd's house. This is all true, and it shews the kind of road on which the trustees considered it consistent with their duty to expend the public assessments. The Lord Ordinary has held, I think rightly, that this Cougie Road is not a public road, and therefore it follows that the expenditure upon it by the Road Trustees was illegal, and that there was no appropriation of it to the public.

But I am unable to see any such difference between this road and the Guisachan Road as can warrant me in coming to a different conclusion with regard to the latter from that at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived with regard to the former.

In the case of the Guisachan Road there was no doubt an existing road, upon which somewhat larger sums of money had been expended than on the Cougie Road, and there were a few more people living at the Guisachan Mill than at Cougie, to whom, and to whose friends when they came to see them, the road no doubt was an accommodation, and there is evidence that a neighbouring farmer occasionally, but only very occasionally, sent grain to be ground at the

No. 98.

Mar. 10, 1888.
Winans v. Lord Tweedmouth.

Old Mill. But these do not constitute the public, and there is no other evidence of public use, and that being so, I do not think there is any material difference between the two roads.

To hold such roads to be public roads would be a serious matter, because in that case the Road Trustees would be bound to maintain and repair them at the expense of the public, who would derive no corresponding benefit from the expenditure. I think it is a mistake to say that such roads were maintained for the benefit of the public. They were maintained for the benefit of the Guisachan estate, and the proprietors and tenants thereof, as, apparently, certain other roads in the district, in a similar situation, were maintained for the benefit of the respective proprietors on whose estates they were situated, who paid large assessments themselves, and who, no doubt, were very glad to get, if they could, a contribution from the assessments to assist in their maintenance, or, as appears to have been sometimes the case, to recoup themselves in sums they had previously expended on them. As regards the rights of the public, I do not think the Guisachan Road was any more appropriated to public purposes than the Cougie Road.

But even assuming that the Guisachan Road was a proper district road, and was properly maintained by the trustees, I should not draw from these facts the inference which the pursuers maintain must be drawn. They say that there must be presumed to have been a grant by the proprietor of an unconditional public right of way such as is presumed from prescriptive use. I think that the grant to be presumed is that the road was made over to the Road Trustees to be maintained as a district road, and subject to all the incidents attaching to such a road, including, for example, a right to apply to the trustees to have it closed, if there was no public use of it—a grant irrevocable, perhaps, but not unconditional. The Lord Ordinary remarks,—"It is a matter of general experience that the acquisition of a road by purchase is a very unusual thing, and that the more usual, if not universal, arrangement is that in which the proprietor gives the site of the road in consideration of the benefit to his estate of having a way made through it, while the Road Trustees undertake the cost of making and maintaining the road, or, as the case may be, of putting in repair and maintaining an existing road." That, probably, is a correct representation of what takes place in such cases. But what is to be the result if, as in this case, the Road Trustees abandon the road so given to them? If the consideration in respect of which the proprietor is presumed to give the road is that the Road Trustees are to undertake to repair and maintain the road, and if they, as the representatives of the public, refuse to continue that undertaking, then it appears to me that the road should revert to the proprietor in the like condition in which he gave it, and free from any right of way. It does not appear to me to be consistent with justice or equity that where one of the parties to the contract breaks it by nonfulfilment of the conditions, he should nevertheless enjoy the benefits of it unconditionally. If, therefore, this road was at one time a proper district road, I think that on its abandonment by the trustees it reverted to the proprietor free from any public right of way.

The Lord Ordinary farther says,—"Nothing that I decree will prejudice the right of the defender to apply to the County Road Trustees to have the road shut up, as being no longer necessary for the accommodation of the public should the facts warrant such an application." But the County Road Trustees have now no power to close this road, because it is not on the list of roads taken over by them, and it is only these roads, and no others, that are under their control and management.

No. 98.

Mar. 10, 1888.
Winans v. Lord Tweedmouth.

Moreover, at common law, the Road Trustees have no power whatever over a right of way acquired by the public such as the Lord Ordinary has decerned for in this case. They cannot close a road over which a public right of way has been acquired. Such a right of way, and a district road under statutory management are, in contemplation of law, two entirely different things.

Reference has been made to certain cases in which it has been found that if a superior or proprietor lays out a piece of ground, a road, a square, or a garden, for the use of his feuars or disponees, it is evidence of an appropriation of the subject to their use, which in conjunction with evidence of actual use may satisfy a Court of law that the subject was irrevocably appropriated to public uses so as to disentitle the owner to shut up the subject or convert it to other uses. I do not see, however, that cases between disponees and feuars, or superiors and vassals, in which the public are not concerned, can have any bearing on a question between a proprietor and the public such as this is.

Neither do I think that the class of cases referred to by the Lord Chancellor in Dyce v. Hay (1 Macq. 305), of village greens and playgrounds, presumed to be dedicated to the public, apply to this case. A different class of considerations arises in these cases from any we have here.

For these reasons I am of opinion that if the claim to this road had been competently raised on the record, it ought to have been repelled and the defender assoilzied from the whole of the fifth conclusion of the summons as regards road No. 1.

The only other question submitted for our consideration was this,—The Lord Ordinary finds that there is a public right of way for carriages, horses, and cattle, by the way No. 6, and by so much of the way No. 5 as connects Glenmoriston directly with No. 6, and ultimately with the Strathglass County Road.

The road thus found by the Lord Ordinary to exist is described in the summons as "a road leading from the road first above described (No. 1) at a point 220 yards or thereby south-west of the gatekeeper's lodge at Tomich, crossing the road No. 7 at a point 550 yards or thereby, north-east of Balcladdich, thence running as therein described."

It is to this part of the finding of the Lord Ordinary as to road No. 6 that the defender objects. The defender's admission with regard to the road is that there is a drove road from Glenmoriston to Tomich by road No. 6, by a line (shewn on a plan produced) which does not materially differ from the line claimed by the pursuers, until it reaches a point marked H on the plan, and then it is described as running "thereafter by the road leading past Guisachan steading to Tomich, also coloured brown on the said plan." This point H, as I understand, corresponds with the point described in the summons as being 550 yards north-east of Balcladdich.

The question therefore is whether the proper line of road No. 6, from this point to Tomich, is round by road No. 1, or by the road leading past Guisachan steading.

This is a question of very considerable importance to Lord Tweedmouth, because road No. 1 is now the avenue to his house, and by the findings in the interlocutor part of the drove road runs along a part of it.

It will be observed that there is no admission by the defender that the part of road No. 6 in dispute is the proper line of the drove road. It is not

No. 98.

Mar. 10, 1888.
Winans v.
Lord Tweedmouth.

contended that both alternative lines, from the point in question, are to be maintained—and there is little or no evidence as to which of the two is the more suitable line for the drover public. But the road claimed by the pursuers has been closed since 1860, without any objection from the portion of the public chiefly interested—the drovers, or from anyone else. I think it may be safely concluded that the alternative road has been found equally convenient by the public, and I think it may reasonably be supposed that Mr Winans does not altogether represent the public interest with regard to this road.

The question does not seem to have been brought under the notice of the Lord Ordinary; at least there is no allusion to it in his note. On the whole I think that the Court should find that the line of road is that admitted on record by the defender. This exhausts all the questions argued before us.

Lord Mure.—On the question raised as to the bridges, I concur substantially in the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived, very much on the same grounds as those which have now been explained by Lord Adam, and subject to the qualification which has been suggested in his opinion.

But as to the rights of way claimed, I cannot altogether agree with the Lord Ordinary. I differ from him in his finding as to right of way No. 1, in so far as he decides that there is a public right of way from Tomich to Guisachan Old Mill; which is not alleged in the record to have been a public place, and is now beyond doubt not a place of that description. The Lord Ordinary has, however, found this road to be a public right of way from Tomich to the Old Meal Mill, while he has negatived the claim to have it declared public beyond that place, and on to Cougie, Glenmoriston, and other places mentioned in the summons. As regards the portion from the Old Mill to Cougie and Glenmoriston, &c., I agree with the Lord Ordinary,—I think that there is no evidence sufficient to instruct the existence of any road beyond the Mill, with any pretentions to the character of a public right of way.

That being so the question as to road No. 1 is reduced to the portion which leads from Tomich to the Old Mill, and upon this I agree in the view Lord Adam has taken of the case. The Old Mill is not now a public place, for it has for long ceased to exist; and, in the view I take of the evidence, it never was a public place, in the sense in which that expression is understood in dealing with questions of this description. There being admittedly no road beyond the mill in the direction of Cougie, it was not a place the general public had anything to do with, or ever required to go to; and the road to it was merely for the use of those who required to go to the Mill—viz., the tenants on the Guisachan property or any other parties who required, or were entitled, to have their grain ground at the mill. There is, as I read the proof, no sufficient evidence of this road having been used for any other purpose; and as there is no public right of way beyond the Old Mill, it is difficult to see who the public were that were to use the road from Tomich to the Mill, except those who required to go to the Mill. In the most favourable view of the case, therefore, for the pursuer, the use, as I conceive, amounted to nothing more than the use of a servitude road to a mill; and when the mill ceased to exist, which it did many years ago, that use necessarily came to an end. That is the view I take of the evidence of use apart from the question raised upon the proof, though not upon the record, as to the effect of the expenditure made by the Road Trustees upon a part of the road for some years prior to 1861. Upon that point I concur in the opinion of Lord Adam.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have had the advantage of reading, and fully considering the opinion which has just been delivered by Lord Adam, and I entirely concur with his Lordship throughout.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor: Find and declare in terms of the second conclusion of the summons, and of the first alternative of the third conclusion of the summons, with the exception of the portions of the said conclusions relating to the bridge erected across the Leth Allt Burn, of which it is unnecessary to dispose, the said bridge having been removed by the defender since the date of the summons: Find and declare, with reference to the fifth conclusion of the summons, and of consent, (1) that there is a public right of way for passengers, horses, and cattle, and sheep from Glenmoriston to Strath Glass by the road marked No. 5 on the plan No. 6 of process, produced by the pursuers, from Glenmoriston to the point where it meets the road marked No. 6, and therefrom by the road marked No. 6 on said plan until it reaches the north side of the burn Allt Bal a Chladaich, and thence by the track or course coloured brown, and marked with the letters G H on the plan produced by the defender, No. 10 of process, and thereafter by the road leading past Guisachan steading to Tomich, also coloured brown on the said last-mentioned plan; and (2) that there is a public right of way for passengers, horses, and cattle, and sheep by the road from Corriemony, marked No. 7, to the point where it meets No. 7 b on the said plan, and thence past the Guisachan steading to Tomich by the road coloured brown on the said plan produced by the defender:* Quoad ultra assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the summons, and decern: Find neither party entitled to expenses," &c.

HAGART & BURN MURDOCH, W.S.—J. & A. PEDDIE & IVORY, W.S.—Agents.

DAVID WILKIE CLARKE, Petitioner.—D.-F. Mackintosh—C. S. Dickson.
MRS JANE JACK OR M'NAB AND OTHERS, Respondents.—
Sol.-Gen. Robertson—M'Kechnie.

Inhibition—Trust—Title to sue.—When a heritable bond is granted in favour of certain persons as trustees, the assignation of the beneficial interest to other persons does not affect the title of the trustees to use inhibition in their own names against the debtor in the bond.

Agent and Client—General mandate—Consent to use of inhibition.—Opinion, that an agent was entitled, under a general mandate to recover a debt, to use inhibition.

By bond and disposition in security A, on the narrative that he had borrowed £2000 from B and C, bound himself to repay the same to B and C, "as trustees for the said B and C." In security he disponed to them certain lands. Thereafter D acquired, by assignations in her favour, duly intimated to the trustees, the beneficial interest in the bond. B and C having raised letters of inhibition against A, as "trustees under the bond and disposition in security," and used inhibition thereon, A presented a petition for recall of the inhibition and letters, on the grounds (1) that D was the true creditor in the bond, and that B and C had therefore no title to raise the letters as trustees under

---

* The defender had not ultimately contended that the road No. 7 was private.

No. 99. — Mar. 10, 1888. Clarke v. M'Nab. — 1st Division. B.

the bond; and (2) that D's consent had not been obtained to the raising of the letters. It appeared that D had given to her agent authority to recover the debt, and she concurred with B and C in opposing the petition. The Court refused the prayer.

By bond and disposition in security, dated and registered in February 1876, David Wilkie Clarke and David Crabb granted them to have borrowed from Mrs Jane Jack or M'Nab and others the sum of £1600, and from James Cuthbert, Montrose, the further sum of £400, which sums, amounting together to £2000, they bound themselves to repay to Mrs Jane Jack or M'Nab, Martha M'Nab, John M'Nab, and James Cuthbert, as trustees or trustee for themselves, "as the lenders of the said sums of £1600 and £400, for their several interests, . . . and to the assignees of the said trustees or trustee, at the term of Whitsunday 1877."

In security the borrowers disponed to the lenders All and Whole certain heritable subjects in Dundee.

Subsequently Mrs Margaret Scott or Bell, residing in William Street, Blairgowrie, acquired the whole beneficial rights under the bond and disposition in security, and lands and others thereby disponed, and the sums of money thereby due, conform to assignations in her favour, granted by (1) James Cuthbert, dated 13th November 1877, and duly intimated to Jane Jack or M'Nab, Martha M'Nab, John M'Nab, and James Cuthbert, as trustees foresaid, as per minute endorsed thereon, dated 13th and 22d, both days of November 1877; and (2) by the said Jane Jack or M'Nab, Martha M'Nab, and John M'Nab, dated the 19th day of March 1883, and duly intimated on 20th and 21st March 1883.

The bond contained a clause stipulating that the disponees should be fully exonered and secured by receipts, discharges, &c. granted by the trustees.

In March 1883 Clarke and Crabb by another disposition in security disponed to Jane Jack or M'Nab, Martha and John M'Nab, and James Cuthbert, "as trustees or trustee for behoof of the said Margaret Scott or Bell, the party now in right of the beneficial interest in the said bond and disposition in security, lands and sums of money therein contained," additional lands in further security for the loan of £2000 above set forth.

By letters of inhibition, signeted 17th January 1888 (a notice of which was entered in the register the same day), at the instance of Mrs Jane Jack or M'Nab, &c. and James Cuthbert, "as trustees acting under the bond and disposition in security" first above set forth, Clarke was inhibited from selling or affecting his lands to the prejudice of the trustees anent the security and payment to them of the two sums of £1600 and £400. The letters were executed on 19th January, and in consequence of an error in the execution, again on 26th January 1888. The letters and execution were registered in the Register of Inhibitions on 30th January 1888.

On 1st February 1888 Clarke presented a petition to the First Division, in which he prayed for recall of the inhibitions and of the letters of inhibition.

The trustees, Mrs Jane Jack or M'Nab and others, lodged answers, to which Mrs Margaret Scott or Bell was also a party.

The above facts were not in dispute.

The petitioner averred,—"That at the date of the said inhibitions the respondents, other than the said Mrs Margaret Scott or Bell, possessed no right, title, or interest in or to the said bond and disposition in security, the sums due thereunder, or the properties thereby conveyed. The true creditor under the said bond and disposition in security is the respondent Mrs Margaret Scott or Bell, and the said letters of inhibition were taken,

No. 99.

Mar. 10, 1888.
Clarke v. M'Nab.

and the said inhibitions used without her knowledge or consent, and contrary to her wishes. The said inhibitions are therefore inept and illegal, and proceed at the instance of persons who have no right, title, or interest to recover the sums above mentioned from the petitioner, or to grant a discharge therefor upon payment."

The respondents averred,—"It is averred in the petition that the respondent Mrs Margaret Scott or Bell had no knowledge of the registration of the bond and charge thereon or of the letters of inhibition, and it is said that this was done without her knowledge or consent. Mrs Margaret Scott or Bell is an infirm old lady, and her affairs are managed by Mr Cumming, solicitor, Bank Street, Dundee. Mr Cumming has her general authority to act in her interests as he thinks proper. The petitioner called upon the respondents Mrs M'Nab and Mrs Margaret Scott or Bell and endeavoured to persuade these ladies not to call up the loan. The respondent Mrs Margaret Scott or Bell referred him to her law-agent, Mr Cumming, to whom she, on 7th January 1888, sent a letter in the following terms:—'Mr Clarke called upon me on Wednesday, and I just told him you were my man of business, and referred him to you. I quite approve of what you are doing in calling up the money.'"

Argued for the petitioner;—The letters of inhibition were bad, (1) Ex facie because from the instance it appeared that the trustees raised the letters as trustees under the bond and disposition in security of 1876. Under that deed they were themselves the creditors, while, from the deeds subsequent to the bond, it appeared that they were in point of fact only trustees for Mrs Bell, who held the beneficial interest. The letters thus proceeded on a misnomer, and were therefore bad.[1] The objection was purely technical, but the rules with regard to diligences were very strict. (2) Mrs Bell did not consent to the raising of the letters. The course adopted by the respondents in proceeding on the personal obligation when they might have called up the bond was unusual,[2] and did not fall under the ordinary mandate to the agent. There ought to be inquiry as to her consent being given or withheld when the letters were raised.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The trustees under the bond were the proper parties to enforce the diligence. Their right and title to do so was set forth in the bond, and they gave all the information the petitioner was entitled to when they set forth that deed. The petitioner had no concern with the subsequent transmission of the beneficial right among the beneficiaries; he was only concerned to know that under the bond the trustees had a right and title to get the money from him. (2) The petitioner's averments as to Mrs Bell's consent were irrelevant, if the proper creditors were the persons acting as trustees under the bond. No inquiry ought, therefore, to be allowed. Such matters of business as this, particularly as Mrs Bell was old, and not well acquanted with business matters, fell properly under the general mandate to a man of business. Further Mrs Bell had adopted the proceedings and was here as one of the respondents.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not think that either of the objections to the letters of inhibition is good. The first is that the letters are ex facie bad in themselves because they describe the trustees as matter of fact to be trustees for themselves and not for Mrs Bell. The reason why I think that objection bad is that the trustees use these letters simply as trustees under a certain deed, the bond and disposition in security. That is their title and right as set forth in the instance

---

[1] Walker v. Hunter, Dec 17, 1853, 16 D. 226, 26 Scot. Jur. 118.

[2] M'Whirter v. M'Culloch's Trustees, July 9, 1887, 14 R. 918.

No. 99.

Mar. 10, 1888.
Clarke v. M'Nab.

of the letters. They were bound to recite the deed under which they were acting, and they quite accurately did so. They were not bound to give further information than that they were trustees under the deed, and as such were creditors of the party against whom inhibition was sought. No doubt the inhibition proceeded entirely on the personal obligation contained in the bond, but that may be enforced just as well as the heritable security, and both may be enforced at the same time. I cannot then see that the respondents were bound to give any further information than that they were in titulo to recover, and to set out their title.

As regards the second objection I do not think that it either can be held to be good. In the first place Mrs Bell is here as a party supporting the inhibition, and the letters therefore are adopted by her as being for her benefit; but in the second place I cannot affirm the proposition of the Dean of Faculty that in using this inhibition the respondents were resorting to such an extraordinary remedy that it required any special mandate from the client to her man of business. The old lady, who was not much acquainted with business matters, would I think have been much puzzled if it had been put to her whether this remedy should be adopted. She would very naturally have answered her man of business, "You are acting for me, and it is a matter for your consideration." It is a matter which, I think, just falls under the general mandate to a man of business. I am therefore for refusing the petition.

Lord Adam.—It seems to me that the petitioner is debtor to the trustees under the original bond, and nothing else. The subsequent transmissions of the beneficial right do not affect the question at all. The trustees have the sole title and right to discharge the original bond, and therefore it was correct to set out that title in the letters of inhibition, and it was not necessary to set forth the subsequent transmissions among the beneficiaries.

On the other point also I concur. Mrs Bell is here as one of the respondents, and that I think precludes the idea of any further inquiry.

Lord Kinnear.—I concur in what your Lordships have said, and think the petition must be refused.

Lord Mure and Lord Shand were absent.

The Court refused the petition.

J. Smith Clark, S.S.C.—Watt & Anderson, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 100.

Mar. 10, 1888.
Bertram's Trustees v. Matheson's Trustee.

Alexander Bennett M'Grigor and Others (Mr and Mrs Bertram's Marriage-Contract Trustees), First Parties.—G. R. Gillespie.

Alexander Bennett M'Grigor (Mrs Matheson's Testamentary Trustee), Second Party.—Fleming.

Mrs Margaret Forrester or Robson and Others, Third Parties.—Fleming.

The Glasgow Western Infirmary and Others, Fourth Parties.—Asher—Napier.

Mrs Margaret Merry or Forrester and Others (Mrs Bertram's Heirs in mobilibus), Fifth Parties.—Balfour—Low.

Succession—Testament and subsequent marriage-contract—Revocation.—In 1879 a lady, then a widow, executed a settlement by which she conveyed her

No. 100.

Mar. 10, 1888.
Bertram's Trustees v. Matheson's Trustee.

whole estates to executors, directing them to pay certain legacies, specific and general, and to divide the residue among three charitable institutions named. In 1886 she entered into a second marriage, and by antenuptial contract on the occasion of that marriage she, on her part, conveyed her whole estate, heritable and moveable, then belonging to her, or which she might acquire during the subsistence of the marriage, to trustees, who were directed to hold the estate for her behoof in liferent, and to hold "the capital of the said estate for behoof of such person or persons and on such terms and payable at such periods as the second party may appoint by any writing under her hand, however informally executed, and failing such appointment the trustees shall hold the said capital for behoof of the second party's nearest heirs in mobilibus whomsoever." The lady died about a year after her marriage, survived by her husband, and leaving the settlement of 1879, but no other writing except the marriage-contract. The capital of the estate had been delivered to the marriage-contract trustees, but at her death the lady was in possession of a considerable accumulation of income, paid partly before and partly after her marriage, and of some jewellery and personal belongings.

In a question between the beneficiaries under the deed of 1879 and the lady's heirs in mobilibus, as beneficiaries under the marriage-contract, held (diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) that the deed of 1879 was not effectual either as an independent settlement or as an appointment under the marriage-contract, but was absolutely revoked by the marriage-contract, which on a sound construction was to be taken as a settlement of the lady's entire estate as existing at her death, and that her heirs in mobilibus, as legatees under the marriage-contract, had right thereto.

2D DIVISION.
M.

ON 5th November 1879 Mrs Jessie Forrester or Matheson, widow of John Matheson, merchant in Glasgow, executed a testamentary settlement by which she conveyed to Mr A. B. M'Grigor and another, as executors, "All and Sundry the whole means, estate, and effects, heritable and moveable, real and personal, which may belong to me at the time of my decease, together with the writs, titles, and vouchers thereof." After directing payment of her debts the testator, in the second place, provided "for payment and fulfilment of such further legacies or bequests, instructions or directions, as I may leave, bequeath, or give by any codicil hereto, or by any writing under my hand (however informally executed or defective) shewing my wishes and intentions." In the third place she left certain articles of jewellery to each of two sisters. In the fourth place she left legacies of £100 each to two charitable purposes, and similar legacies to each of two nephews. She then, in the fifth and last place, directed her executors "to pay over the residue and remainder of my said estate, in equal portions, to and among the Glasgow Western Infirmary, the Glasgow Night Asylum for the Houseless, and the Glasgow Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals."

On 18th September 1886 Mrs Matheson was married to William Bertram of Kersewell, Lanarkshire.

By antenuptial contract executed on the occasion of this marriage Mr Bertram, as first party, made over to his wife in liferent, in the event of his predecease, the mansion-house of Kersewell, the shootings over the lands of Kersewell, and the furniture, plate, and wines in the house, with the option to her of taking an annuity of £300 in lieu of these provisions. Mrs Matheson on her part, as second party, assigned and disponed to Mr A. B. M'Grigor and others, as trustees, "All and Sundry, the whole estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, of whatever nature or description, or wherever situated, now belonging to her, or to which she may hereafter have right or succeed, or which she may acquire in any manner of way during the subsistence of the said intended marriage, which estate shall be held and applied by the said trustees for the ends, uses, and purposes following, viz.:—In the first place, in payment of the expenses of the trust hereby created: In

No. 100.

Mar. 10, 1888. Bertram's Trustees v. Matheson's Trustee.

the second place, the trustees shall hold the said estate for behoof of the second party in liferent for her liferent alimentary use allenarly, during all the days and years of her life: And in the third place, the trustees shall hold the capital of the said estate for behoof of such person or persons and on such terms and payable at such periods as the second party may appoint by any writing under her hand, however informally executed, and failing such appointment, the trustees shall hold the said capital for behoof of the second party's nearest heirs in mobilibus whomsoever." The foregoing provisions were declared to be in full satisfaction of the respective legal rights of succession of the intended spouses.

Mrs Bertram died on 10th June 1887, survived by her husband.

On her death the question arose whether her settlement of 1879 had been wholly, or to any extent, revoked by the marriage-contract of 1886. A special case was accordingly presented. The parties were (1) the marriage-contract trustees; (2) Mr A. B. M'Grigor, as the surviving executor under the settlement of 1879; (3) the specific and general legatees under that settlement, other than the two charities; (4) the two charities and the residuary legatees under the same settlement; (5) Mrs Bertram's heirs in mobilibus.

The case stated (in addition to the foregoing facts),—"The capital of Mrs Bertram's estate was transferred to, and is now held by the parties of the first part in terms of the said contract of marriage. It consists of securities to the value of £13,125, or thereby. Besides this sum the deceased had in bank, or otherwise under her own immediate control, at the date of her death, sums amounting to £1212, or thereby, representing accumulations of income from her said estate, which had been paid to her partly prior and partly subsequently to her marriage with Mr Bertram, and there has accrued certain income on her first husband's estate" (of which she had the liferent), the details of which it is unnecessary here to give. "The deceased was also at her death possessed of a large amount of household furniture and some jewellery of considerable value."

The second, third, and fourth parties maintained (1) that the settlement of 5th November 1879 was effectual and subsisting, notwithstanding the terms of the subsequently executed contract of marriage, or alternatively (2) that a distinction fell to be made between the £13,125 of capital above referred to and the income (or at least so much thereof as was paid to the deceased subsequently to her marriage with Mr Bertram) and accumulations of income, and that the conveyance in the contract of marriage included only the said capital sum of £13,125, and that the settlement was effectual and subsisting quoad the other property, or at least quoad so much thereof as was acquired or became due to the deceased subsequently to her second marriage.

The fifth parties maintained that the marriage-contract entirely superseded and revoked the previously executed settlement, and that they, either under the marriage-contract or as heirs in mobilibus ab intestato of the deceased, were entitled to her whole estate, including the accumulations.

The questions of law (omitting two bearing on details not necessary to be here mentioned) were "(1) Has the settlement of 1879 been revoked by the said marriage-contract, or is the said settlement subsisting and effectual to any, and if so, to what extent? (2) Do the accumulations of Mrs Bertram's income, or at least so much thereof as has been paid to her subsequent to her said marriage, and the income due to her for the period from the last term of payment to the date of her death, or any part thereof, and the household furniture and jewellery referred to, fall under the marriage-contract, and if not who is entitled thereto?"

Argued for the fourth parties;—(1) The primary object of Mrs Bertram's side of the marriage-contract was to protect her estate against her husband. The deed was intended to subsist during the marriage only, and was not, strictly speaking, a testamentary writing of Mrs Bertram's, although it contained a conditional provision in favour of her heirs in mobilibus. But (2) taking it to be a testamentary deed, it did not revoke the prior deed of 1879. It did not contain an express revocation, and it could not be construed as containing an implied revocation, for there was no complete inconsistency between the two deeds, inasmuch as the marriage-contract did not deal with Mrs Bertram's entire estate. There was conveyed to the trustees only such estate as already belonged to her, or as she might acquire during the subsistence of the marriage, and it was an accident that she predeceased her husband; but taking it that the conveyance was in the actual event in form universal, similar clauses had been construed not to include life interests and annuities,[1] and the same principle applied to jewellery and similar personal belongings. That construction was a plain inference from the terms of the marriage-contract here, which drew a marked contrast between liferent and "capital." But (3) the deed of 1879 being unrevoked, its provisions were preferable to the destination to heirs in mobilibus in the marriage-contract, and the marriage-contract trustees held the estate for the purposes of the prior deed; in the first place, because the provisions of the prior deed were special, and the destination to heirs in mobilibus was general;[2] and secondly, because the deed of 1879 was, notwithstanding its date, to be taken as an appointment in terms of the marriage-contract, on the general principle that a testamentary instrument spoke as at the date of the testator's death. "May" appoint did not necessarily imply futurity.[3] (4) In any event, the deed of 1879 regulated the disposal of estate not dealt with under the marriage-contract, i.e., the accumulations of income and the jewellery.

The third parties took no part in the argument, having no substantial interest to contest the claims of the fifth parties, they being themselves of the next of kin of the deceased.

Argued for the fifth parties;—(1) The first question was, Did the marriage-contract revoke the prior deed not only as regarded administration, but also as regarded beneficial right? Now, in the first place, this lady's side of the later deed, though it was a marriage-contract, was plainly testamentary. It professed to dispose of her estate after her death. But if it was a testamentary deed, its fair construction was that it dealt with her entire estate. "Capital" simply meant the whole estate of which she might die possessed. The Court would not construe such a word strictly.[4] If there had been no prior deed, the construction maintained on the other side would never have been listened to, for on that assumption it would have resulted in partial intestacy. The conveyance to the trustees was no doubt only of the estate the lady already possessed or might acquire during the

---

[1] Boyd's Trustees v. Boyd, July 13, 1877, 4 R. 1082; Young's Trustees, May 22, 1885, 12 R. 968; In re Mainwaring's Settlement, June 1866, L. R., 2 Eq. 487.

[2] Weir v. Steill, Feb. 7, 1745, M. 11,359; Flemings v. Fleming, Dec. 3, 1800, M. App. Implied Will, No. 1; Allans v. Sinclair, Nov. 13, 1776, 2 Pat. App. 403; Dove v. Smith, May 31, 1827, 5 S. 734; Grant v. Stoddart, Feb. 27, 1849, 11 D. 860, 21 Scot. Jur. 241, rev. June 28, 1852, 24 Scot. Jur. 555, 1 Macq. 163.

[3] Hyslop v. Maxwell's Trustees, Feb. 11, 1834, 12 S. 413; Baird v. Jaap, July 15, 1856, 18 D. 1246, 28 Scot. Jur. 626.

[4] Dunsmure v. Dunsmure, Nov. 22, 1879, 7 R. 261.

No. 100.
—
Mar. 10, 1888.
Bertram's Trustees v. Matheson's Trustee.

marriage, but in the actual event, in consequence of her predeceasing her husband, it was de facto a universal conveyance. If, then, the marriage-contract dealt with the entire estate, it, on the ground of absolute inconsistency, revoked the deed of 1879. But (2) if the deed of 1879 was not revoked, it dealt only with such estate as was not conveyed to the trustees. It was said that the trustees must administer the estate conveyed to them according to the prior deed, in the first place, because the provisions of that deed were special, whereas the destination to heirs in the marriage-contract was general; but that doctrine had no place here where the prior deed was a universal settlement. Secondly, it was said that the prior deed was operative as being an appointment in terms of the marriage-contract. If that was what this lady meant, she had taken a singularly unhappy way of expressing herself, for her language could refer only to an appointment to be made in the future, and not to an already existing appointment. It was important to observe that the words were not writing which she "may leave," but terms which she "may appoint." Had the former expression been used there might have been some foundation for the view of the other side, on the authority of Baird Preston's case,[1] to which they referred. As it was, the question being one of intention, the intention of this lady was plain.

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—This case raises some questions which are not without interest. The substantial question is, whether a settlement executed by the late Mrs Bertram in 1879, when she was a widow, still subsists, notwithstanding the provisions of a marriage-contract, subsequently entered into between her and her second husband.

The facts are very clearly and shortly stated in the case. Mrs Bertram was formerly married to Mr Matheson, a Glasgow merchant, who died prior to 1879. In 1879 Mrs Bertram, or as she then was, Mrs Matheson, executed a settlement which professed to be a universal settlement conveying the universitas of her estate to executors, for the purposes mentioned in the deed. These purposes were substantially to pay certain legacies detailed in the deed, and then to divide the residue of the estate among three charities in Glasgow which were named. Six years afterwards she became engaged to be married to Mr Bertram, the proprietor of an estate in Lanarkshire, and upon the occasion of that marriage she executed what is properly speaking not a will but a marriage-contract. It is dated 18th September 1886, and also purports to be a universal settlement conveying the universitas of her estate, present or future, to trustees for the purposes therein mentioned. These purposes, shortly stated, were, in the first place, to secure her own liferent of the estate, and secondly, on her death, and failing any appointment in writing under her own hand, the trustees were directed to pay over the residue to her next of kin. The lady did not survive her marriage long, not more than a year I think; and the question now is whether the settlement of her estate in the marriage-contract does or does not supersede or revoke the settlement which she made in 1879 before her second marriage.

My opinion is that the settlement in the marriage-contract does supersede entirely the previous settlement of 1879, and I shall briefly state my reasons for that opinion.

It has been contended by the parties who are interested to maintain that the

---

[1] Baird v. Jaap, July 15, 1856, 18 D. 1246, 28 Scot. Jur. 626.

No. 100.

Mar. 10, 1888.
Bertram's Trustees v. Matheson's Trustee.

previous settlement still subsists, in the first place, that there is no express revocation of it in the marriage-contract, and that the dispositions in the previous settlement, being special dispositions, cannot presumably be revoked by a general disposition in a later deed; and, secondly, it is said that the clause in the marriage-contract by which Mrs Bertram reserved to herself a power of appointment contains words which by their construction entitle us to read into it the residuary clause in the settlement of 1879.

In regard to the first point, I do not think that the doctrine contended for is applicable here. This is a case where both the settlements are universal, and where that is so it is an established rule that unless there are some elements to the contrary the second universal settlement revokes the first. They cannot both stand. I do not think, therefore, that this belongs to the category of cases to which the well-known rule regarding prior special destinations applies.

The second point, which was very learnedly argued to us the other day, is, whether the provision in the marriage-contract reserving right to Mrs Bertram to alter the provisions of that deed by any writing under her hand imports into the marriage-contract the provisions of the settlement of 1879. I am strongly of opinion that it does not, and on these grounds—In the first place, the marriage-contract being a universal settlement the result of it must be to recall the prior settlement of 1879. The two deeds cannot stand together, and therefore it is plain that when this lady reserved to herself the right to dispose of the estate to such "person or persons, and on such terms, and payable at such periods as she may appoint by any writing under her hand, however informally executed," she could not possibly intend to import into her deed the very settlement she had by implication just revoked. It is a question of intention, and if I were asked with what intention that clause in the marriage-contract was introduced by this lady I should certainly reply that she plainly intended to hand over her estate to her next of kin, unless in the future she should make some other settlement of her affairs. This is what I infer from the words of the deed, but independently of that I am not unmoved by the facts connected with the case. I think it is impossible to imagine that this lady, when she was about to be married a second time, intended in any way to repeat the provisions of her former will. It is plain that in 1879 the claims of the charities she intended to favour were principally in her mind. She was not then in her first youth, and it was perhaps natural that, not anticipating a second marriage, she should have had her mind directed in that way, but of course when afterwards she became engaged to be married her interests were altered. The interests of her husband had to be consulted, and although she does not in the marriage-contract divest herself of her estate in any way, it is not to be supposed that when she entered into the marriage-contract she intended to make no provision in the future for her husband out of her estate. It is said no doubt that the date of a testament must be taken to be as at the date of the testator's death. That is quite true, but only in a general sense. In this instance, I think, it would be very singular if a settlement which was executed eight years before this lady's death should be taken as later in date than a marriage-contract entered into on the occasion of her second marriage seven years afterwards.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion in the first place that the marriage-contract constituted a revocation of the prior settlement; and secondly, that the provision in the marriage-contract reserving to the lady the right to alter her settlement by any writing under her own hand refers solely to any writing that she might make subsequent to her marriage, and is not to be construed to include a settlement she had made previously. I think further that the marriage-contract trustees take everything that belonged to her at the date of her death.

No. 100.

Mar. 10, 1888.

Bertram's Trustees v. Matheson's Trustee.

Lord Young.—I am of the same opinion, and substantially on the same grounds.

The questions before us regard the succession to the estate of the late Mrs Bertram, and they depend on a consideration of two deeds. One of these is a proper will executed by her in 1879 when she was a widow, and the other is an antenuptial marriage-contract executed in 1886 on the eve of her second marriage.

I think the first and leading question here is this,—Is the marriage-contract of 1886 to any extent, and if it is, to what extent, also a will or testamentary instrument? If it is not a will or testamentary instrument at all, then whatever else it may effect it does not interfere with the deed of 1879. If it is to any extent a will or testamentary instrument, then to that extent it must supersede the provisions of the former testamentary instrument of 1879.

It is rather a singular marriage-contract taken as a whole. The provision made by the husband—by the gentleman intending to be the lady's husband—in favour of his future wife is of the liferent after his death of his mansion-house of Kersewell in Lanarkshire, and its equipments, including a liferent use of the cellar of wine. That is the only provision by him in favour of his wife, there being an option given to her to take instead of the furnished house and the wine-cellar an annuity of £300. But I need not dwell on that part of the deed, because it never came into operation, as Mrs Bertram died only a few months after the marriage, survived by her husband. By the other part of the deed, with which we have here to deal, the wife on her side conveyed to certain trustees "All and Sundry the whole estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, of whatever nature or description, or wherever situated, now belonging to her, or to which she may hereafter have right or succeed, or which she may acquire in any manner of way during the subsistence of the said intended marriage." We very properly had an argument addressed to us as to what part of her estate this clause included, whether the whole, or if not the whole, then what part, but it was admitted, and is indeed clear, that at least it included her property to the value of £13,125. Whether it included anything else is a question which I shall afterwards consider. This sum at least, invested and secured, was put into the hands of the trustees. The question is, what were the trustees to do with it? The clause goes on,—"Which estate," of £13,125 at least, "shall be held and applied by the said trustees for the ends, uses, and purposes following,—In the first place, in payment of the expenses of the trust hereby created; in the second place, the trustees shall hold the said estate for behoof of the second party in liferent for her liferent alimentary use allenarly during all the days and years of her life; and in the third place, the trustees shall hold the capital of the said estate for behoof of such person or persons, and on such terms, and payable at such periods as the second party may appoint by any writing under her hand, however informally executed, and failing such appointment, the trustees shall hold the said capital for behoof of the second party's nearest heirs in mobilibus whomsoever."

Now, it is to me a startling thing to hear it suggested that such a clause is anything but a will or testamentary instrument. What it applies to is another question, but that it applies to all property put into the hands of the trustees is certain. That was conveyed to them in trust to dispose of according to the purposes specified in the deed, one of which relates to the disposal of the capital after the death of the lady. Suppose that there was no direction to the trustees to hold it for any person who may be named in any writing under the second party's hand, but merely that they were to hold it for the second party's heirs in mobilibus whomsoever. She then would give her estate to trustees directing them to pay the estate to herself in liferent, and on her death to her heirs in mobilibus whomsoever in fee. Is that not a testament? No doubt it is a marriage-contract in this respect, that her husband contracts that her estate shall not pass to him by virtue of the marriage, but shall remain her property to be dealt with as she pleases. Had that not been its effect it would certainly have put an end to the will of 1879 most effectually. But as it is, I think this is a testamentary direction as to the disposal of this lady's property after her death. I can see nothing in the objection that the beneficiaries are not persons more particularly chosen than "the second party's heirs in mobilibus whomsoever." If the direction had been after the lady's death, if she did not otherwise appoint, to hold for behoof of A B, or of one of the charities mentioned in the deed of 1879, would that not have been a testamentary direction? If I had to define the term testamentary direction, I do not think that I could give a better definition than that it is an expression of the owner's will as to how his property is to be disposed of on his death. And that is just what we have here.

This, therefore, is a testamentary instrument with respect to everything to which it applies ; but, and this is an important consideration in this case, it is in different terms from, and is later in date than, the settlement of 1879. Therefore to the extent to which it goes it must necessarily supersede that settlement. But then we have the words in the marriage-contract, to which I have already alluded, that the wife's property is to go to anyone in whose favour she may have made an appointment by any writing under her hand, and it is only failing such appointment that the trustees are to hold the estate for the nearest heirs in mobilibus, or as it might have been, for one of the charitable societies, or for a favoured individual. We are asked to construe these words in such a way that the deed of 1879 should be taken as such an appointment by a writing under her hand. The argument is that this testamentary instrument—as I take this clause of the marriage-contract to be—is to be construed in this way,—"In the event of my making no appointment to the contrary, you are to pay the capital to my nearest heirs in mobilibus whomsoever, but I forgot to mention that I have already made an appointment to the contrary ; you will give effect to that unless I alter it." I cannot read the deed so. I think that it is a strained and unnatural construction. I should almost say a nonsensical one. In my opinion the plain meaning of the clause is this,—"My mind at present is to give the residue of my property to my nearest heirs in mobilibus on my death, but I may change my mind, and if I do, I wish you, my trustees, to pay attention to the alteration, and deal with my estate according to any settlement I may leave, however informal." The conclusion I have come to is that the deed of 1879 is not an appointment, and cannot be regarded as such, under the terms of the marriage-contract.

I now proceed to consider the only other question, which is whether this clause with which I have been dealing applies to the whole of this lady's estate

No. 100.

Mar. 10, 1888.
Bertram's Trustees v. Matheson's Trustee.

or only to part. My opinion is that it applies to the whole. In terms it does literally so apply, and there is in this case no room for the considerations that were of more or less weight in some of the cases that were referred to by Mr Asher, arising from the circumstance that the lady was alienating her estate and putting it beyond her power. Here there is no alienation, she does not contemplate relinquishing her power over her property until her death. I see no inducement to the Court, therefore, to limit the operation of this clause of the marriage-contract. Let us refer to the words again,—"All and Sundry the whole estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, and of whatever nature or description, or wherever situated, now belonging to her." The word "now" means at the date of the deed in 1886. That includes everything she then had; not that it would lead to the extravagance of the trustees coming and taking possession of her personal belongings or her unexpended income. I daresay the trustees would, upon any proper application, have been restrained from any such interference, as being utterly contrary to the purpose for which this conveyance was granted. But for all that it is a conveyance to the trustees of all the property she then possessed. Then the clause goes on, "or to which she may hereafter have right, or succeed, or which she may acquire in any manner of way during the subsistence of the said intended marriage." Now, everything she died possessed of must either have been her property at the date of the deed in 1886, or must have come to her between that date and her death. If that is so the conclusion is, I think, irresistible that her entire estate is regulated by the marriage-contract. I am not speaking of the power of the trustees to take possession, I am merely considering her will with respect to her property. Her will in regard to that, unless altered by some writing under her own hand, however informal, was that the trustees were to pay it over to her heirs in mobilibus. I think that this applies not only to the £13,000, but to her whole property at the time of her death.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the will of 1879 is altogether superseded by the will of 1886,—I call it a will because I think that it is none the less a will that the clauses composing it are included in what is called a marriage-contract, and is in some respects a marriage-contract.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The question is whether Mrs Bertram's settlement of 1879 was revoked by her marriage-contract in 1886.

I may notice, though in my view it is not very material, that the marriage-contract is not a universal settlement. It only conveyed the estate which belonged to Mrs Bertram at the time of her marriage, or which she might acquire during its subsistence. It is only by the accident of her having predeceased her husband that it can in any sense be regarded as a universal settlement, and it is a question whether in any case it can include the savings from accruing income.

The primary purpose of the marriage-contract is to protect the estate of the wife during the subsistence of the marriage. But for this it would never have come into existence. It is, however, also a will inasmuch as in a certain event Mrs Bertram gives the estate thereby conveyed to her heirs in mobilibus. But the direction in their favour is only to take effect if she does not otherwise appoint by a writing under her hand. I regard that as meaning that they are take if

No. 100.

Mar. 10, 1888.
Bertram's Trustees v. Matheson's Trustee.

she does not leave a will. I cannot hold that it indicates any intention of revoking a subsisting settlement.

If the marriage-contract had not contained any direction in favour of heirs, I do not think that it was disputed that the settlement of 1879 would have regulated Mrs Bertram's succession. I fail to see how by reason of the existence of the direction the marriage-contract can be held to have any revoking power when the gift to heirs is expressly postponed to any appointment which she may make, or, as I construe these words, to any will which she may leave.

It was argued that the only appointment which could have legal efficacy was an appointment made after the date of the marriage-contract. I do not think that this view is sound. The words are, as she "may appoint by any writing under her hand." I think that these words apply to and include any writing which she may leave at her death expressive of her will, whatever the date may be. All testamentary writings speak as at death, and unless the words of the marriage-contract necessarily exclude prior writings, which I think they do not, I am of opinion that the settlement of 1879 is the unrevoked will of Mrs Bertram, and that it must receive effect, either apart from the marriage-contract altogether, or as an appointment which takes precedence of the direction in favour of heirs in mobilibus.

THE interlocutor, in so far as it answered the questions of law above stated, was in these terms:—"Find (1) that the settlement of 1879 has been revoked by the said marriage-contract between William Bertram, Esq., and Mrs Jessie Merry Forrester or Matheson, dated 18th September 1886; (2) that the accumulations of Mrs Bertram's income and the household furniture and jewellery referred to in the special case fall under the marriage-contract."

MACKENZIE & KERMACK, W.S.—J. & A. PEDDIE & IVORY, W.S.—MACKENZIE & BLACK, W.S. —DONALD MACKENZIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 101.

Mar. 13, 1888.
Brown's Trustees v. Brown.

DAVID NICOLSON AND OTHERS (Brown's Trustees), Pursuers and Real Raisers (Reclaimers).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Patten.
MRS KATHERINE BROWN, Objector (Respondent).—Rhind—Hay.

Trust—Administration—Title to sue.—In a multiplepoinding brought by testamentary trustees for the distribution of an estate, one of the beneficiaries stated as an objection to the condescendence of the fund in medio that it did not include a sum of £600 said to be due to the estate by one of the trustees. In answer the trustees produced a discharge granted by the truster to the alleged debtor, and explained that they were satisfied they could not prosecute the claim with any hope of success, but they offered to allow the objector to sue in their names on his finding security for the expenses of the proceedings. The Court repelled the objection, holding that this was all the trustees could be required to do.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Fraser.
B.

BY mutual disposition, dated 7th April 1880, Mr and Mrs Thomas Brown disponed their whole estate, heritable and moveable, at the death of the predeceasing spouse, to David Nicolson and two others, as trustees for the purpose, inter alia, of paying the liferent to the surviving spouse, and on the death of the survivor for the purpose, inter alia, of dividing the residue among the children of the marriage, or their issue. Mrs Brown died on 14th July 1884, and her husband on 18th April 1886, survived by seven children and the family of an eighth child.

In a multiplepoinding brought by the trustees in July 1887, objections were lodged to the condescendence of the fund by Mrs Thomas Brown junior, the widow of one of the children, for herself and children. She stated that at Mrs Brown's death a sum of £600 was due to Mr Brown by Mr Nicolson, one of the trustees, and that this sum fell to be included in the estate.

No. 101. — Mar. 13, 1888. Brown's Trustees v. Brown.

The trustees in answer explained that Mr Brown had been in the habit of depositing money with Mr Nicolson, and that at the date of Mrs Brown's death the sum so deposited amounted to £600, but that in August 1884 a settlement was made between Mr Nicolson and Mr Brown, by which the former discharged a claim he had against Mr Brown under a letter of guarantee, granted by Mr and Mrs Brown on 12th July 1884, for £300, 4s. 8d., and Mr Nicolson paid the balance of £299, 15s. 4d. The trustees produced in process the discharge for the £600 then granted by Mr Brown to Mr Nicolson, and stated that the £299, 15s. 4d. had been invested by Mr Brown in shares subsequently realised by the trustees. There were allegations by the objector that Mr and Mrs Brown had been induced to sign the letter of guarantee of 12th July 1884 under false representations, and there were other averments pointing to a reduction both of that document and of the discharge. It was further denied that the £299, 15s. 4d. was applied as stated by the trustees.

The trustees stated that they had given very careful consideration to the matter, and were satisfied that they had no claim against Mr Nicolson.

The Lord Ordinary (Fraser), on 22d February 1888, allowed the parties a proof of their averments, the objector to lead in the proof.

The trustees reclaimed, and argued;—Even assuming that the objector's averments were relevant, they could not be required to go to proof on a question of the kind with a third party, where they were satisfied they had no good ground of action, and at the expense of the trust-estate. They were willing to give the objector their instance, and let her fight the matter out herself on her finding security for the expenses of such a proceeding.[1] Beyond that they could not be asked to go, especially as the objector's share in the residue was more than swallowed up by her debt to it, composed of advances and interest. The documents which had been produced were ex facie quite regular and complete. Further, the objector was the only one of eight beneficiaries who had raised the objection.

The objector argued that she had set forth a relevant case as against the trustees, and that in any view she should not be obliged to pay the expenses of proceeding against Mr Nicolson.

Lord President.—The complaint here is that the trustees have failed to reduce into possession £600 which it is alleged is owing to the trust-estate. That is a perfectly relevant statement, but, without going into detail, I may say that ex facie of the documents produced it is plain that the debt was extinguished immediately after the death of Mrs Brown. The trustees are therefore of opinion, and indeed say that they know, that they have no claim for this £600, and decline to sue Nicolson for it. The objector is not satisfied with this answer, and of course if she wishes to try the question at her own expense, she is entitled to do so.

But then the trustees say that the state of the facts is that she is trying to have the question tried at the expense of the trust-estate, that is at the expense of the other beneficiaries. I think she is not entitled to do that, and whether the question is to be tried under this allowance of proof or not, it ought not to be tried at the expense of the estate. The mode in which it is proposed

---

[1] Duke and Duchess of Buckingham v. Breadalbane's Trustees, Jan. 17, 1844, 6 D. 403.

No. 101.

Mar. 13, 1888. Brown's Trustees v. Brown.

that the question should be tried is to say the least most inconvenient. I can imagine nothing calculated to put the case more out of shape than what is proposed. I do not say that it is absolutely incompetent, but it is certainly most inconvenient, and, therefore, if the question is to be tried at all, it should be tried in an action in the name of the trustees against Nicolson. They cannot be asked to try it themselves at their own expense, but in these circumstances they offer the use of their name, upon the party wishing to raise the action finding security that they and the trust-estate shall not be liable in any part of the expense of an action which they know, or at least say, will end in favour of the defender. I think that we should recall the interlocutor, and, if the objector does not accede to the trustees' offer, there is no other footing on which proof can be allowed.

Lord Adam.—If we should allow this interlocutor to stand, matters would be in the curious position that the objector would be pursuer in an action in which the trustees would be put to prove the non-liability of Nicolson to the trust in this sum of £600. There is no duty on them to do that. The proposal is not incompetent, but when the trustees come forward to say that they are in possession of a discharge of the sum in question, and that they see no reason for thinking that the discharge is bad in any way, I cannot see why they should be compelled at the expense of the other beneficiaries under the trust to sue a claim which they think ill-founded. If, then, the objector is not prepared to accept the trustees' offer, I do not think that she can be allowed to put the trustees to this expense.

Lord Kinnear.—If the documents produced are valid, then the debt alleged to subsist has been extinguished. I do not think it necessary to consider whether the averments on which it is proposed to set aside the discharge are relevant, for I think that if the beneficiary who desires proof wishes to proceed with the case she must take proceedings at her own expense, and not at the expense of the other beneficiaries. I therefore concur.

Lord Mure and Lord Shand were absent.

The Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor; "and in respect the objector declines the proposal of the trustees that she should sue Mr D. Nicolson in name of the trustees, giving caution to indemnify the trustees and the trust-estate from liability for expenses of such litigation, repel the objections to the condescendence of the fund in medio, reserving all questions as to the amount of the objector's claims and the deductions proposed to be made therefrom: Find the reclaimers entitled to expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor," &c.

J. & A. F. Adam, W.S.—J. B. W. Lee, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 102.

Mar. 13, 1888. Brash v. Arnott's Trustee.

Alexander Brash, Appellant.—A. S. D. Thomson.
D. G. Hoey (Arnott's Trustee), Respondent.—Goudy.

Bankruptcy—Statutory examination—Examination of debtor to the estate—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), secs. 90 and 91.—In the sequestration of a bankrupt, the trustee examined a trader with reference to accounts of sales made by him for the bankrupt on which he had charged commission, and asked how he had disposed of the goods. The trader deponed that he had himself bought the goods. The trustee having further asked, "What did you do with those goods when you took possession of them"? the witness

No. 102.
Mar. 13, 1888.
Brash v. Arnott's Trustee.
1st Division.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
M.

objected to the competency of the question. Held that the trustee was entitled to put the question.[*]

In the process of sequestration of the estates of William Arnott, corn factor, Glasgow, Mr D. G. Hoey was appointed trustee.

At a diet in the sequestration in December 1887, before the Sheriff-substitute, Alexander Brash, a partner of the firm of Alexander Brash & Company, flour importers, Glasgow and Dublin, was examined. He deponed,—"I am a flour importer in Glasgow and Dublin. I have been doing business with the bankrupt. We have had a good few transactions, amounting to several thousand pounds. The document now shewn me is an account sales of 200 bags of flour.[†] I now exhibit the advice of sale in one of my books. It is as follows:—'Wm. Arnott, Esquire, 17th February 1887.—We beg to advise sales on your consignment as undernoted, 92 Daluth A, 32/6.' There is another entry in the same account sales of 108 bags Daluth A flour, at 29/6. There is also an advice note for that, but it has come out very faintly in the copy. I also exhibit an entry for these goods in my ledger. Being asked to produce the book from which the ledger was posted, depones,—I now exhibit my invoice book. (Q.) To whom did you sell these goods? (A.) I took over the goods at the market price. The document now handed to me is an account sales of 200 bags Daluth A flour, forwarded from Glasgow to Dublin. That was a sale to myself. I took over the flour at the market price, and Mr Arnott never objected to the market price. (Q.) What did you do with those goods when you took possession of them? (A.) I have got some of them yet. (Q.) I want you to shew me the disposal of them in your books? (A.) I have already shewn you a statement of the disposal; that is the custom and method of rendering account sales."

---

[*] Sec. 90 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, provides that "the Sheriff may at any time, on the application of the trustee, order an examination of the bankrupt's wife and family, clerks, servants, factors, law-agents, and others, who can give information relative to his estate. . . . ."

Sec. 91 further enacts that "the bankrupt and such other persons shall answer all lawful questions relating to the affairs of the bankrupt," &c.

[†] "4. Account Sales of 200 bags Daluth A Flour, forwarded from Glasgow to Dublin, and sold by the undersigned for account of William Arnott, Esq., Hope Street.

1887.
Feby. 17.	By 92 $^0/_{140}$ bags Daluth A Flour, at 32/6 per 280 lbs., ...	£74 15 0
May 15.	„ 108 bags Daluth A Flour, at 29/6 per 280 lbs., . . .	79 13 0
		£154 8 0
	Less 1¼ per cent of disc., .	1 18 7
			£152 9 5
	Charges.
17/2/25/5/87.	To Cartage on 92 bags, . . .	£0 3 5
	„ Insurance (fire), ...	0 3 10
	„ Postages and petties, . .	0 3 10
	„ Commission and guarantee, 2½ per cent, ...	3 16 3
			4 7 4
	Nett proceeds, ...		£148 2 1
	By Bill, ...		140 0 0
	At Wm. A.'s cr., ...		£8 2 1

E. & O. E.

Glasgow, 8th October 1887. Alex. Brash & Co."

No. 102.
Mar. 13, 1888.
Brash v. Arnott's Trustee.

"Being shewn letter of his firm, dated 25th May 1887, now produced, and marked No. 52,[*] depones—That is an advice of sale. That includes the remainder of the 92 Daluth A,—108 bags Daluth A also mentioned in my former deposition. (Q.) Have you any advice that you took any of these goods over? (A.) No. We did not advise Mr Arnott that we took over the goods, but—(Q.) But what? [No answer.] There is a discount taken off the price in the account sales No. 51, 1¼, and in addition to the discount there is a guarantee commission taken off below, 2½ per cent. The object of the guarantee commission is to guarantee the debt, I suppose. (Q.) To guarantee you against loss? (A.) To guarantee against loss. That is a charge by me for guaranteeing Mr Arnott against loss by the debtor. (Q.) And yet you say that you yourself are the debtor? (A.) That is the usual form. (Q.) You still say that you are the debtor, that is for guaranteeing yourself? (A.) I took over the goods."

The trustee proposed to ask the following question,—"What did you do with those goods when you took possession of them?"

"Mr Paul, for the witness, objected to the question—(1) in respect that it does not relate to the bankrupt's affairs, being with reference to the disposal of the goods after they had been bought in by Mr Brash; (2) that it was urged by Mr Hoey, not in his capacity of trustee, but on the instructions and in the interests of Messrs Kufeke, Morrison, & Barbour, creditors, who were opponents of witness's firm, and with the object of prying into the firm's business and obtaining the names of the customers; (3) that the information had been offered to the trustee for his own use, but declined; (4) that all claims by the bankrupt and by his trustee against witness's firm had been settled, and the documents were in the trustee's possession; and (5) that the question, if of any value, is an attempt to cut down settled claims."

The Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray) repelled the objection.

The witness Brash appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the appellant;—The question objected to was not a proper question to put in the examination. The debt of Brash to the estate might become the subject of litigation hereafter, and that question ought not to be prejudiced by answers given by the debtor to the estate at this stage. It was settled law that the trustee in a sequestration could not question a creditor of the bankrupt as to the merits of his claim at this stage,[1] and the same rule ought to apply to debtors to the estate. He [*] "William Arnott, Esq.,

---

Hope Street, Glasgow.

Dear Sir,—We beg to advise the sale of the undernoted:—
200 0/140 bags Iroquois, at 28s., store and quay.
108 0/140 „ Daluth A, at 29s. 6d., store and quay.
100 0/280 sks. Sterling, at 25s. 6d., „
100 0/280 „ Royal Rose, at 29s. 6d., „
126 0/140 „ Hertford, at 25s., „

The above prices are all per 280 lbs., less the usual 1¼ of discount. A/c sales will follow in due course. The Shipping Company stored some 150 bags of the Iroquois, being pressed for room.—Yours faithfully, ALEX. BRASH & Co.

J.M.

P.S.—We have still left to sell for your account
228 0/140 bags Hertford.
250 0/140 „ Socrates."

[1] Redpath v. Forth Marine Insurance Co., July 20, 1844, 6 D. 1438; M'Lea v. M'Lehose, 1786, Bell's Oct. Cases, 75; Paul v. Laing's Trustee, Feb. 21,

No. 102. — Mar. 13, 1888. Brash v. Arnott's Trustee.

admitted, however, that there was no authority in the books for holding this view.

Argued for the trustee;—A wide discretion ought to be allowed to the trustee in a sequestration, so as to enable him to trace property belonging to the estate. There was no case where a debtor to a bankrupt estate was allowed to refuse to answer questions as to how his debt to the estate was incurred. All the law cited by the appellant applicable to questions being asked as to creditors' claims was conceded, but it was quite irrelevant in the present case. Here the parole evidence of the debtor and the books produced were at variance, and if the line of examination in question was not allowed it might debar the trustee from following up debts or effects which were truly due to or the property of the estate.

Lord President.—This is a very special case, but at the same time it involves an important principle. Observe what Mr Brash's evidence comes to. So far as the account sales exhibit the transaction, it is a transaction of sale and return in the ordinary course of business; 200 bags of flour were sold in February 1887 at 32s. 8d., and 108 in May at 29s. 6d. The usual charges were made on the proceeds of the sale, and among others there is the del credere or guarantee, which is properly charged at 2½ per cent. Now, that if it represents the transaction truly is nothing but a sale of goods consigned for sale and return, in which the consignee does not become purchaser, but only the agent and representative of the seller. Mr Brash, however, says in his evidence that the goods were never sold, but that he took them over. He did not tell Arnott that he had done so, but still he says that he took them over, and that he has some of the goods still. In the circumstances I think the trustee is well entitled to know where those goods are and what became of them, because, for aught we know, the goods may turn out legally to belong to the bankrupt estate, and it may be the trustee's duty to bring them into the sequestration. He may, by the inquiry he proposes to make, find out that those goods are worth much more than the price stated in the account, or that the market price at the time they were stated to have been sold was greater than it is stated to have been, and if so, though I give no opinion on the point, he may be entitled to say that they belong to the estate. Now, is he not entitled to find out this by the examination of this gentleman who has put himself in a most suspicious position? I think he is quite entitled to do so. It is not, I think, sufficient to say that because the subject of the inquiry may become hereafter the subject of litigation, it is therefore incompetent to ask questions such as those here proposed. It is very possible the matter may become the subject of litigation, but that is no reason for the trustee being prevented from ascertaining where the goods are now, and what has become of them. I quite understand that in the case of a creditor who is claiming in an estate you are not entitled to bring into the question the merits of the claim in the examination of the bankrupt himself or of the creditor. That is quite established law, but this question is quite different, for if we refuse to allow this line of inquiry it would go far to prevent the trustee from following up

---

1855, 17 D. 457, 27 Scot. Jur. 193; Sawers v. Balgarnie, Dec. 17, 1858, 21 D. 153, 31 Scot. Jur. 61; Delvoitte & Co. v. Baillie's Trustee, Nov. 16, 1877, 5 R. 143; A B v. Binny, June 4, 1858, 20 D. 1058, 30 Scot. Jur. 642; Burnet v. Calder, June 14, 1855, 17 D. 933, 27 Scot. Jur. 402.

the goods, and vindicating them for the creditors. I think, therefore, we ought to refuse the appeal.

No. 102.

Mar. 13, 1888.
Brash v. Arnott's Trustee.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

J. STEWART GELLATLY, S.S.C.—LOCKHART THOMSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 103.

Mar. 15, 1888.
Wilson v. Brakenridge.

JOHN WILSON, Pursuer (Appellant).—Watt.
WILLIAM BRAKENRIDGE AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—Macfarlane.

Process—Appeal—Competency—Interlocutor limiting proof to writ or oath—Sheriff Court (Scotland) Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 80), sec. 24.—A Sheriff pronounced an interlocutor sustaining a plea for the defender of prescription, and limiting the proof to his writ or oath. The pursuer appealed. Held that the Sheriff's judgment was not a final interlocutor within the meaning of the Sheriff Court Act, 1853, sec. 24, and was therefore not appealable.

Shirra v. Robertson, June 7, 1873, 11 Macph. 660, followed.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Roxburgh.
M.

JOHN WILSON, St Boswells, in October 1887 raised an action against William Brakenridge and others in the Sheriff Court of Roxburghshire, at Jedburgh, concluding for payment of £51.

The defenders pleaded prescription.

The Sheriff-substitute (Speirs), on 27th October 1887, repelled that plea.

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff (Jameson), who, on 10th January 1888, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor of 27th October 1887: Sustains the first plea in law for the defenders: Finds that the pursuer's proof must be limited to writ or oath of the defenders: Finds the pursuer liable to the defenders in the expenses of this appeal; modifies the same to the sum of £2, 10s. sterling: Decerns and ordains the pursuer to make payment of said sum to the defenders: Quoad ultra reserves all questions of expenses: Remits the cause to the Sheriff-substitute for further procedure, and decerns."

The pursuer, on 1st March 1888, appealed to the Court of Session.

On the cause appearing in the Single Bills the respondents objected to the competency of the appeal.

Argued for the respondents;—This was not a final judgment,[1] and was therefore not appealable under the Sheriff Court Act, 1853, sec. 24.* The appeal was taken too late under sec. 40 of the Judicature Act, taken along with the A. S., 11th July 1828.[2] [LORD PRESIDENT.—This is not an interlocutor merely allowing proof, it finds that the proof must be

---

[1] Robertson v. Earl of Dudley, July 13, 1875, 2 R. 935; Duff v. Steuart, Oct. 20, 1881, 9 R. 17.

* Sec. 24 of the Sheriff Court Act, 1853, provides,—"It shall be competent in any cause exceeding the value of twenty-five pounds to take to review of the Court of Session any interlocutor of a Sheriff sisting process, and any interlocutor giving interim decree for payment of money, and any interlocutor disposing of the whole merits of the cause, although no decision has been given as to expenses, or although the expenses, if such have been found due, have not been modified or decerned for; but it shall not be competent to take to review any interlocutor, judgment, or decree of a Sheriff, not being an interlocutor sisting process or giving interim decree for payment of money or disposing of the whole merits of the cause as aforesaid."

[2] Kinnes v. Fleming, Jan. 15, 1881, 8 R. 386.

No. 103.
—
Mar. 15, 1888.
Wilson v.
Brakenridge.

limited to writ or oath. If there is no writ, it must be referred to the defender's oath, and after that is taken I cannot see how it can be gone back upon afterwards, even if the pursuer should satisfy the Court that proof prout de jure ought to have been allowed.] That question was decided in the case of Shirra v. Robertson,[1] where it was held that such an interlocutor was not final, and therefore not appealable. [LORD PRESIDENT.—The hardship I alluded to scarcely arose there, as it was the party to whose oath reference was made who brought the appeal. The result in this case would be that the Sheriff's interlocutor would be unappealable for ever.] [LORD ADAM.—It is very difficult to see how an interlocutor should be appealable by one party and not by the other.] The judgment in Shirra's case was applicable here, and the grounds of judgment reached this case. Further in the case of Robertson v. Earl of Dudley the proof of part of the cause had been limited by the Sheriff to the writ or oath of the defender, and to that extent the appeal seems to have been held to be incompetent, only the other part of the case having been sent to proof.

Argued for the appellant;—The circumstances in Shirra's case were so different that it ought not to rule the present case. It was not intended in that case to decide that in such circumstances as the present a Sheriff's interlocutor should be absolutely final. [LORD PRESIDENT.—I am afraid Shirra's case is conclusive against you. If, however, you refused in the Sheriff Court to refer the cause to the oath of the defender, final judgment would go out against you, and that interlocutor would be appealable.]

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the case of Shirra (11 Macph. 660) is conclusive against the competency of this appeal. The only difference between the cases is that in that case the appeal was brought at the instance of the party to whose oath reference was made, while here it is the other way. I cannot say that I see that that makes any difference on the question of competency, and as Shirra's case was a judgment pronounced after consultation with the other Division, I do not think we can get over it.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

THE COURT refused the appeal as incompetent.

DAVID HUNTER, S.S.C.—ADAM SHIELL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 104.
—
Mar. 15, 1888.*
Assessor for Argyllshire v.
Stuart.

THE ASSESSOR FOR ARGYLLSHIRE, Appellant.—Low.
MRS E. M. DOWNING STUART, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—Mackay.

Valuation Acts—Shootings—Unlet deer forest—Sporting Lands Rating Act, 1886 (49 Vict. cap. 15), secs. 6 and 7.—Lands in the occupation of the proprietor were used as a deer forest only, there being neither other game nor farm stock thereon. Held, per Lord Fraser (agreeing with the determination of the Valuation Committee), that the lands fell to be entered in the Valuation-roll at their value as a deer forest only; per Lord Lee, that looking particularly to the terms of the Sporting Lands Rating Act, 1886, secs. 6 and 7, there ought to be a double entry of the lands at their value as grazing ground, and at their value as a deer forest. The Judges being divided in opinion, the determination of the Valuation Committee stood.

---

[1] Shirra v. Robertson, June 7, 1873, 11 Macph. 660, 45 Scot. Jur. 412.

* Decided Feb. 10, 1888.

No. 104.

Mar. 15, 1888.
Assessor for Argyllshire v. Stuart.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court.
Lord Lee.
Lord Fraser.

Case No. 84.

AT a meeting of the Valuation Committee of the county of Argyll on 13th September 1887 to dispose of appeals against the valuations of lands and heritages by the county assessor for the year ending Whitsunday 1888, Mrs Stuart of Dalness appealed against the following entries:—

No.	Description of Subject.	Proprietor.	Occupier.	Yearly Rent or Value.
				£ s. d.
9836	Dalness Grazings.	Mrs E. M. Downing Macdonald or Stuart of Dalness.	Proprietrix.	285 0 0
	Do. Shootings.	Do. do.	Do.	300 0 0

The Valuation Committee, having regard to the evidence adduced before them, and to the decision in the case of Lord Middleton,[1] restricted the annual value of the lands to £255, being at the rate of £15 per stag for 17 stags.

The Assessor took a case. It appeared from the case that the lands were unlet, and that they were exclusively used as a deer forest, there being no stock thereon and no other game. "In Inverness, deer form a considerable element in the landlord's property, and, as a rule, the deer forests in that county are entirely cleared of sheep and other farm stock. In Argyllshire there are very few cleared deer forests, but in the northern part of the county deer frequent the sheep ground, which is not unusually lightly stocked with sheep and cattle." The case further set forth at considerable length the result of evidence regarding the value of shootings.

The case also stated that the Inverness-shire Commissioners of Supply had, after an exhaustive inquiry into the basis for valuing unlet shootings and deer forests, come to the conclusion that taking one thing with another "the nett value should be £15 per stag for deer, and the nett value per brace of grouse 10s." The parties were agreed that seventeen stags was the number that could be shot on Dalness. In 1885 Dalness was a sheep farm, and its grazing value was then entered at £285.

The Assessor contended that under the Sporting Lands Rating Act, 1886,* he was bound to value the lands for sporting and for grazing purposes separately, even although de facto they were not used as grazing ground. Mrs Stuart maintained that the actual condition of the lands only was to be looked at, and that the lands here, being used as a deer forest and for nothing else, ought to be valued only as a deer forest.

---

[1] Lord Middleton v. Assessor for Ross-shire, March 1, 1882, 10 R. 28.

* The Sporting Lands Rating (Scotland) Act, 1886 (49 Vict. cap. 15), enacts, —Sec. 6—"In order to ascertain and assess under the Valuation Acts the yearly value of shootings and deer forests in Scotland, it shall be the duty of the assessor to enter separately for each parish, and in respect of each proprietor therein, the yearly value of the shootings over the lands and of the deer forests belonging to him in so far as situated within such parish."

Sec. 7—"All county, parochial, and other public assessments, and all assessments, rates, or taxes, under any Act of Parliament, authorised to be imposed or made upon or according to the annual value of lands or heritages ascertained under the Valuation Acts, or upon or according to the annual value of lands and heritages ascertained under the Poor-Law Act, shall be imposed or made upon or according to the annual value of shootings and deer forests ascertained under the Valuation Acts, as amended by this Act, or upon the annual value thereof ascertained under the Poor-Law Act, as amended by this Act, as the case may be."

No. 104. At advising,—

Mar. 15, 1888. Assessor for Argyllshire v. Stuart.

Lord Fraser.—The case states "that no other stock than deer is kept on the lands, and that no other game exist thereon." Therefore this must be treated as a deer forest, according to the rule laid down in Lord Middleton's case (1st March 1882, 10 R. 28), and indeed, according to the provision of the 6th section of the statute, that the lands are to be valued as in their actual state. It appears that in the year 1885 the grazing value of the lands was ascertained to be £285. Whether that value for grazing would be obtained now is not stated as a fact, and certainly cannot be assumed, looking to the fall in rents of all grazing lands. But whether it could be obtained or not is wholly immaterial, for the property is not now, in its actual state, a grazing ground. The same argument as the Assessor here states was urged in the case of Lord Middleton, and was rejected. We there held that it was irrelevant to aver that the forest that Lord Middleton let would bring a greater rent if let for grazing; to that averment the answer was, that it was not let for grazing, but as a deer forest, and must be valued as such; and that answer was held to be sufficient. Now, then, dealing with the present case as a deer forest, what is the reasonable rent that might be expected for it? The Commissioners seem to have taken a good deal of trouble in ascertaining what were the rents for deer forests in Argyllshire and in Inverness-shire, the result being, that taking one thing with another, "the nett value should be £15 per stag for deer, and the nett value per brace of grouse 10s." As there are no grouse here, that matter may be thrown out of consideration; but the case further states that the number of stags that could be shot in a year was 17, which, at the rate of £15 per stag, brings out the value stated by the Commissioners of £255, with which I am quite satisfied, and I therefore think the valuation to be right.

The present case presents no feature of novelty from other cases where property is in the actual possession of the owner. It is the ordinary case with which assessors and valuation committees have every day to deal. It was perfectly lawful for the owner to use the ground for the grazing of sheep, and it was also perfectly lawful for her to turn it into a deer forest, the latter, according to present rents of grazing properties, being perhaps the more profitable of the two. It is very absurd to say that in this case the owner allows her property to go to waste, and that the annual value must be ascertained, not as in its actual state, but according to the annual value that it might bring if it were used for something else. Neither the Assessor, nor the Valuation Committee, nor this Court, have any right to dictate to a proprietor as to the mode in which his property shall be used, provided it is bona fide used for a beneficial purpose, and without arbitrary restrictions as to use laid upon it by the owner. It is just as inadmissible to assimilate this case to that of the Blyth Hall Trustees (24th February 1883, 10 R. 659), where the owner of property directed buildings to be erected upon ground to be used in all time coming as a public hall, with ante-rooms, offices, and others in connection therewith, but with positive injunctions that it should be used for no other purpose. The result of these restrictions was, that the expenditure exceeded the revenue obtained, and the argument came to be, that as there was no revenue the entry in the Valuation-roll should be nil. This contention was negatived upon the plain ground that these restrictions could not be allowed to interfere with the potential value which the buildings possessed if there were no such restrictions. That case has no bearing whatever upon the present one, where the property is used for a purpose undoubtedly beneficial, and calculated to bring out the full annual value which it possesses.

The bearing of the decision in the case of Lord Middleton has been entirely misunderstood. It is said that there was a lease in that case, which is quite true; but the same argument was used there which is presented to us once more in the present case, viz., that Lord Middleton ought not to have let his lands as a deer forest, but to have let them for grazing sheep and cattle, in which case a larger rent would, it was said, have been obtained. This is the very position taken up by the appellant now, when he maintains that Mrs Stuart of Dalness ought not to keep her land as a deer forest, but ought to use it, if she does not let it, for grazing cattle and sheep. Both contentions are unsound; and if the case of Middleton is to be considered an authority, then the determination of the Valuation Committee was right.

The Assessor erroneously made an entry of grazings, as separate from shootings, and put a value upon each. This was clearly an error on his part. The property must be treated either as grazing land or as a deer forest, but not as both; and accordingly the Commissioners have so dealt with the matter quite rightly by making only one entry.

LORD LEE.—The subjects here are unlet, and therefore, in a question as to the principle on which they should be valued, it seems to me quite irrelevant and useless to refer to the case of Lord Middleton. For that was the case of subjects actually let as a deer forest, and where the only question was how much of the rent was paid on account of the furniture, foresters, ponies, gardeners, and gillies, and other servants included in the stipulated sum. Upon this point it is enough to refer to the case and opinions.

The Valuation Committee appear to have held that because no other stock than deer is kept on the lands of Dalness, they can only be valued as a deer forest at their sporting value, and that that should be fixed at £15 for each stag that could be shot in a year, such being the estimated nett value in Inverness-shire and some other parts of the country. They have therefore excluded altogether the value of the lands entered by the assessor as "grazings," and thus have entered the subjects only at their sporting value as a deer forest, which they estimate at £255, being £30 less than the amount stated in the case as the admitted value for grazings.

This assumes that the Sporting Lands Rating (Scotland) Act of 1886 has the effect of superseding, in the case of unlet deer forests, the directions of the 3d clause of the Lands Valuation Act of 1854, requiring that the whole lands and heritages in the country are to be entered separately, "specifying in each case the nature of such lands and heritages." I think that this is a mistake, and that the true meaning and effect of the recent statute, in amending the interpretation clause of the Lands Valuation Act, is to require the assessor in the case of unlet shootings and deer forests, to enter separately for each parish the value of such shootings and deer forests, without leaving unvalued the lands and heritages previously required to be valued.

But further, if lands are not to be valued excepting as a sporting subject, merely because no other stock than deer is kept thereon, a very serious question arises, viz.,—Whether a proprietor can, consistently with the Valuation Statute, exclude his lands from valuation? If he is entitled to reduce the value of the lands, or to prevent them being valued as lands, by clearing them of all stock other than deer, I presume that he would be entitled to clear them of deer too, and thus to leave them absolutely valueless. Can he do this to the effect of excluding the lands from valuation? I assume that he has a right to do what he likes with his own in all other respects. For we have nothing to do here with social questions. But the question whether he can do this to the effect of avoiding valuation appears to me to be forced upon us by this determination of the Argyllshire Valuation Committee, and I am of opinion that it must be answered in the negative.

It is said that the subjects must be valued in their actual state. That is quite true. The question is, what would the lands let for in their actual state by the year? But their actual state is to be considered as a question of fact. It is not to be governed by restrictions placed upon them by the mere will of the proprietor. That was settled in the case of the Blyth Hall Trustees in 1883, 10 R. 659.

I think that, independently of the sporting value which they possess as a deer forest, these lands in their actual state are capable of valuation as grazings —they are in fact grazings. This is stated in the case, and they are none the less grazings that they are only grazed by deer.

If it could have been shewn that deer are stock, and that the lands have been, by deer fences and other artificial appliances, appropriated to such stock, and made unsuitable for the grazing of ordinary stock, something might be said.

But it was conclusively settled, in the case of the Duke of Atholl v. M'Inroy, Feb. 28, 1862, 24 D. 673, that deer are not stock, and it is not contended that anything has been done which in fact renders these lands unfit for occupation as ordinary grazings.

My opinion therefore is that the Valuation Committee, in reducing the valuation to £255 (which is below the value of the lands as sheep grazings alone), is wrong.

THE JUDGES being divided in opinion, the determination of the Valuation Committee stood.

J. & J. H. BALFOUR, W.S.—J. C. & A. STEUART, W.S.—Agents.

No. 105.

Mar. 15, 1888.*
Maitland v. Assessor for Midlothian.

SIR JAMES RAMSAY GIBSON MAITLAND, BARONET, Appellant.—C. J. Guthrie.

THE ASSESSOR FOR MIDLOTHIAN, Respondent.—Maconochie.

Valuation Acts—Appeal—Competency.—The Lands Valuation Act, 1854, enacts that any person whose name is entered by the assessor in the Valuation-roll shall be entitled to appeal to the Commissioners with reference to such entry, provided the appellant shall intimate in writing that he is to maintain the appeal, and "specify the amount of valuation which he alleges should be substituted for that stated by the assessor." The proprietor of K intimated in writing to the assessor "an appeal against your entering in the Valuation-roll the shootings of K at £5," and added that the lands were not shot over, and that if the shootings were let as assessed the rent of the lands would be diminished to a very much larger extent. Before writing the letter he had stated to the assessor verbally that he objected to the shootings being entered in the Valuation-roll at all. Held that there had been sufficient intimation of an appeal against the shootings being entered in the roll.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court.
Lord Lee.
Lord Fraser.

SIR JAMES RAMSAY GIBSON MAITLAND of Barnton, Bart., appealed against the following entries made by the Assessor for the county of Edinburgh in the County Valuation-roll, viz., of £13 for shootings in the parish of Kirkliston, of £12 for shootings in the parish of Corstorphine, and of £12 for shootings in the parish of Cramond, all of which were unlet.

---

* Decided Feb. 10, 1888.

Sir James' agents had stated verbally to the Assessor that they objected to the shootings being entered in the Valuation-roll at all, when the Assessor intimated his willingness to reduce the valuations to £5, £5, and £10 respectively. His offer was declined. Sir James' agents then sent a letter to the Assessor in the following terms:—

"Dear Sir,—In compliance with instructions given by Sir James R. G. Maitland, we beg to intimate an appeal against your entering in the Valuation-roll the shootings in the parish of Kirkliston at £5, in the parish of Corstorphine at £5, and in the parish of Cramond at £10. You are aware Sir James has never shot over the lands in these parishes, and he is satisfied that if the shootings were let as assessed there would be a diminution of the farm rents to a very much larger extent.—Yours faithfully, JOHN C. BRODIE & SONS. William Kennedy, Esq., Assessor."

The Assessor objected to the appeal, on the ground that the appellant had failed to specify in writing the amount of the valuation which he alleged should be substituted for the amount stated by the Assessor, in terms of the 9th section of the Lands Valuation Act.*

The appellant replied that as there were, in his opinion, no shootings, they should not have been entered in the roll at all, and that accordingly no value could be put upon them.

The Commissioners sustained the objection.

Sir James took a case, in which the foregoing facts were stated.

At advising,—

LORD LEE.—In this case the Valuation Committee have sustained an objection to the competency of the appeal, on the ground that the appellant failed to comply with the requirement of section 9, as to specifying the amount of valuation which he alleges should be substituted for the amount stated by the Assessor.

The entries objected to were for unlet shootings in the parishes of Kirkliston, Corstorphine, and Cramond. Such entries became competent for the first time under the Sporting Lands Rating Act of 1886. The appellant does not allege that any value should be substituted for the amount stated by the Assessor. On the contrary, it appears from the case that he had explained to the Assessor that he "objected to the shootings being entered in the Valuation-roll at all"; and his notice of appeal explains the view on which he was to maintain this objection.

It appears to me that the provision of section 9 is inapplicable to such a case; and that to exclude the appeal because the appellant had not done that which he could not do consistently with the nature of the objection, was to disallow altogether an appeal on the only ground which was maintained. This is clearly contrary to the statute, which requires the assessor to give notice to every person included in his valuation, that if he considers himself aggrieved by such valuation he may appeal against the same in terms of the Act.

---

* The Lands Valuation Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91), sec. 9, enacts, —"All persons whose names shall have been entered by the assessors in the Valuation-roll of the county or burgh respectively, whether as proprietors or tenants or occupiers, shall be entitled to appeal to the said Commissioners or Magistrates, as the case may be, with reference to such entry; provided always that the appellant shall, six days at least before such appeal is heard, intimate in writing to the assessor that he is to maintain such appeal, and specify the amount of valuation which he alleges should be substituted for the amount stated by the assessor."

But I am not disposed to rest my opinion solely on the ground that the appellant could not consistently specify any value to be substituted. I think that there is a much broader ground on which the Committee might have repelled the objection. It is a well-settled principle, even in the case of proper judicatories, and where the Court of first instance exercises full jurisdiction in the matter, that review is always competent unless excluded, and that provisions as to the form of appeal will not exclude review, unless failure to comply with them has the effect of rendering the judgment appealed from final. Provisions of a directory kind, and compliance with which is not an essential condition of the superior Court exercising its jurisdiction, will not render an appeal incompetent. Prior to the Act of 1868 such questions were of constant occurrence in the Court of Session, and these principles were in daily observance. The case of Wilson v. Stewart (15 D. 817) is but one of many cases illustrating a familiar doctrine.

The case here, however, is much stronger. The assessor appointed under section 3 of the statute does not occupy the position of a Judge. The statute imposes the duty of making up the Valuation-roll upon the Commissioners of Supply, and the assessor is merely an officer appointed by them for the purpose of ascertaining the yearly rent or value. What subjects are to be entered in the roll and valued is a different question altogether from the question of amount. We have had another example at these sittings of an appeal on this point in the case of the Forth Bridge Railway. To hold in such a case that the provision of section 9 excludes the Commissioners from entertaining an appeal, unless the appellant has specified the amount which he wishes to be entered, appears to me to be absurd. But even if the statute could be read as containing a direction that in such a case the appellant must specify an amount to be substituted, I should hold that, in the absence of any sanction of finality, the provision must be read as merely directory, and that the appellant ought to have been allowed an opportunity of complying with it, if he had not already done so.

My opinion is that his notice of appeal was sufficient to raise the question which he desired to present to the Committee, and that their determination to disallow the appeal as incompetent was wrong.

LORD FRASER.—The right of appeal from the Assessor's valuation to the Valuation Committee is, by the 9th section of the Valuation Act, given under a condition, viz., that the appellant shall "specify the amount of valuation which he alleges should be substituted for the amount stated by the assessor." If no such specification be given, the plain inference is that there is no competent appeal. No such specification was given by the appellant in this case. He now says that there ought to be no value entered in the roll, for the reasons which he assigns; and if so, he ought to have intimated to the Assessor that such was his contention. I am not surprised, therefore, at the Valuation Committee holding that there was no competent appeal before them. But at the same time I am not disposed to differ from your Lordship as to what ought to be done now. It has been told us that the Assessor had information, besides the letter written by the appellant's agents, as to what the contention was to be, and such being the case, and the objection being so purely technical, I think the proper course will be, upon the whole, to remit the case to the Valuation Committee to hear it on the merits.

No. 105.
Mar. 15, 1888.
Maitland v. Assessor for Midlothian.

THE following was the opinion:—"We are of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee is wrong, and the Judges therefore remit to the Committee in order that the appeal may be disposed of on its merits."

J. & J. H. BALFOUR, W.S.—JOHN CLERK BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 106.
Mar. 15, 1888.[*]
Forth Bridge Railway Co. v. Assessor for Linlithgowshire.

THE FORTH BRIDGE RAILWAY COMPANY, Appellants.—Asher—J. C. Thomson.

THE ASSESSOR FOR LINLITHGOWSHIRE.—John Wilson.

Valuation Acts—Lands acquired for purposes of a railway but not yet so used—Whether valuation to be by county or by railway assessor.—In an appeal against a determination of the Valuation Committee sustaining a valuation by the assessor for the county of certain ground which had been acquired by a railway company (whose line was partly constructed) for the purposes of their undertaking, but which was still in grass and in no way used for these purposes, held (per Lord Lee) that the ground had rightly been valued by the county assessor and not by the assessor for railways and canals, notwithstanding a provision of the company's Act of Parliament that the lands from time to time acquired by the company should, "for all purposes of tolls, rates, and charges, and for all other purposes whatsoever, be the undertaking, railway works, and property of the company"; held (per Lord Fraser contra) that the ground in question ought to have been valued by the assessor for railways and canals as part of the undertaking of the company. The Judges being divided in opinion, the valuation stood.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court.
Lord Lee.
Lord Fraser.

Case No. 86.

AT a meeting of the Valuation Committee of the Commissioners of Supply of the county of Linlithgow, on 13th September 1887, for the purpose of hearing appeals against valuations made by the County Assessor for the year ending Whitsunday 1888, the Forth Bridge Railway Company appealed against an entry of "Land (15½ acres) Bankhead and Wester Dalmeny," of which they were entered as proprietors and occupants, at a yearly value of £45.

The ground in question had been acquired by the company for the purposes and under the powers of "The Forth Bridge Railway Act, 1882." It was still in grass and had not yet been used for the statutory purposes of the company, their undertaking not having been completed, but it was not disputed by the Assessor that the company's contemplated line of railway leading to the Forth Bridge would, if completed, intersect the ground. He however stated that the greater part of it would even then be available for other purposes.

The railway company maintained (1) that the ground ought to be valued (if at all), as a part of their undertaking, by the Assessor of Railways and Canals under section 21 of the Lands Valuation Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91), and not by the County Assessor under section 3; and they founded on section 16 of their own Act.[†] They admitted that the ground was not entered or taken into account in the Valuation-roll prepared by the Assessor of Railways and Canals. They contended further (2) that

---

[*] Decided Feb. 10, 1888.

[†] The Forth Bridge Railway Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. cxiv.), sec. 16, declared, that "subject to the provisions of this Act, the lands and property from time to time acquired by the company under this Act, and the railway and works by this Act authorised, shall for all purposes of tolls, rates, and charges, and for all other purposes whatsoever, be the undertaking, railway works, and property of the company, as if the company had by their previous Act of 1873 been authorised to acquire, make, and maintain the same."

No. 106.

Mar. 15, 1888.
Forth Bridge Railway Co. v. Assessor for Linlithgowshire.

under section 127 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845,* the ground did not fall to be entered in any Valuation-roll until the works connected with the railway were completed, the company till then being bound only to make up any deficiency which might "occur in the several assessments for land-tax and poor's-rate and prison assessment, according to the Valuation-roll in force at the date of the passing of the special Act."

The Assessor maintained that the ground fell within his jurisdiction and not within that of the Railway Assessor, inasmuch as the Railway Assessor dealt only with subjects actually forming part of a railway company's undertaking—railway stationmasters' houses, coal and other yards at railway stations, lands and houses let to tenants and not forming part of the railway system, being all included in the County or Burgh Assessor's Roll as the case might be.[1] He further maintained that section 127 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, had no application to matters of valuation, which were regulated solely by the Lands Valuation Act, 1854.

The Valuation Committee, after pointing out that the contention of the railway company led to the result that the ground in question would practically be exempt from taxation so long as the line of railway was not formed across it, stated,—"It appeared to the Commissioners that in these circumstances it was only equitable and right that the owners of the land should bear their due share of the public burdens thereon, and, as it was not disputed that £45 was the fair value of the subject, the Commissioners accordingly refused the appeal, and allowed the entry to stand."

The railway company took a case. The foregoing narrative is taken from the case.

Lord Lee.—The contention of the railway company is that the lands of Bankhead acquired by them for the purposes of their undertaking, and ultimately destined for railway purposes, do not at present fall to be entered in any Valuation-roll, but ought to be dealt with under section 127 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act.

The Valuation Committee have rejected this contention, and have entered the subjects in the roll, and my opinion is that their determination is right.

The question appears to me to depend on the statute regulating the valuation of lands and not upon the effect to be given to the 127th section of the Lands Clauses Act. The provisions of that section have reference to liability to assessment for the land-tax and poor's-rate and prison assessments. We have here nothing to do with questions of liability to assessment. It has often been pointed out that the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act relates only to the matter of valuation, and is by section 41 expressly excluded from affecting questions of liability to assessment. In so far as it regulates matters of valuation, it has been decided that it supersedes all previous enactments on that subject—Commissioners of Supply for Argyll v. Commissioners of Caledonian Canal, 10 Macph. 639.

---

* The Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 19), sec. 127, provided, that if the promoters of the undertaking became possessed of any lands charged with the land-tax, or liable to be assessed to the poor's-rate or prison assessment, "they shall from time to time, until the works shall be completed and assessed to such land-tax and poor's-rate and prison assessment, be liable to make good the deficiency in the several assessments for land-tax and poor's-rate and prison assessment, by reason of such lands having been taken or used for the purposes of the work . . ."

[1] Dundee and Arbroath Joint Line Committee, Dec. 21, 1883, 11 R. 396.

Dealing with the question, therefore, as a question of valuation under the statutes which govern the preparation of the Valuation-roll, I think it clear that all lands and heritages in Scotland must be included either in the Valuation-roll made up by the assessor appointed under section 3, or in the valuation made up by the assessor appointed under section 20, for lands and heritages belonging to railways and canals.

It was admitted that the time has not come for valuing the undertaking called the Forth Bridge Railway. It is not constructed. The directions of the statute as to the valuation of such an undertaking are inapplicable to the present circumstances of the Forth Bridge Railway. The question then is, and the appellants so put it, whether the lands of Bankhead are to be left wholly unvalued and included in no roll? I think that this is clearly contrary to the statute. It is said that the appellants' private act declares the whole lands acquired by them for the purposes of the railway to form a part of the undertaking. It appears from the terms of the clause that it is only for the purposes of the rates and charges to be levied by the company, and other purposes of that kind, that they are declared to form part of the undertaking. But assuming the clause to have the effect of making these lands de jure a part of the undertaking, it has not the effect of making them de facto a part of the undertaking, to the effect of requiring them to be valued by the Assessor of Railways. It is therefore of no consequence for the purposes of valuation until the time comes when the lands and heritages belonging to the company, and forming part of their undertaking, fall to be valued by the Assessor of Railways. I think that these lands must be valued by the assessor under clause 3.

LORD FRASER.—The piece of ground which is valued by the Assessor is at present in grass. It was obtained by the appellants from Lord Rosebery, under powers for the acquisition of land granted to the appellants by the Forth Bridge Railway Act, 1882. The purpose for which the railway company acquired the land is primarily with the view of carrying a railway over it towards the bridge, and,—as was explained by their counsel,—for other railway purposes, such as warehouses. The bridge not being finished, the railway company have no occasion at present to construct the railway that is intended to be led towards it; but by the 16th section of their Act of Parliament it is declared, "that the lands and property from time to time acquired by the company under this Act, and the railway and works by this Act authorised, shall, for all purposes of tolls, rates, and charges to be levied by the railway company, and for all other purposes whatsoever, be the undertaking, railway works, and property of the company"; and hence it is contended that the valuation should not be as if the lands were a separate subject, but should be valued under the 21st section of the Valuation Act in cumulo with the whole undertaking of the company; and this by the Assessor of Canals and Railways. The case of the Edinburgh, Perth, and Dundee Railway Company v. Arthur (22d December 1854, 17 D. 252) shews that a property belonging to a railway company may be valued as a separate subject from the general undertaking, although the Act of Parliament of the company declares such property to form part of their undertaking,—for it was there determined that "a right of ferry which a railway company had acquired, as empowered by their Act, and which was declared to form part of their undertaking, was assessable for poor-rates, not on the mileage principle, as forming part of the line of railway, but as a separate property distinct from the line." There were, however, specialties in that case which induced the Court to come to a conclusion as regards the clause having reference to the construction of the works which do not exist here. The ferry was not exclusively for the use of the railway. A right of ferry existed, which, no doubt, the railway company were authorised to exercise, but which others could do as well as they. There was a separate table of fares—for the ferry had a different rate from those of the railway company; but here the ground is exclusively the property of the appellants, and the mere circumstance that their works have not advanced so far that the ground has been covered with warehouses, station houses, and a railway, will not deprive the words,—that the lands acquired should, for all purposes whatever, be the undertaking of the railway company, —of their natural meaning. I am therefore, of opinion that we must alter the determination of the Commissioners in this case, and direct that the lands in question must be dealt with as if they formed a part of the general undertaking, and be valued as such.

No. 106.

Mar. 15, 1888.
Forth Bridge Railway Co. v. Assessor for Linlithgowshire.

Although in the case submitted to the Committee of the Commissioners of Supply the railway company maintained an argument upon the 127th section of the Lands Clauses Act, no argument was submitted to this Court in support of that contention. The only argument that we heard was that which, I think, is sound, and to which I have given effect, viz.:—that the ground in question constituted a part of the undertaking of the company. I may add that I can find no reason for adopting the decision of the Committee, that it was "equitable" (if by that is meant something different from what is statutory and legal), to value the land as a separate subject from the undertaking of the company. There is no room here for "equitable" considerations; the only question is, What has the Act of Parliament enacted?

THE JUDGES being divided in opinion, the determination of the Commissioners stood.

MILLAR, ROBSON, & INNES, S.S.C.—JOHN KINMONT, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 107.

Mar. 16, 1888.
Lord Abinger v. Cameron.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE LORD ABINGER, Pursuer (Appellant).—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—Dundas.

EWEN CAMERON, Defender (Respondent).—C. S. Dickson—Salvesen.

Lease—Crofter—Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29), sec. 1, subsec. 4, and secs. 3 and 33.—Section 1 of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, provides that a crofter shall not be removed from the holding of which he is tenant, except in consequence of the breach of one or more of certain statutory conditions, viz.,—subsec. 4, "The crofter shall not, without the consent of his landlord in writing, subdivide his holding, or sublet the same or any part thereof." Section 3 provides that when a tenant has broken any of the statutory conditions he shall forfeit his tenancy and be liable to removal from the croft.

Where a crofter had several years before the passing of the Act entered into an arrangement with a farm-servant engaged yearly, from Whitsunday to Whitsunday, to allow him to occupy a house and part of the arable ground on the croft, as part remuneration for his services, and had continued this arrangement after Whitsunday 1887, held that, as the subdivision of the croft had taken place prior to the passing of the Act, the crofter had not by the mere continuance of the arrangement after that date subdivided his holding and so committed a breach of the statutory condition contained in sec. 1, subsec. 4, of the Act.

No. 107.

Mar. 16, 1888.
Lord Abinger v. Cameron.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Inverness.
M.

On 1st July 1887 Lord Abinger, Inverlochy Castle, Inverness-shire, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Fort-William against Ewen Cameron, crofter, Unachan, near Spean Bridge, in which he prayed the Court "to find that the defender having, without the consent of the pursuer in writing, subdivided that holding occupied by him under the pursuer, or otherwise having sublet the same or part thereof, has thereby forfeited his tenancy of the croft at Unachan occupied by him on the pursuer's estate of Inverlochy, and is liable to be removed in manner provided by the fourth section of the Act of Sederunt anent removing of the 14th day of December 1756: To ordain the defender summarily to flit and remove himself, his family," &c.

The pursuer averred that the defender was tenant of a croft on his property at a yearly rent of £17, 16s., that he resided on his holding, that the parish in which the croft was situated had been declared a crofting parish in terms of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, and that the defender was a crofter in terms of that Act.

He averred further, that Angus MacIntyre, road contractor, occupied a dwelling-house and pertinents in the croft, other than the house occupied by the defender, and also a piece of ground "forming part of said croft." (Cond. 5) "The defender has, without the consent of the pursuer in writing, subdivided his holding, or otherwise the said defender has sublet the same or part thereof, in contravention of the said section 1, subsection 4, of the said Act, to the said Angus MacIntyre."*

He pleaded;—(1) The defender having, without the consent of his landlord (the pursuer) in writing, subdivided his holding, or otherwise sublet the same, or part thereof, and having thereby contravened one of the statutory conditions of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, his tenancy has been forfeited, and decree of removing should be granted as craved, with expenses.

The defender admitted the pursuer's statements as to MacIntyre's occupancy under the explanation that he "is a servant to the defender, and as such has occupied a house on the croft for the last ten years or thereby, and also potato ground, together with the summering of a cow—the house and ground and summering being perquisites allowed by the defender to MacIntyre."

The pursuer denied this explanation. With reference to the statement that he had subdivided his croft the defender answered,—(Ans. 5) "Denied, and explained that the defender occupied his croft at and prior to the date of the Crofters Act, and he has not subdivided or sublet his holding."

The defender pleaded;—(1) The defender not having subdivided his holding, or any part thereof, and not having made any change in his occu-

---

* Section 1 of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, enacts,—"A crofter shall not be removed from the holding of which he is tenant, except in consequence of the breach of one or more of the conditions following (in this Act referred to as statutory conditions)—but he shall have no power to assign his tenancy. . . . (4) The crofter shall not, without the consent of his landlord in writing, subdivide his holding or sublet the same, or any part thereof, or erect or suffer to be erected thereon any dwelling-house otherwise than in substitution for those already upon the holding at the time of the passing of this Act."

By section 3 of the Act it is enacted, inter alia, that when a crofter has broken any of the statutory conditions set forth in sec. 1, "he shall forfeit his tenancy, and shall be liable to be removed in manner provided by the 4th section of the Act of Sederunt anent removing of the 14th day of December 1756."

No. 107.

Mar. 16, 1888.
Lord Abinger v. Cameron.

pation or possession of the same, the present action is unfounded, and the pursuer is not entitled to remove him from his holding.

The following was the result of the proof, as expressed in the first four findings of fact in the Sheriff (Ivory's) interlocutor, which were afterwards adhered to by the Court:—"(1) That in 1875 Angus MacIntyre was engaged as a servant by the defender's father to assist him in working the croft in question, which the defender's father then held as tenant of the pursuer, his wages being then £24 a-year and his board; and that for a period of about two years he lived in the same house with the defender and his father, and worked upon the croft; (2) that in 1877 MacIntyre married, and was then allowed by the defender's father to enter into possession of the house he now occupies, while he at the same time got the use of a cow's grass on the hill; but in consequence of these privileges his wages as a servant were reduced to £20; (3) that in 1879 the defender's father died, and the defender succeeded to the croft, and that for two years thereafter MacIntyre continued to occupy the house, and to work on the croft as the defender's servant for the same wages and on the same terms as during the two previous years; (4) that in 1881 there was less work for MacIntyre on the croft, in consequence of a part of the latter having been taken from the defender by the pursuer, and a new arrangement was entered into, under which MacIntyre engaged to serve the defender for a year, from Whitsunday to Whitsunday, at the reduced wages of £14, with the house and cow's grass as before, while he was to get in addition a small piece of the croft, consisting of arable ground of two acres or thereby, on part of which he planted potatoes and oats, and the remainder was kept in grass; that it was part of this arrangement that MacIntyre was to work on the defender's remaining portion of the croft all the year round whenever the defender required him; that when not working there, he was to work for the defender on the roads for which the latter was contractor; and that when the defender had no work for him either on his croft or on the roads, he was to be allowed to work for himself where he pleased"; and that this arrangement subsisted down to the date of the present action.

On 5th July 1887 "the defender's agent, after stating that 'the defender has not subdivided his holding or sublet any part thereof, and it appears to me that he has not committed a breach of any of the conditions created under section 1 of the Crofters Act 1886,' made the following offer:—'The defender is, notwithstanding, willing to remove MacIntyre, if Lord Abinger so wishes, but he would suggest that he should be allowed till Whitsunday to look out for a suitable place for himself and young family.'" This offer was not accepted.

On 15th September 1887 the Sheriff-substitute (Simpson) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defender, who is a 'crofter' within the meaning of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, has, without the consent in writing of his landlord, the pursuer, subdivided the holding occupied by him, the defender, under the pursuer at Unachan, Inverlochy, in contravention of the statutory condition, or the part thereof relating to subdivision of holdings, set forth in subsection 4, section 1, of the said Act, and has thereby forfeited his tenancy of the said holding: Therefore repels the defences, and ordains the defender to remove from his holding under the authority of the 3d section of the statute and in terms of the conclusions of the petition, and decerns."

The defender appealed to the Sheriff (Ivory), who, on 19th October, recalled the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and assoilzied the defender.*

---

* The Sheriff's interlocutor was as follows:—"Recalls the interlocutor appealed

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—There was undoubtedly subdivision of the croft here. MacIntyre had a part of the against: Finds in point of fact—[Here followed the four findings in fact quoted above]—(5) that at the date of the passing of the Crofters Act, viz., 25th June 1886, the said small piece of arable ground did not form part of the defender's holding in the sense of the Act, but the same was then held, occupied, and used by MacIntyre, as it had been since 1881, as part of the privileges enjoyed by him as servant of the defender; (6) that from the year 1881, when the said arrangement was entered into down to 30th June 1887, when the present action was raised, MacIntyre continued to act as defender's servant from year to year under the arrangement entered into in 1881, and enjoyed the privileges thereby conferred on him, the only difference being that at Whitsunday 1886 MacIntyre himself, with the defender's consent, became contractor for a small portion of the roads in the neighbourhood, but he had another man assisting him in carrying out his own contract, so that the latter did not interfere in any way with his duly carrying out his contract of service with the defender: Finds in law, in the circumstances above stated, that the pursuer is not entitled to remove the defender from his holding in respect that the latter has not subdivided or sublet his holding, or any part thereof, since the date of the passing of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, and has not contravened any of the statutory conditions of the said Act, and, separatim, in respect that even if the defender had so subdivided or sublet his holding, or any part thereof, the same having been let to a person in the employment of the defender (who was a tenant of the landlord) is especially exempted from the application of the Act by the 33d section thereof: Therefore sustains the defences, assoilzies the defender, and decerns."

---

The following note was annexed to the interlocutor:—"NOTE.—It was contended on the part of the pursuer at the debate that MacIntyre was not a servant of the defender at the date of the passing of the Act. The pursuer's agent, however, admitted (though at first he declined to give any opinion on the matter) that MacIntyre was a servant during the defender's father's lifetime, and for two years thereafter down to 1881. But he maintained that a substantial change took place in 1881, and again in 1886, when MacIntyre took a road contract for himself; and that, at the latter date at all events, MacIntyre ceased to be a servant of the defender. After giving the evidence the most careful consideration, the Sheriff has arrived at the conclusion that from 1875 down to the present time MacIntyre was bona fide employed by the defender and his father as a servant on the croft, that he was bound to work, and did in point of fact work thereon whenever he was required to do so, and that, looking to the more important engagements of the defender otherwise, the work of the croft could not have been satisfactorily performed without the aid of MacIntyre or another duly qualified servant.

"It was contended further that, assuming MacIntyre to have been employed as a servant of the defender at the passing of the Crofters Act, that Act prohibits all subdivision or subletting, whether to servants, members of the family, or others; and that by subletting the house and small piece of ground to MacIntyre, the defender had broken one of the statutory conditions of the Act, and is in consequence, along with his family and subtenants, liable to be removed summarily from the croft.

"The Sheriff is of opinion that this contention is unsound. By section 33 of the Crofters Act it is provided that nothing in this Act shall apply to any holding or building let to a person during his continuance in any office, appointment, or employment of the landlord, 'or of any tenant of the landlord.' Now, the defender is tenant of the landlord, and the piece of ground or holding is let to MacIntyre, who is in the employment of the defender. The Act, therefore, is specially declared not to apply to such a holding as that of MacIntyre.

"It was maintained that section 33 does not apply to holdings let to their servants by crofters, but only to those let to servants by tenants whose farms are above £30 rental. There is nothing in the Act, however, to support this

No. 107.
—
Mar. 16, 1888.
Lord Abinger v. Cameron.

croft and a house situated on the croft given off to him. This subdivision admittedly began before the passing of the Act, but it was illegal ab initio, subleases being prohibited by the estate regulations. The Act could not have been intended to make illegal acts on the part of the tenant legal. But there was sublease here as well as subdivision. The relation of MacIntyre to Cameron was that of tenant to landlord, though he did not pay a money rent but gave a consideration in the form of services. The sublease was one from year to year, and was continued by tacit relocation. By allowing possession under tacit relocation to go on, the defender had really entered yearly into new subleases, and, therefore, whatever was the character of the sublease before the Act passed, each renewal of it subsequent to that date was in contravention of the Act. Section 33* was not intended for cases of this sort. The object of the whole Act was to prevent the multiplication of crofts, and section 33 was enacted in order to make it possible for a landlord or a tenant of a landlord to put a servant into a cottage without running the risk of not being able to put him out unless he committed a contravention. This was not a case of that kind. "Tenant" of the landlord could not mean "crofter." The two words were sharply opposed throughout the Act.

---

view, while section 33 clearly excludes from the application of the Act any holding whatever let to any servant or other person in the employment of any tenant of the landlord, whether the annual rent of such tenant is above or below £30.

"There is, moreover, no reason why servants of tenants whose rental is above £30 should be differently treated from servants of tenants whose rental is below that sum, and keeping in view the object and spirit of the Act, it must be presumed that it was intended to exclude all servants alike from claiming the benefit of it.

"Again, if section 33 of the Act was held not to apply to holdings let to servants of crofters, there is nothing to prevent these servants maintaining that they come within the definition of 'crofters' in section 34 of the Act, and that they are entitled to the privileges of crofters.

"Further, the contention of the pursuer necessarily leads to this, that no male crofter, however old, and no female crofter, however infirm, could give to a shepherd, ploughman, or other servant, the privileges usually accorded to such parties, of a house, cow's grass, and piece of potato ground on the croft, without committing a breach of the statutory conditions. In point of fact, if the pursuer's contention is sound, the provision against subdivision would have the effect of seriously injuring the crofters' interests, by preventing their working their crofts to the best advantage, instead of benefiting them, as it was undoubtedly intended to do.

"Lastly, before the defender can be held to have broken the statutory condition in regard to subdividing or subletting his holding, it must be clearly established that he did so subsequent to the date of the passing of the Act. It is clearly proved, however, that the subdivision or subletting by the defender to MacIntyre took place five years before the passing of the Act. At the date of the passing of the Act, and for five years prior thereto, the house and piece of ground let to MacIntyre were held, occupied, and possessed by him, and not by the defender. These subjects therefore did not then form any part of the defender's 'holding' in the sense of the Act. The defender's holding remained still the same as it was when the Act was passed, and there had been no subdivision or subletting of it since. On the whole, therefore, the Sheriff is of opinion that the Crofter Act does not apply to the present case, and that the pursuer cannot, under its provisions, insist on having the defender removed from his croft."

* Sec. 33 of the Act enacts,—"Nothing in this Act shall apply to any holding or building let to a person during his continuance in any office, appointment, or employment of the landlord, or of any tenant of the landlord," &c.

No. 107.
—
Mar. 16, 1888.
Lord Abinger
v. Cameron.

Argued for the defender;—The first section of the Act was only intended to cover contraventions committed after the passing of the Act. The words "shall not" in the subsection indicated future acts, and the enactment with regard to dwelling-houses at the end of the subsection could only refer to houses to be erected for the first time after that date. There was no subdivision here. That word under the general scope of the Act meant subdivision amongst the various members of a family. MacIntyre was simply a servant, and he could not insist upon staying in the occupancy of the house or potato ground a day longer than he remained in the defender's service. MacIntyre being his servant, and he being a tenant of the landlord, section 33 applied to the case.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an application to the Sheriff to have it found that the defender having, without consent of his landlord in writing, subdivided his holding has forfeited it, and there is also a prayer for his removal. The application is founded on sec. 1, subsec. 4, of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, which provides that "the crofter shall not, without the consent of his landlord in writing, subdivide his holding or sublet the same or any part thereof." If the proceeding complained of in the present application had been taken after the passing of the Act, I should have been inclined to hold, and indeed would have held without difficulty, that there had been subdivision of the croft. But the circumstances of the case are very peculiar, for what is said to amount to subdivision was something which was done before the Act was passed. The question therefore is whether where the Act at its passing found the croft in a particular state of occupation, it is intended that the crofter shall forfeit his right because of something which was done before that date, and which was, for the first time, forbidden to be done by the Act.

The facts seem to me to be very well brought out in the cross-examination of the defender, where he says,—"My father had the croft for about twenty years before his death. MacIntyre was engaged as a servant for my father through me in or about the year 1875. His wages were £24 a-year. They were paid in cash, and he lived in the same house with my father and myself. About two years afterwards MacIntyre married and we gave him the house that he now occupies. After his marriage we gave him £20 wages together with the house that he now occupies, and also a cow's grass on the hill. He however did not use the privilege of cow's grass for some time after his marriage, because he had not the means to purchase a cow. He did not get the arable land till about six years ago. Till that time, namely, six years ago, the money wages continued to be £20. Up till 1881 he planted his potatoes along with my own. Up to that time he did all the work of the croft. When the work of the croft would permit I employed him to work for me on the roads. At one time we had the whole of Macarthur's croft, but in 1881 part of it, namely, one-third, was taken from us and given to the inspector of the poor. This reduced the work of the croft, and the rent was reduced by fifty shillings, leaving the rent as at present £17, 16s. There being thus less work to do, MacIntyre and myself agreed that the wages should be reduced from £20 to £14, at which sum they stand at present. He is bound to work for me on the croft whenever I require him all the year round, and when he is not working at the croft he is bound to work for me at the roads. When I have no work for him on the croft or on the roads MacIntyre is allowed to work for himself where he pleases. He has had the arable ground, about an acre to an acre and a-half, above referred to during these six years. His engagement with me is from year to year counting from Whitsunday . . . There has been no change in the management of the croft, or in my relations with MacIntyre during the last six years."

I think the account he gives there quite fairly represents the situation. There is no evidence to contradict it. The position of MacIntyre was just that of a servant of the crofter, and he was allowed to occupy a house which was on the croft for six years prior to the passing of the Act. With that house he had certain potato ground, which was part of the croft, and leave to graze a cow. He was a servant to the extent and so long as the crofter required his services, and when his services were not required he could work for himself. This was the state of possession when the Act passed, and the question comes to be whether anything has been done subsequently in violation of the Act. Only one plausible argument has been advanced for that view, viz., that this man must be taken to be a subtenant of the crofter, and that he is possessing this house on tacit relocation from year to year, and that the crofter by permitting this tacit relocation to go on is in fact subdividing or subletting part of his croft. Now, looking to the nature of the arrangement, it does not appear to me that MacIntyre is really in the position of a subtenant. He occupies the house simply as part of his remuneration as a servant, and as soon as he ceases to be a servant his right of occupation will also cease. No doubt it would be quite fair if he were dismissed that his occupation should not end at a day's notice, and he might probably in fairness be entitled to remain till the next term. That, however, does not make him any the more a subtenant. He was originally engaged at £24 of wages; that was subsequently reduced to £20, when he got a portion of the croft for his use; and now his wages are £14. I do not think all this constitutes a violation of the Act. I think it could only be held to be so on a strained construction of the words of the Act. It is plain that in the case of a crofter erecting a new house, and thereby incurring forfeiture, the statute contemplated the erection of a house after the passing of the Act, for it says also in sec. 1, subsec. 4, that he shall not erect a new house "otherwise than in substitution for those already upon the holding at the time of the passing of the Act," and looking at the way in which subdivision of the croft and the erection of new houses are slumped together in this subsection, it is evident that both operations are to have the same point of time, viz., the passing of the Act. I therefore agree with the Sheriff in his decision, though I am not disposed to affirm all the holdings in his interlocutor.

Lord Adam.—The Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff have come to opposite conclusions in this case, and we would therefore naturally infer that it is a case of some difficulty. I think it is. The subsection in question says that a crofter shall not subdivide his croft, and the question comes to be, has he done so here? I confess that I entertain no doubt that the croft has been subdivided. If a crofter gives another person a right to a house situated on the croft, and to the use of some acres of the ground of the croft, and he enters and possesses those parts of the holding, I think that is subdivision. I have no doubt on that point, and it is of no consequence whether the return is made in the form of rent or of services done, or if nothing be given in return at all. Further, I have no doubt that sec. 33 has nothing to do with the case, and therefore I cannot agree with the Sheriff on that point. I think, further, that it is clear that subsec. 4 of sec. 1 points to future and not to past acts, and therefore I am of opinion that the fact of this croft having been subdivided does not infer liability to forfeiture on the part of the crofter. It was not the intention of the Act that a mere continuance of a previous subdivision of the croft should give ground for forfeiture, for if it were the Act and the forfeiture would be simultaneous. Therefore, that view of the statute will not do.

That brings me to the difficulty of the case, viz., whether the defender has done anything since the passing of the Act amounting to subdivision. The only thing that can be said for that view is that his agreement with MacIntyre was one from year to year, and that he might have put an end to it at any period before Whitsunday 1887. He has not done that, and the whole question is whether that is equivalent to granting a new agreement to the old effect. I cannot put that interpretation on Cameron's actings. It was not the intention of the Legislature to interfere summarily with subdivisions made previous to the passing of the Act, but to prevent such things being done in the future. In my opinion, therefore, the defender has done nothing subsequent to the passing of the Act in the way of subdivision. The Sheriff has, I think, reached the right conclusion, but has given wrong reasons for doing so.

LORD KINNEAR.—I cannot agree with the Sheriff in finding that the piece of ground occupied by MacIntyre was not a part of this holding. I think it was part of the croft, because sec. 33 of the Act has no application to the circumstances of the case. But disregarding that ground of judgment I agree with your Lordships in thinking that the 4th subsection of section 1 has not been violated by Cameron. The section prohibits certain things being done on pain of forfeiture of the holding, but I think that Cameron has done nothing to incur that penalty. It is not impossible that a crofter might infringe it by making an arrangement for continuing an occupation which was legal before the Act passed; but there is nothing of that kind here, and what he proposed to do when he was challenged by the landlord seems to me very reasonable. He said, I am not satisfied that I am bound to remove MacIntyre, but I would suggest that he should be allowed to remain till the next term. I do not think that in making that answer he violated the Act, and there is nothing else that he has done that in my opinion amounts to contravention of its provisions.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuse the appeal, and adhere to the interlocutor of the Sheriff of 19th October 1887 in so far as regards the first, second, third, and fourth findings in fact: Quoad ultra recall the said interlocutor: Find in law that the defender has not subdivided his croft since the passing of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, within the true meaning of section 1, subsection 4, of the said Act: Therefore of new assoilzie the defender, and decern: Find the defender entitled to expenses in both Courts."

DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 108. MRS R. E. MACLAINE OR MAQUAY, Petitioner.—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—Jameson.

Mar. 17, 1888. Maquay v. Campbell.

JOHN CAMPBELL, Respondent.—D.-F. Mackintosh—Murray.

Parent and Child—Guardianship and custody of children—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (Act 49 and 50 Vict. cap. 27), sec. 5.—A widow who had three children by her first marriage—two girls and a boy—married a British subject who was engaged in business in Florence, and she and her husband thereafter permanently settled there. A petition at her instance to have her daughters, who were in pupillarity, delivered to her was resisted by their uncle, their tutor-nominate, with whom they were at that time residing in Scotland. The Court, having regard to the provisions of the 5th section of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886,* granted the prayer of the petition.

1ST DIVISION. B.

MISS ROSA ELIZABETH MACLAINE was married to William Macbean Rankine of Dudhope on 8th July 1874. Mr Rankine died on 31st October 1879. There were three children of the marriage—(1) Violet Campbell Rankine, born 28th April 1876; (2) Walter Lorne Campbell Rankine, born 4th July 1877; and (3) Muriel Campbell Rankine, born 25th September 1878.

By antenuptial marriage-contract between Mr and Mrs Rankine, John Campbell of Kilberry—Mr Rankine's elder brother—and three others were appointed trustees, and they were also nominated tutors and curators to the children of the marriage. Two of the trustees never accepted office nor acted as tutors, and the third having died Mr Campbell was then the only surviving and acting tutor.

On 5th July 1884 Mrs Rankine married a second husband, Mr William Maquay, a British subject in Florence, and a partner of a banking-house carrying on business in Florence, Rome, and Leghorn. At the time of her marriage she sent her elder daughter, who had been with her in Italy, back to this country,—to join the other children who were under their uncle's care at Kilberry, in Argyllshire,—with the intention of taking all of them to Italy when she was settled in her new home.

Notwithstanding repeated requests Mr Campbell had ever since refused to allow the children to reside with their mother. She now brought this petition asking that the Court should ordain him to deliver the two girls to her, and should direct that the boy, who was at school in England, should spend his Christmas holidays in each year with her.

She founded upon the provisions of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 27).*

---

* 49 and 50 Vict. c. 27, sec. 2, enacted that "on the death of the father of an infant, and in case the father shall have died prior to the passing of this Act, then, from and after the passing of this Act, the mother, if surviving, shall be the guardian of such infant, either alone when no guardian has been appointed by the father, or jointly with any guardian appointed by the father. . . ."

The 3d section (subsection 3) enacted that "in the event of the guardians being unable to agree upon a question affecting the welfare of an infant, any of them may apply to the Court for its direction, and the Court may make such an order or orders regarding the matters in difference as it shall think proper."

The 5th section enacted that "the Court may, upon the application of the mother of any infant (who may apply without next friend), make such order as it may think fit regarding the custody of such infant, and the right of access thereto of either parent, having regard to the welfare of the infant, and to the conduct of the parents, and to the wishes as well of the mother as of the father, and may alter, vary, or discharge such order on the application of either parent, or, after the death of either parent, of any guardian under this Act. . . ."

The 8th section enacted,—"In the application of this Act to Scotland the word 'guardian' shall mean tutor, and the word 'infant' shall mean pupil."

In his answers Mr Campbell submitted that the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, did not justify the application, and he stated,—"The respondent has always been perfectly willing that the children should be with the petitioner when she is for a time in this country, and she has never been refused their society on such occasions, but he does not think it right, in the interests of the children, that they should be sent out of the country and the jurisdiction of the Court. He is aware that their late father objected to children being brought up abroad." He further stated that the children were being educated and brought up along with his children.

Argued for the petitioner;—In the circumstances the petitioner was entitled to the custody of the children—whether at common law or not—certainly under the provisions of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, above quoted.

Argued for the respondent;—By the old law a mother was disqualified from being the guardian of her children by a first marriage by entering into a second.[1] The Infants Act of 1886 did not alter that rule. Further, the old practice was, if the mother was allowed the custody of her children, not to permit the children to be taken out of the jurisdiction, even to England. Here it was proposed to take them to a foreign country.

Lord President.—I am for granting the prayer of this petition, looking to the provisions of the 5th section of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886. That section provides that "the Court may, upon the application of the mother of any infant (who may apply without next friend), make such order as it may think fit regarding the custody of such infant, and the right of access thereto of either parent, having regard to the welfare of the infant, and to the conduct of the parents, and to the wishes as well of the mother as of the father, and may alter, vary, or discharge such order on the application of either parent, or, after the death of either parent, of any guardian under this Act. . . ." The circumstances of the present case are very simple. The mother of the two girls has entered into a second marriage, and, her husband being a banker in Florence, she naturally resides with him. The question is, whether it is best for the interests of the children, and most suitable for them in the circumstances of the case, that they should reside with their mother or with their uncle at Kilberry. I cannot say that I have any doubt that the fitting and appropriate place for them is with their mother. If there had been any imputation against the character of the mother, or anything in the circumstances to render her unfit to be their guardian,—I use the term in its popular and not in its legal sense,—the Court would give great weight to such considerations. But there is nothing of that kind alleged. I think, therefore, that the natural and proper course is that the girls should be given over to their mother, and that the boy should spend his Christmas holidays with her, as she asks.

Lord Adam.—I entirely agree with your Lordship, and, while I concur in thinking that we should grant the prayer of the petition under the 5th section of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, I do not express any opinion on the question whether a mother is disqualified from acting as guardian to her children by the fact of her entering into a second marriage.

---

[1] Erskine's Inst. i. 7, 12 and 29; Speirs, Dec. 23, 1854, 17 D. 289, 27 Scot. Jur. 122; Stuart, March 20, 1861, 23 D. 779; A B v. C D, July 19, 1850, 12 D. 1297, 22 Scot. Jur. 572.

No. 108. Mar. 17, 1888. Maquay v. Campbell.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

THE COURT granted the prayer of the petition.

F. J. MARTIN, W.S.—PEARSON, ROBERTSON, & FINLAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 109. Mar. 17, 1888. Taylor v. Rutherford.

ROBERT AITON TAYLOR, Pursuer (Respondent).—Darling—G. W. Burnet.
ALEXANDER C. RUTHERFORD, Defender (Reclaimer).—Gloag—Shaw.

Reparation—Agent and Client—Wrongous use of diligence—Debt collector—Slander—Publication of decrees of Court of Justice.—A debt collector was employed by a creditor to collect a debt. Having failed to do so he employed a law-agent, who used arrestments against the debtor on the dependence of an action subsequently raised in the creditor's name against him in the Sheriff Court. The debtor was then outwith the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, and was not duly cited. Decree in absence was obtained, and arrestments in execution used against him. The debt collector then published in a "Commercial Compendium," for which it was alleged he was responsible, a bare statement that the decree had been obtained against the debtor for the amount of the debt in question. The decree in absence was subsequently recalled on the ground of improper citation. In an action for damages at the instance of the debtor against the debt collector for wrongous use of diligence, and wrongful publication of the decree in absence in the knowledge that it had been improperly obtained, held, on the averments, (1) that the defender was merely an intermediary between the client and the law-agent, and was not responsible for the errors of the latter; and (2) that the defender not being responsible for the obtaining of the decree was not liable in damages for publishing the fact that it had been granted. The action was therefore (rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren, who had allowed issues) dismissed as irrelevant.

1ST DIVISION. Lord M'Laren. M.

[SEE Taylor v. M'Dougall & Sons, July 15, 1885, 12 R. 1304.]

On 19th December 1887 Robert Aiton Taylor, Trinity, near Edinburgh, raised an action against Alexander C. Rutherford, manager and secretary of the Glasgow and West of Scotland Guardian Society, Glasgow, concluding for damages.

He averred that in 1884 he was head clerk to an insurance company in Glasgow, and that in April of that year he was made joint secretary to the Caledonian Insurance Company at their Liverpool office, and removed there on the 8th of the same month:—(Cond. 7) "The defender carries on business at No. 145 Queen Street, Glasgow, and styles himself 'manager and secretary' of a concern which he calls and advertises as 'The Glasgow and West of Scotland Guardian Society for the Protection of Trade.' It is believed and averred that there is no such society in existence, but that this title is merely a name under which the defender carries on, solely for his own behoof and profit, the business of an ordinary debt collector." That when the pursuer left Glasgow he was owing M'Dougall & Sons an account of £30. (Cond. 8) "On the 24th May 1884, and while the pursuer was in Liverpool attending to his duties, the defender caused a debts recovery summons to be raised against the pursuer at the instance of M'Dougall & Sons, and served at his former residence, No. 91 Claremont Street, Glasgow, which was then in the occupation of Mr Gatow, and on the dependence of this action he, on the same day, which was a Saturday, caused a portion of the pursuer's furniture, which was then in process of removal, to be arrested at the Caledonian Railway Station in the hands of the contractor who was removing same, and of said railway company." (Cond. 9) "At the time when he received instructions to recover the said rent and trade debt, the defender was informed by his clients, and was himself well aware, that the pursuer had left his Glasgow house animo non revertendi, and that his domicile was in England, and he knew the pursuer's address, and that he was joint secretary in Liverpool of the Caledonian Insurance Company, of which company the defender was an agent; but, notwithstanding such knowledge, he caused the summons to be served at the pursuer's dwelling-house after he had left it, and after his furniture and effects were out of it and another tenant was in possession. He also caused the sheriff-officer employed by him to serve the summons,—who is one of his employees, and has no separate business of his own,—to watch the removal of the pursuer's furniture during the said 24th May 1884, until it had been transferred to the Caledonian Railway Station in Glasgow, addressed to the pursuer for transit to him at Liverpool, and there to arrest the said furniture on the dependence of the action; and on 2d June 1884 he moved for and obtained decree in absence against the pursuer for the amount of said account, and immediately thereafter arrested the furniture above referred to in the hands of the Caledonian Railway Company on said decree. The pursuer knew nothing of all this procedure, nor that a decree in absence was being obtained against him, till on or about the 4th of June, when he received a telegram from his brother informing him that his name was published as a defaulting debtor in Stubbs & Company's paper of that same date, and in other papers of a similar nature, commonly known as the 'Black Lists.' In particular, publication of the pursuer's name was made by the defender in one of those lists called 'The Commercial Compendium,' purporting to issue from the said Glasgow Guardian Society. The said 'Compendium' is compiled, printed, and published, or at all events is issued and circulated, by or on behalf of the defender for his own behoof and profit; and he maliciously and wrongfully, and in the full knowledge that said decree in absence against the pursuer had been wrongously and illegally obtained, furnished the information whereby the said decree in absence was published in said lists. The papers referred to contain the names and addresses of debtors against whom decrees in absence have passed, and are well known and extensively circulated amongst and read by tradesmen and commercial and professional men all over the United Kingdom." That on 16th July 1884 the Sheriff-substitute, on the ground that the defender had not been duly cited, recalled the decree, dismissed the action, and found the said M'Dougall & Sons liable to the pursuer in expenses.

The pursuer further averred that all the proceedings complained of were taken "in mala fide, recklessly, oppressively, maliciously, and without any just or necessary cause by the defender for his own ends, and ultimately for the purpose of gratifying the malice he entertained towards the pursuer by ruining his credit and prospects in life, and the defender is liable to the pursuer for the loss, injury, and damage resulting to him therefrom, and for solatium in respect thereof."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender, while in knowledge of the pursuer's permanent removal from Glasgow, and of his address in Liverpool, having raised and served the said action, and taken the decree condescended on, without having given to the pursuer any citation or intimation of the dependence thereof, the same, and the subsequent proceedings therein, were illegal, nimious, oppressive, and wrongful. (3) The defender having published the said decree in absence against the pursuer, or having issued and circulated it in the full knowledge that the same had been wrongously and illegally obtained, to the great loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer, the pursuer is entitled to reparation therefor, as concluded for. (4) The said publication having been made maliciously and without probable cause by the defender, to the great hurt and prejudice of the pursuer, he is entitled to reparation as concluded for.

No. 109.

Mar. 17, 1888.
Taylor v.
Rutherford.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No relevant case.

On 25th February 1888 the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) approved three issues for the pursuer.

The defender reclaimed to the First Division.

When the case was heard counsel for the pursuer made sundry alterations on the issues proposed by him. The form in which they were finally proposed was—" 1. Whether, on or about 24th May 1884, the defender wrongfully used or caused to be used arrestments against the pursuer in the hands of the Caledonian Railway Company on the dependence of a summons raised in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire against the pursuer at the instance of Messrs M'Dougall & Sons, china merchants, Glasgow, for the sum of £30, 15s. 0½d. sterling, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? (2) Whether, on or about 2d June 1884, the defender, in execution of a decree in absence in the said Sheriff Court, obtained on or about said date, at the instance of the said Messrs M'Dougall & Sons against the pursuer for the said sum of £30, 15s. 0½d., wrongfully arrested certain articles, or parts of articles of furniture, belonging to the pursuer, or caused the same to be arrested, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? (3) Whether, on or about 5th June 1884, the defender, in the knowledge that the foresaid decree in absence had been illegally and unwarrantably obtained, wrongfully published the pursuer's name, or caused it to be published in a publication called the 'Commercial Compendium' issued by or for him, as a person against whom the said decree had been obtained, in the form contained in the schedule annexed hereto, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?"

Argued for the defender;—The action was not relevant, and therefore the issues should be disallowed. There was no relevant averment on record of malice and want of probable cause, which was necessary in such a case. There was no specific averment of malice,[1] and that there was probable cause was evident.[2] The summons disclosed the fact that the debt existed on which the action was raised, and as matter of fact it was paid after the decree in absence was obtained. All that appeared on the averments in the present action was that the defender was employed as a debt collector to collect the debt, that failing to do so, he employed a law-agent to take the necessary steps, and that he raised the action. The defender was simply acting on instructions,—that was admitted in the action against M'Dougall & Sons (12 R. 1304); and he having put the matter into the hands of a law-agent, could not be held responsible for his error. If the defender was not liable in damages for thus putting the matter into the hands of an agent to raise an action for a debt due, the arrestments on the dependence and on execution, with which the first two issues dealt, were only steps in that process, and he could not be held responsible for them either.[3] It was not alleged that the defender gave the order for the use of the arrestments. Further, the pursuer here had discharged any claims against M'Dougall & Sons for these proceedings, and having discharged the principal he could not now go against the agent.[4] Such multiplication of actions for one delict ought not to be allowed.[5] There was no case in the books in which an action of this kind was allowed against a client and his agent where the agent was not a law-agent, though it was admitted that both the client and his law-agent were responsible for wrongous use of diligence, and that in such cases malice and want of probable cause need not be averred.[1] But the circumstances here took the case out of the rule of Smith & Company's case. On the third issue he argued;—The mere publication of the fact that a decree in absence had been obtained against a person could not afford a ground of action.[2] The records of such decrees were open to any of the public who chose to inspect them under the provisions of the Debts Recovery Act. In Andrews' [2] case, what made the action relevant was the "caution" issued along with the list of persons against whom decrees in absence had been obtained. If the defender was not liable for the use of the diligence or responsible for the raising of the action, he was simply in the position of any other member of the public who published a record of a proceeding in open Court.

---

[1] Scott v. Turnbull, July 18, 1884, 11 R. 1131.

[2] Craig v. Peebles, Feb. 16, 1876, 3 R. 441.

[3] Wolthekker v. Northern Agricultural Co., Dec. 20, 1862, 1 Macph. 211, 35 Scot. Jur. 156.

[4] Ersk. Inst. iii. 1, 15.

[5] Stevenson v. Pontifex & Wood, Dec. 7, 1887, ante, p. 125.

Argued for the pursuer;—The action was relevant. The rule, settled by a long series of cases of which Smith & Co. v. Taylor [3] was the last, settled that both client and agent were responsible for wrongous use of diligence, and that malice and want of probable cause need not be put in issue; that only required to be done when the proceedings were regular and all that was bad was the claim on which they were taken. Here it was admitted that the citation was bad, and therefore that rule did not apply. It was not to the point that the foundation of the action was a just debt, because that was held not to be a relevant answer in Smith & Co.'s case. Further, the pursuer was out of the jurisdiction when the action was raised. The Supreme Court would have had jurisdiction in respect of the house of which the pursuer was tenant, but the Sheriff had none.[4] [LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer appeared in the action and did not plead want of jurisdiction.] That could not cure want of jurisdiction ab initio. Mere appearance could not create jurisdiction. The defender was really the client's agent here; he was looked to to collect the debt, and the action was in fact raised by him, i.e., under his orders. The discharge of the principal did not free the defender. There was joint delinquency, and the delinquents could properly be proceeded against separately.[5] There was no parallel between this case and that of joint cautioners. On the third issue he argued;—The gravamen of the charge here was that the defender, in full knowledge of the fact that this decree in absence had been obtained against a person over whom the Sheriff had no jurisdiction, and who had not been duly cited, published the decree as if it had been properly obtained. Such publication was calculated to injure, and in point of fact did injure, the pursuer.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The main complaint which is made in this case by the pursuer is, that there has been a wrongous use of diligence, first as regards the arrestments used upon the dependence of the action raised against him at the instance of M'Dougall & Sons, and second with reference to the arrestments in execution of the decree in absence obtained against him on 2d June 1884. Now, it may be observed that the law-agent who carried through these proceedings is not made a party to the present action, and we know nothing about him. This action is directed solely against a debt collector who was employed by M'Dougall & Sons to collect the debt due to them by the pursuer. That this

---

[1] Smith & Co. v. Taylor, Dec. 8, 1882, 10 R. 291.

[2] Andrews v. Drummond & Graham, March 5, 1887, 14 R. 568.

[3] 10 R. 291.

[4] M'Bey v. Knight, Nov. 22, 1879, 7 R. 255.

[5] Western Bank v. Baird, March 20, 1862, 24 D. 859, 34 Scot. Jur. 435.

No. 109.

Mar. 17, 1888.
Taylor v. Rutherford.

debt was justly due to M'Dougall & Sons there can be no doubt, for it was afterwards paid by the pursuer. But the objection to the proceedings upon which diligence was used is that at the time the action was raised the pursuer was not residing in Glasgow, and could not be cited in the Sheriff Court, except by edictal citation, perhaps not even in that way.

That the pursuer was not duly cited to this action appears from what followed to be quite clear, and the result of the defective citation was to render the subsequent proceedings invalid. Upon that matter there can be no doubt, and the decree in absence was accordingly recalled.

The peculiarity of the present action is its being directed against the defender, who was merely employed to collect the debt, and I have very great doubts in the circumstances about the relevancy of this claim. The office of a debt collector is a simple one. He receives instructions from the creditor to collect the debt, and perhaps there is implied in the instructions authority also to employ a law-agent if he finds himself unable otherwise to recover the money. The client is liable for everything done under his authority by the law-agent, while on the other hand the law-agent is liable for any mistake by which a third party has been subjected to a legal wrong.

In the present case the defender obeyed the instructions which had been given to him, and the proceedings which are objected to were carried through by a properly qualified law-agent acting upon information duly conveyed to him from M'Dougall & Sons. No doubt a mistake was made by this law-agent in connection with the present pursuer's citation, a mistake for which he is responsible, and so is his client. But the wrong which the present defender is said to have committed I can neither comprehend nor define, and I must say that I have not heard any intelligible definition of it as yet from the pursuer's counsel. What I have already said therefore disposes of the first and second issues.

With regard to the third issue—assuming that there was no fault on the part of the defender—and from what I have already said I do not think there was—upon what ground is he to be made liable if he neither committed the wrong nor was responsible for it? He is alleged to be the proprietor of a publication called the "Commercial Compendium," in which, among other things, are published decrees in absence, and the complaint is that the decree obtained against the present pursuer was published in it.

Now, assuming that the defender here is in no way liable for this decree having been obtained, then there is no ground for this third issue. The mere statement of the fact that decree in absence had been obtained against the pursuer is not a libel. The fact that decree in absence was obtained against the pursuer, and the publishing of this fact, is not a thing for which the defender can be made responsible. I am therefore for disallowing all these issues.

Lord Adam.—There is no doubt that in conformity with all the decisions a client and his law-agent are both responsible for any wrong suffered through the wrongous use of diligence. Such cases follow the ordinary rule in cases of damages. The servant whose neglect causes the wrong is liable, and the person instructing him is also liable, because the act was done by his authority. But the defender here is in neither of those positions. His position was accurately defined by Mr Darling when he said that he was an intermediary. He was acting under instructions to recover a debt; he took the necessary steps to do so, and having failed to recover it himself, he employed a law-agent to raise an action for it. I cannot see how he can be held liable. I therefore agree that the first two issues must be disallowed. The case would be different if it had appeared that the defender in raising this action had acted simply for his own purposes, and not on the instructions of his employer. There are some statements in the record which go to raise that question, but they were not insisted on.

No. 109.

Mar. 17, 1888.
Taylor v. Rutherford.

I also agree that the third issue should be disallowed. All the defender did was to publish an extract of the decree in absence, and it probably appeared among a list of a dozen others. This issue, I think, depends upon the other issues, and as they are disallowed, I think this one must follow them.

LORD KINNEAR.—I think the averments on record come to nothing but this, that the defender, acting on instructions, employed a law-agent to raise an action for the recovery of a just debt, and that in the course of the proceedings raised by the law-agent there was at least one irregularity for which the client and the law-agent were both responsible. If the averments could be read as meaning that in course of these proceedings the defender had without authority interfered, and maliciously done all that is stated on record, the case would have been different. But I cannot find any averment on record that that was the case. He was just an intermediary—a messenger between the client and his law-agent—and to say that he made himself responsible for the agent's faults by acting in that capacity is, I think, out of the question.

The third issue necessarily follows the other two, and therefore falls to be disallowed.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

THE COURT disallowed the issues, and dismissed the action as irrelevant.

FODD, SIMPSON, & MARWICK, W.S.—P. MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 110.

Mar. 20, 1888.
Thoms v. Bain.

MRS M. I. J. MACLAREN OR THOM AND HUSBAND, Pursuers.—Rhind—Craigie.

DAVID DORWARD BAIN, Defender.—Gloag—C. N. Johnston.

Process—Mandatary—Extent of mandatary's powers.—A mandatary has no power to settle an action without special authority to do so.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Lee.
B.

MR GEORGE R. THOM, a merchant in Calcutta, and Miss Margaret I. J. Maclaren were married in Dundee on 10th May 1887. On the day before the marriage Mr Thom received a letter from Mr David Dorward Bain, in consequence of which, on 4th July following, his wife and he brought an action of damages for slander against the latter, concluding for £5000. The letter contained the foulest accusations and statements of and concerning Mrs Thom, and was intended to prevent the marriage.

Mr and Mrs Thom appointed Mr Hugh Patrick Davidson, commission merchant, Dundee, to be "our mandatary in the action which we have instituted against David Dorward Bain, . . . and we authorise and instruct you to prosecute and follow forth said action in the Court of Session, and to employ Mr R. Mitchell, solicitor, Perth, and such Edinburgh agents and counsel as to you may seem best."

A minute of tender was subsequently lodged for the defender, stating "that he admitted the statements in reference to the pursuer Mrs Thom, contained in the letter addressed by him to the pursuer Mr Thom, to be

No. 110.
——
Mar. 20, 1888.
Thoms v. Bain.

unfounded, and he withdrew the said statements, and expressed regret that they had been made. He further tendered to the pursuers the sum of 100 guineas, with expenses, in full of the claim made by them in the present action."

A formal agreement was afterwards, on 22d December 1887, executed between Mr Davidson and Mr Bain, in which the retractation and apology contained in the minute of tender were repeated, and the defender agreed to pay £200 to the pursuers.

The case, which had been set down for trial at the Christmas sittings 1887, was accordingly postponed, but at the instance of the pursuers, who repudiated the agreement between Davidson as their mandatary and Bain, it was again set down for trial at the Spring sittings 1888.

The case having been enrolled by the defender in the Single Bills, he argued that it could not proceed, as it had been settled by the agreement above quoted.

The Court then appointed Davidson to state in a minute whether he had any special authority from the pursuers, by letter or otherwise, to make the agreement referred to, and what communications, if any, he had had from the pursuers since its date.

It appeared from the minute which was lodged in obedience to that order, that Davidson, who was a brother-in-law of the pursuer, had had no special authority to make the agreement.

The defender, however, argued, that even apart from special instructions, a mandatary had power to settle a case. His mandate gave him the whole control of the cause, he being the person within the jurisdiction representing the party to the cause.[1] He had the full authority of an agent, and although it was not settled that an agent had power to compromise a case, still there was nothing against it. The pursuers in any case would have their remedy by an action against the mandatary for exceeding his powers,[2] but the compromise must stand, and the trial must in any case be postponed.

The pursuers argued that without special powers a mandatary had no authority to settle a case, and there were no such special powers here.

Lord President.—The only question is whether the trial is to be postponed, but in considering this question it is necessary to determine whether the mandatary had power to enter into the compromise which was carried through between him and the defender. If he had that power there is an end of the case. If he did not have that power what he has done in the way of settling the case must be taken as not done, and there is no obstacle in the way of proceeding to trial with it. The mandate is in these terms,—"We hereby appoint you our mandatary in the action which we have instituted against David Dorward Bain, . . . and we authorise and instruct you to prosecute and follow forth said action in the Court of Session, and to employ Mr R. Mitchell, solicitor, Perth, and such Edinburgh agents and counsel as to you may seem best." It is contended that this mandate implied an authority to settle as well as to prosecute and follow forth the case. But it appears to me that it is no part of the office of an ordinary mandatary to give up a client's case. No one could contend that he was entitled to abandon it. But if he were entitled to settle it, he might do so on such terms as would virtually amount to abandonment. No doubt a mandatary might be fortunate enough to effect a good settlement for the mandant, but such a settlement, in order to be effectual, must be adopted by the mandant.

---

[1] Overbury v. Peck, July 9, 1863, 1 Macph. 1058, 35 Scot. Jur. 604; Gunn & Co. v. Couper, Nov. 22, 1871, 10 Macph. 116, 44 Scot. Jur. 74; Begg on Law-Agents, 96, 97, and 98.

[2] Comrie v. Grigor, May 23, 1862, 24 D. 985, 34 Scot. Jur. 488.

The nature of the office of a mandatary has been frequently described, but nowhere better than in the opinion of Lord Kinloch in the case of Gunn & Co. v. Couper (10 Macph. 118),—"A mandatary without a mandate I consider to be none at all. I think with Lord Deas that the object of the proceeding is not only to make the mandatary liable for expenses, but also to secure a party responsible for the proper conduct of the cause, and for the availability of every step taken in Court. Without a mandate there is nothing binding on the alleged mandant." The definition of the duties of a mandatary is very fairly stated in these words. I do not think the power of a mandatary in the conduct of a case goes further.

I am of opinion that the agreement made by the mandatary in this case was not binding on his constituent, and that the pursuers are quite entitled to prosecute their case notwithstanding that arrangement. I say nothing about the nature of the arrangement, because I have thought it right to base my opinion upon broad grounds, but I can hardly conceive a settlement of a case less suitable to be made by a mandatary, without special authority in the absence of his principal, than that which has been embodied in this agreement. I never saw a more inadequate settlement. That being so, there is really nothing more to be said. The pursuers are entitled to go on with their case before a jury.

Lord Adam.—There are mandates and mandates by the law of Scotland. Where the principal is within the jurisdiction, a mandatary is sisted who is liable for the expenses of the cause. Then, where the principals are outwith the jurisdiction, mandataries are sisted—not with a view to expenses merely, but in order that there may be someone responsible for the conduct of the case. Such a mandatary, without special authority, has no power to settle a cause, and upon that ground I cannot agree with Mr Gloag's argument.

Lord Kinnear concurred.

Lord Mure and Lord Shand were absent.

The Court accordingly refused the motion.

Subsequently the case went to trial, when a verdict was returned for the pursuers, damages being assessed at £2500.

Begg & Bruce Low, S.S.C.—Henderson & Clark, W.S.—Agents.

No. 111.

Mar. 20, 1888.
Broad v. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co.

Harrington Evans Broad, Petitioner.—Murray.
Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company, Respondents.—Sir Ludovic Grant.

Process—Judicial Factor—Vacation—Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 57.—The powers conferred upon the Court by the 57th section of the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, for the appointment of an interim judicial factor cannot be exercised by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills during vacation.

1st Division.
B.

On 19th March 1888 a petition was presented to the Court by Mr Harrington Evans Broad, the holder of mortgages for £3370 and other sums due by the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company, incorporated under the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Act, 1884, for appointment of an interim judicial factor upon the undertaking in terms of

No. 111.
—
Mar. 20, 1888.
Broad v. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co.

the provisions of the 56th and 57th sections of the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845.*

It was argued for the petitioner that the decision in the case of the Glasgow, Garnkirk, and Coatbridge Railway Company,[1] in which it was held that such an appointment could not be made in vacation, did not now apply, in view of the provisions of the 4th and 10th sections of the Distribution of Business Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. c. 56).†

THE COURT were of opinion that the provisions of the Distribution of Business Act, 1857, could not be held to apply to the present case, which involved the exercise of a kind of diligence; but in respect that the company were represented at the bar and gave their consent, an interlocutor was pronounced appointing intimation, service, and answers, and, of consent, appointing Mr D. N. Cotton, C.A., to be interim judicial factor upon the undertaking and property of the company, and to receive the whole, or a competent part of the tolls, or sums liable in the payment of the interest payable on the mortgages mentioned in the petition, until the same, with all costs, shall be fully paid.

GRAHAM, JOHNSTON, & FLEMING, W.S., Agents.

No. 112.
—
Mar. 20, 1888.
Seville Sulphur and Copper Co. Limited, v. Colvils, Lowden, & Co.

THE SEVILLE SULPHUR AND COPPER COMPANY, LIMITED, Pursuers (Respondents).—Asher—Salvesen.

COLVILS, LOWDEN, & COMPANY, Defenders (Appellants).—Balfour—Ure.

Ship—Seaworthiness—Charter-party—Exceptions—"Errors or negligence of navigation."—A charter-party of a steamship freed the owners from liability through "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and/or errors or negligence of navigation, of whatsoever nature and kind, during said voyage." The vessel was lost in consequence of the breakdown of her boiler through the presence of muddy water in it. In an action by the charterers against the shipowners for damages on account of the loss of the cargo, held (1) that it was proved that the muddy water had been put in the boiler before the commencement of the voyage; (2) (dub. Lord Young) that the presence of muddy water in the boiler when the ship started rendered her unseaworthy; and consequently (3) that the clause of exemption in the charter-party did not apply.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

BY charter-party, dated Glasgow, 2d September 1886, it was mutually agreed between Colvils, Lowden, & Company, owners of the steamship "Ethelwolf," and the Seville Sulphur and Copper Company, Limited, of

---

* The 57th section of that Act provides,—"Every application for a judicial factor in the cases aforesaid shall be made to the Court of Session, and on any such application so made, and after hearing the parties, it shall be lawful for the said Court, by order in writing, to appoint some person to receive the whole or a competent part of the tolls or sums liable to the payment of such interest, or such principal and interest, as the case may be, until such interest, or until such principal and interest, as the case may be, together with all costs, including the charges of receiving the tolls or sums aforesaid, be fully paid . . ."

[1] The Glasgow, Garnkirk, and Coatbridge Railway Co. v. The Caledonian Railway Co., May 28, 1850, 12 D. 944.

† The 4th section of that Act provided (subsec. 4) that "petitions and applications for the appointment of judicial factors" should be disposed of before the Junior Lord Ordinary, and the 10th section provided that "the Lord Ordinary on the Bills during vacation shall have the same powers in regard to petitions for the appointment of . . . judicial factors as are by this Act conferred in relation thereto on the Junior Lord Ordinary as aforesaid."

No. 112.

—

Mar. 20, 1888.
Seville Sulphur and Copper Co. Limited, v. Colvils, Lowden, & Co.

Glasgow, inter alia, "That the said ship, classed 100 A1, and being tight, staunch, strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall with all possible despatch proceed direct to (with outward cargo for owners' benefit), and thence to the port of Seville, and there, after being reported to charterers' agent as ready to receive cargo, load in turn in the customary manner, at the place ordered by said agent, a part cargo of cupreous sulphur ore and/or other lawful merchandise, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, furniture, &c. Being so loaded, the said ship shall proceed to one of the undernoted ports (as ordered on signing bills of lading), and there deliver the said cargo at the place and in the manner directed by the consignees, to whom the ship is to be addressed. . . . . Penalty for non-performance of this agreement—estimated amount of freight (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and/or errors or negligence of navigation of whatsoever nature and kind, during said voyage always excepted)."

In pursuance of this charter-party 350 tons of sulphur ore belonging to the Seville Sulphur and Copper Company were loaded on board the "Ethelwolf" at Seville. The following was the bill of lading:—"Shipped in good order and condition by J. S. Macdougall, as agent for The Seville Sulphur and Copper Company, Limited, Seville, on board the good ship 'Ethelwolf,' whereof Cargill is master, now in this port, 350 tons of sulphur ore, which are to be delivered (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of what nature and kind soever excepted) in the like good order and condition at Swansea (North Dock), unto The Seville Sulphur and Copper Company, Limited, of 30 George Square, Glasgow, or to their assigns, freight and all other conditions as per charter."

The "Ethelwolf" sailed from Seville on 5th December for Swansea. On the 8th the "crowns" of her furnaces, which were within the boiler, began to come down. Had this been allowed to continue the boiler might have exploded. The engineer therefore had the boiler emptied, but, as the vessel from want of steam-power began to drift towards the shore, he, at the urgent request of the captain, refilled the boiler with water from the sea, which, being cold, caused the boiler, which was still hot, to shrink, and consequently to leak. This in turn lessened the steam-power until, on the 10th, it died away entirely. An attempt was then made to navigate the vessel under sail, but three out of the five sails which were set split. The vessel was ultimately abandoned.

In March 1887 the Seville Sulphur and Copper Company raised an action against Colvils, Lowden, & Company in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, for payment of £1224, 12s. 6d., as the value of the ore shipped on board the "Ethelwolf."

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 4) "When the 'Ethelwolf' sailed from Seville, as above stated, she was not in a condition fitted for the voyage, but was in an unseaworthy condition. In particular, her boilers and machinery were defective and out of order, the boiler leaking, the boiler pumps out of order and unable to supply the boiler properly with water. The feed pipe was leaking, and the water-gauge was defective and out of order. The bilges were full of dirt, and the bilge pumps choked with dirt, so that they could not pump the water out of the bilges, and the air-pump valves were broken. The sails were old and defective, and insufficient in number; and no spare sails, or canvas to repair the sails, were provided, and her bridge steering gear was out of order and useless." (Ans. 4) "Denied." (Cond. 5) "Further, the loss of said vessel and cargo was caused, or materially contributed to, by the negligence of the

No. 112.

—

Mar. 20, 1888.

Seville Sulphur and Copper Co. Limited, v. Colvils, Lowden, & Co.

engineers in allowing the water in the boiler to run so low that the boiler was further damaged, and it became necessary to draw the fires." (Ans. 5) "Denied. Explained that shortly after leaving Seville the 'Ethelwolf' grounded on a mud-bank on the Guadalquiver river, and it is believed and averred that a quantity of mud then found its way into the boiler through the pumps; that subsequently the vessel experienced very severe weather, and that these causes combined to injure the boiler, tubes, water-gauge, and machinery, and ultimately to bring about the loss of the vessel. Explained further, that if the water in the boiler became low it was in consequence of this damage thus sustained by the water-gauge. Explained also that by the charter-party under which said ore was shipped, the act of God, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas and rivers, or errors or negligence of navigation, are excepted."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders having failed to deliver the goods in question, in terms of their contract, and the pursuers having thereby sustained loss and damage to the amount sued for, decree ought to be granted as craved. (2) Said goods having been lost in consequence of the unseaworthiness of the "Ethelwolf" when she sailed on the voyage in question, decree should be granted as craved. (3) The pursuers having suffered loss and damage through the fault of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, decree should be granted as craved.

The defenders pleaded;—(4) The loss of the "Ethelwolf" having been brought about by causes falling under the exceptions specified in said charter-party, the defenders ought to be assoilzied.

A proof was allowed.

In addition to the grounds of unseaworthiness specifically founded on by the pursuers on record, viz., the defective condition of the boiler and machinery and of the sails, another ground of unseaworthiness not specifically set forth on record by the pursuers, but suggested by the defenders' answer to cond. 5, came to bulk largely in the ultimate decision of the case. The pursuers maintained that, assuming the boiler to have been in other respects in a sound condition when the vessel left Seville (which on the evidence they denied) the breakdown of the boiler had been caused by the presence of muddy water in it; but they contended that it was proved that this muddy water had been taken on board at Seville before the homeward voyage commenced, and not at a mud bank fifty miles down the river, as the defenders averred. That being so, the pursuers contended that the vessel had left Seville in an unseaworthy condition. It was not disputed on either side that the presence of mud in the boiler had a tendency to cause it to break down (in the manner explained by the Sheriff-substitute in the passage from his note quoted below *), and would also tend to cause the water-gauge to shew "false water." The only question therefore on this branch of the case came to be whether the mud was taken on board at Seville or at the bank fifty miles down the river. The pursuers' evidence shewed that the water of the Guadalquiver is exceptionally muddy. The pursuers admitted that some water was taken in at the bank when the vessel grounded, and that it was muddy, but they maintained that the quantity of water then required was so small as to be of no appreciable importance. The defenders admitted that the boiler had been filled at Seville with water from the river, but they contended that as it had been taken in at high water the quantity of mud was inappreciable, and that, on the other hand, even a small quantity of water taken on board at the mud bank after the mud had been churned up by the efforts to get the vessel off, would be sufficient to cause the boiler, or at all events the water-gauge, to go wrong in the way alleged.

---

* "The main question remains, What was the cause of the boiler of the 'Ethelwolf' and its pipes being in such a condition on the morning of 10th December that it was impossible to raise steam, and that the vessel had to be abandoned within a few miles of Vigo? The defenders account for this by saying that though the boiler and its accessories were in a good and seaworthy condition when the voyage was commenced at Seville, muddy water had to be taken into the boiler on the way down the Guadalquiver, the mud from which in the course of the voyage gradually settled on the crowns of the furnaces, causing them to become over-heated and sink, so that for fear of an explosion the engineer had to draw the fires; and it being necessary soon thereafter to get up steam again to save the vessel from drifting on the rocks, cold water had to be pumped in by the donkey-boiler from the sea, which, coming on the boiler-plates while still hot, made them shrink, and the boiler thus became

The result of the evidence on the other points is given in the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute.

On 20th September 1887 the Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray) pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . Finds (2) that under the bill of lading and charter-party the defenders were freed from their obligation more and more leaky till it ceased to be fit for raising steam at all. The taking in of mud which caused all this was, they say, if not inevitable, an occurrence in the course of the voyage covered by the exceptions in the charter-party. To understand this argument some explanation is necessary.

---

"The boiler arrangement of the 'Ethelwolf' is represented in No. 18 of process. It will be observed that, as is the rule with marine engines, the three furnaces with their apparatus of tubes, &c., are all inside the circumference of the boiler. Water goes around, above, and under them. The tops or 'crowns' of the furnaces are a good deal below the ordinary level of the surface of the water in the boiler. The test water-gauge, or test-glass, at the side, shews (when in order) the height of the water in the boiler. The proper surface of the water space of the boiler should be somewhere within the range of the gauge. If there is no water in it the water may be too low; if it is all water, the water may be too high in the boiler, and air space or steam space too small. When once the boiler has been filled, the fires lighted, steam got up by degrees, and the engines started, the water that goes off in steam is for the most part returned to the boiler, after having been reliquified in the condenser. So the boiler mostly feeds itself when all is in order. But there is always a certain but small amount of waste of steam from various causes. To make up for this there is an auxiliary or supplementary feed pump, by which very small quantities of water can be added, so small as not to lower the temperature to an appreciable extent, or to let down steam. But if from any cause these feed pumps, principal or supplementary, are out of order, or if the boiler has had to be emptied for purposes of cleaning and repairs, there is nothing for it, if at sea, but to pump up cold sea-water into the boiler by means of the donkey engine. This does no harm, or very little harm, if done when the boiler is cold; but if done when the boiler, though not so red-hot as to explode, is still hot, it causes the metal to shrink, and the boiler therefore to leak severely. Again, it has to be remarked that a danger occurs when any portion of the boiler-plates gets red-hot, and is so when cold water is introduced; and the arched furnace crowns or tops, from their position, are naturally exposed to the greatest heat. As long as they are in contact with water, the heat passes through them into the water, but if the water in the boiler is allowed to get so low that the empty surface of the crowns is uncovered, or if a thick coating of mud is allowed to accumulate on them between them and the water, the heat no longer passes through, but tends to make them red-hot. The hotter they get the softer they get, and the greater tendency they have to sink, and to yield to any pressure from within the boiler; and if they yielded to any considerable extent they might crack, and the boiler become useless, if it did not explode."

No. 112.
—
Mar. 20, 1888.
Seville Sulphur and Copper Co. Limited, v. Colvils, Lowden, & Co.

to deliver in case of loss from dangers of the sea, or errors or negligence in navigation during the voyage: Finds (3) that, on the whole, it appears that when the 'Ethelwolf' started from Seville on 5th December last she was not (whether from the weakly condition into which the boiler and its pipes had been allowed to get or from the boiler having been filled with muddy water at Seville, the mud from which constituted an element of danger to the boiler) in what constitutes a seaworthy condition in the eyes of the law: Finds (4) that on her voyage down the river Guadalquiver she having stuck for half-an-hour on a bank and lost some steam, more muddy water had to be pumped into the boiler: Finds (5) that she proceeded on her voyage till, on the 7th and 8th, she experienced some rough weather with north-west winds off the coast of Spain, near Cape Finisterre: Finds (6) that the gauge-glass which ought to shew the depth of water in the boiler got out of order in consequence of the mud in the water, and on the afternoon of the 8th the furnace crowns began to sink, which shewed either that they had got encrusted with mud or that the water in the boiler had gone dangerously low: Finds (7) that there can be no doubt that in reality the water in the boiler had got very low and that much had been lost by leakage: Finds (8) that the engineer at once drew the fires either with the intention (which he was unable to carry out from the position of the ship) of emptying and then repairing the boiler, or simply of enabling him to refill the boiler with cold water pumped in from the sea without danger of explosion: Finds (9) that, the captain hurrying him to get up steam in consequence of the dangerous position of the ship, he refilled the boiler with cold water from the sea while it was still hot, which caused a shrinkage of the tubes and greatly increased the leakage, so that although, by the early morning of the 9th, he was able to get up steam, it was only to about one-third of the proper power: Finds (10) that after running about ten miles out to sea the captain resolved to steer for Vigo, and accordingly turned the ship's head to the south-east: Finds (11) that the steam power gradually failed (the leakage of the boiler increasing), till on the morning of the 10th it failed altogether, when they were only a few miles from Vigo, but unfortunately there was a thick fog, and though the wind was not high there was a strong sea from the west: Finds (12) that during the last few days when the steam power was weak or in abeyance, an attempt had been made to utilise the sails of the 'Ethelwolf' to get her out of danger; but though some of them were of a little use the most of them were found to be so weak that they either gave way at once or had to be repaired before they were used . . . Finds on the whole case and in law (1) that (for the reasons stated in the note annexed hereto) the causes of the loss of the 'Ethelwolf' and its cargo do not fall under the exceptions in the bill of lading and charter-party; (2) that the 'Ethelwolf' was not (in a legal sense) seaworthy at the time of her departure from Seville: Therefore repels the defences, and decerns against the defenders, in terms of the prayer of the petition."

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The contract here was contained in the charter-party and the bill of lading taken together, not in the bill of lading only.[1] The case of Russell v. Niemann,[2] founded on by the other side as an authority to the contrary, was a case with the holder of the bill of lading, not with the charterer. "Errors or negligence of navigation" were therefore within the exceptions. The question thus came to be whether the cargo had been lost through the vessel's unseaworthiness before the voyage from Seville commenced, or through an error or negligence of navigation. To take the breakdown of the boilers first. There were two questions there, viz.—first, what in point of fact was the cause of that breakdown? and secondly, did that cause in law amount to unseaworthiness? The onus was on the pursuers to prove unseaworthiness.[1] Now, the only unseaworthiness in the machinery which they averred on record—that it was defective and out of order in certain respects specified—had not been instructed by the proof. Their other theory on this head—that the breakdown of the boiler was due to the presence of mud in the water taken on board at Seville—was equally unproved. All that the evidence, fairly read, shewed was that muddy water was taken on board at some time or another, and the onus being on the pursuers, it was for them to shew when. This they had failed to do. But even if the pursuers' evidence, such as it was, shewed that the river at Seville was unusually muddy, that evidence had been incompetently admitted, there being no corresponding averment by the pursuers, and the defenders, having had no notice, were not called on to meet it. The defenders believed that they could easily prove that the river at Seville was not muddy to any appreciable extent. They did not, however, desire an opportunity of proving that, except in answer to any evidence which might be led by the pursuers if they should ask and obtain leave to amend their record. But granting that the river at Seville was unusually muddy it was not easy to see how that could produce the result contended for by the pursuers. For the mud would have had time to sink to the bottom of the boiler before the vessel started on her voyage, and how it afterwards came to rise to the crown of the furnaces was hard to understand, but that it had done so was a necessary part of the pursuers' theory. The defenders' theory was much more consistent with the probabilities of the case. They maintained that the mud which did the damage was taken on board at the bank after the voyage had commenced, and that it had either encrusted the furnace crowns in the way explained by the Sheriff-substitute, or at least had clogged the water-gauge, causing it to shew "false water" and so to deceive the engineer. In either view an error of navigation had been committed. But taking it that the pursuers' view of the facts was proved to the full, the error was still one of navigation, and not due to the unseaworthiness of the vessel. It could not be both. An error or negligence of navigation meant—and the words "during the voyage" had no restrictive effect—an error or negligence in connection with the conduct of the voyage, but not necessarily an error or negligence committed when the vessel was actually in motion.[2] It was enough if it took place during the preparations for the voyage, provided it did not create a structural fault in the vessel, and by structural fault was meant such a fault as could not be rectified during the voyage. In Steel & Craig,[3] the fault could not have been so rectified, and the plea of unseaworthiness was in consequence sustained. Here it could be proved that the boiler could have been cleaned out at sea—not perhaps in the actual circumstances of the case—that was another matter; but had the vessel been well out to sea, or had the wind been blowing off shore instead of on shore, the defect

---

[1] Scrutton on Charter-Parties, p. 33.

[2] Russell v. Niemann, June 25, 1864, 17 C. B. (N.S.) 164, 34 Law Jour. C.P. 10.

---

[1] Boyson v. Wilson, March 6, 1816, 1 Starkie, 236; Steel and Craig v. State Line Steamship Co., July 20, 1877, 4 R. (H. L.) 103; Pickup v. Thames Insurance Co., May 16, 1878, L. R., 3 Q. B. D. 594; Xantho, July 14, 1887, L. R., 12 App. Cases, 503; Bell's Comm. vol. i. (7th edn.), 597, 663, 664.

[2] Carmichael & Co. v. Liverpool Indemnity Association, May 19, 1887, L. R., 19 Q. B. Div. 242; Good v. London Protecting Association, June 23, 1871, L. R., 6 C. P. 563; "The Warkworth," June 28, 1884, L. R., 9 Prob. Div. 145.

[3] Steel & Craig v. State Line Steamship Co., July 20, 1877, 4 R. (H. L.) 103.

No. 112.
—
Mar. 20, 1888.
Seville Sulphur and Copper Co. Limited, v. Colvils, Lowden, & Co.

could have been removed with ease. The defenders had had no opportunity of proving that. The seaworthiness of a vessel could not depend on the accident of her position, and of the wind being favourable to the performance of a necessary operation. As regarded the alleged defect in the sails the evidence shewed, in the first place, that the sails were fairly good sails; and secondly, that the best of sails could not possibly have saved their steamer in the actual circumstances of the case. A sailing vessel might probably enough have been so saved, but to say that this steamer was unseaworthy because she could not be navigated under sail alone in such weather as there was here was in effect to condemn most modern merchant steamers as unseaworthy.

Argued for the pursuers;—The bill of lading superseded the charter-party, and the general reference to the charter-party in the bill of lading only imported conditions ejusdem generis with those immediately preceding the reference and not the whole conditions of the charter-party.[1] But taking it to be a question on the charter-party, the defenders had failed to deliver the cargo; the onus consequently was on them to shew that they were within the exceptions.[2] They had failed to do so. The pursuers did not desire to amend their record. It was not for them to prove unseaworthiness, but for the defenders to prove seaworthiness. The evidence in the first place shewed that the boiler was nearly worn out, and that, of course, was unseaworthiness, but if that were held not proved then the undoubted break-down of the boiler must have been due to something else, and it was admitted on both sides that that something else could only be the presence of mud in the boiler, which either obscured and choked the gauge-glass, or heated the furnace crowns, one or both, and it was immaterial which. The important question was when was the muddy water taken on board? The pursuers said at Seville, and it was undoubted that the boiler was filled there, that it was filled with water from the river, and that the river was exceptionally muddy. The defenders said the mud was taken on board some fifty miles down the river, but the vessel was at the most only three quarters of an hour on the bank, and her boiler was already nearly full. That defence failed therefore. But it was further argued by the defenders that even if the mud which did the damages was taken on board at Seville still that was an error of navigation. It certainly was not an error of navigation "during the voyage." But apart from that specialty, the rule was that if a vessel had in her before starting on her voyage anything which required only moderately bad weather to become a source of danger to her or her cargo she was unseaworthy, and seaworthiness was an implied condition, notwithstanding the exception of errors and negligence of navigation.[3] That rule applied here. Then as regarded the sails the evidence plainly shewed that they were worthless. It might be that good sails would not have saved the ship; but the pursuers were entitled to that chance. The vessel was a vessel professing to have a certain amount of sails, and to be seaworthy she must have these sails in an efficient state.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The parties to this action are respectively the Seville

---

[1] Russell v. Niemann, June 25, 1864, 17 C. B. (N. S.) 164, 34 Law Jour. C. P. 10.

[2] Moes, Moliere, & Tromp v. Leith and Amsterdam Shipping Co., July 5, 1867, 5 Macph. 988.

[3] Steele & Craig v. State Line Steamship Co., July 20, 1877, 4 R. (H. L.) 103; Kopitoff v. Wilson, Feb. 23, 1876, L. R., 1 Q. B. Div. 377; Tattersall v. National Steamship Co., March 11, 1884, L. R., 12 Q. B. Div. 103; "The Glenfruin," March 31, 1885, L. R., 10 Prob. Div. 297.

Sulphur and Copper Company, who are the pursuers, and the owners of a steamship called the "Ethelwolf," who are the defenders. The pursuers demand a sum of £1224, 12s. 6d. as the value of a cargo of minerals shipped by them on board the "Ethelwolf" for delivery at Swansea, which obligation they allege that the defenders failed to fulfil.

The defenders admit that they received the goods on board, and that they became bound to deliver them in terms of the charter-party founded on. But they maintain that as the vessel was lost on her voyage from causes for which they are not responsible, they are not liable for the value of the goods.

The contract of carriage is constituted by charter-party, the terms of which are substantially these,—It was agreed "that the said ship, classed 100 A1, and being tight, staunch, strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall with all possible despatch proceed direct to (with outward cargo for owners' benefit), and thence to the port of Seville, and there, after being reported to charterers' agent as ready to receive cargo, load in turn in the customary manner, at the place ordered by said agent, a part cargo of cupreous sulphur ore $^{\text{and}}_{\text{or}}$ other lawful merchandise, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, furniture, &c. Being so loaded, the said ship shall proceed to one of the undernoted ports (as ordered on signing bills of lading), and there deliver the said cargo at the place and in the manner directed by the consignees, to whom the ship is to be addressed . . . Penalty for non-performance of this agreement—estimated amount of freight (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, $^{\text{and}}_{\text{or}}$ errors or negligence of navigation of whatsoever nature and kind during said voyage always excepted)."

It is maintained for the defenders that the circumstances under which this vessel was lost substantially fall under the exceptions contained in the charter-party. As the vessel was lost and the cargo with it, the contract of carriage was of course not implemented, and the shipowners must in the first instance discharge themselves of their liability. It is entirely a case between carrier and customer. There is no question with insurers.

The immediate cause of the loss of the vessel does not admit of dispute. She sailed from Seville on the 5th of December 1886 for her destination at Swansea. On the 8th her boilers gave symptoms of leakage, and it was found necessary to extinguish the fires, and after some temporary attempts to get up steam they finally gave way on the 10th, and in spite of an unsuccessful attempt to run to Vigo under canvas, the crew were obliged to abandon the vessel, and were taken off by another steamer, and she became a total wreck.

In this state of the facts the pursuers maintain that the vessel was unseaworthy, first, from the state of her boilers, and secondly, from the imperfect condition of her sails. The defenders, on the other hand, contend that the derangement of the boilers arose after the commencement of the voyage, and was within the exception in the charter-party, while they deny that the state of the sails was defective, or in any way led to the loss of the ship.

In regard to the last point, I may as well dismiss it with the remark that whatever was the condition of the sails, it was not the primary or even a contributory cause of the wreck. A steamship is not meant to be navigated under canvass alone, although it sometimes may be so, but in this instance it seems quite clear that, however good the sails had been, they could not, from the position of the vessel and the state of the wind and weather, have availed to avoid the calamity. The cause therefore of the loss of the vessel was the failure of her steam power.

No. 112.

Mar. 20, 1888.
Seville Sulphur and Copper Co. Limited, v. Colvils, Lowden, & Co.

On this matter we have a very large, intelligent, but conflicting body of evidence. It is not disputed that the steam-producing machinery had suffered injury, although the parties differ as to the time and the cause. When the fires were blown down on the 8th of December the leakage was admittedly such as to render an explosion probable if not inevitable. It does not appear that although the boiler had been under suspicion, even before the arrival of the ship at Seville, there was when she left any material defect in her construction, but before she had sailed for three days the engineer and his assistants began to see that there was something materially wrong. The gauge-glass, which is constructed so as to indicate the height of the water in the boiler, was found to be erroneous in its indications, to shew the water muddy, and to exhibit "false water," as the technical term seems to be. At last no doubt remained. The boiler was leaking profusely, and on the 10th came the result I have described.

The contending parties account for this occurrence differently, although it is not disputed that the presence of mud in the boilers and connections, which is admitted, had a tendency to produce the results which ensued.

On this part of the case the defenders maintain that the muddy water which was introduced into the boilers, and was the cause of the mishap, was taken in owing to the steamer having partially grounded on a mud bank in the river about fifty miles from Seville, and that this cause was within the exception contained in the charter-party, having occurred in the course of the voyage. On the other hand, the pursuers allege that the night before the vessel sailed from Seville her boiler, which had been emptied for cleaning, was refilled with water from the Guadalquiver, a river notoriously muddy.

It is not disputed that the ship was delayed by partial grounding on the mud bank in question on the morning of the 5th of December, and that some of the water of the river was at this time supplied to the boiler after leaving Seville. The question of fact therefore on which the case turns is, whether the water with which the boilers were entirely filled at Seville before she started was muddy, and produced the results which turned out so disastrous.

I think that on the evidence no doubt remains on this matter. The testimony of Thomson, the engineer, is sufficient to establish it. He describes the steps which he took by blowing down and cleaning out the boiler at Seville, and then he adds that "at ten o'clock at night I filled the boiler after consultation with the captain. The tide was about high-water then," so he filled it from the river. That was on the night of Saturday the 4th. They sailed next day, Sunday, the 5th of December. In re-examination he says—"We had muddy water in the Gaudalquiver. It was very bad, and it was worse at low tide. Did you get a message from the owners about it?—Yes, but it was too late. I had the boiler blown down before the captain told me."

There is ample evidence from witnesses of experience that the presence of mud in the boiler was quite sufficient to account for such failure of the machinery as occurred here, as well as for the time which elapsed before the ultimate results made themselves known. Without going into further detail I am of opinion that this steamship was lost, and with it the cargo, by reason of the failure of the propelling power; and that this failure was caused by the action of mud which had been introduced into the boiler when it was filled at Seville with muddy water from the river Guadalquiver the night before the voyage commenced.

The only question which remains is, whether the ship was seaworthy when she sailed from Seville on the morning of the 5th December. I am of opinion that she was not; and if I am right in attributing the failure of her motive or propelling power to the muddy water of the river at Seville, this steamship was not fit to go to sea when she sailed, as the result only too clearly proved.

I do not think it necessary to go into the general question as to what constitutes unseaworthiness. A steamship, the boilers of which will not generate steam, is not capable of navigation or carriage with safety to life or cargo. This is a stronger case than that of Steel & Craig, for in that case there was no structural defect, only careless stowage of the cargo, which prevented one of the port-holes from being closed. But the propelling power of a sea-going ship is of its essence, and if this vessel for the time had none it could not be seaworthy.

No doubt the injury to the boiler was the unthinking or ignorant act of the engineer, and did not arise from organic or radical defect. It was accidental, and not structural. But so was the stowage in the case of Steel & Craig, for but for the temporary impediment caused by the cargo the construction of the vessel was not in fault.

It makes no difference in my opinion that the defect was in the machinery and not in the fabric of the vessel. The power of locomotion on the waters is as much of the essence of a seagoing ship as the capacity of flotation, and a steamer without steam is as little the vessel which the charter-party describes, and which the defenders undertook to furnish, as a sailing vessel without sails would have been.

Lord Young.—I understand my brethren to agree in the judgment which your Lordship has proposed, and with such a concurrence of opinion I should not perhaps venture to express any doubt, but as I had some doubts, and as these doubts have not been entirely removed, I trust I may be excused if I give expression to them, although I confess that a judgment which is supported by such a concurrence of opinion is probably, almost certainly, the right one.

The Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor consists of a number of findings of fact, fifteen I think, and two of law, but I think the material finding in fact is the third—"Finds (3) that on the whole it appears that when the 'Ethelwolf' started from Seville on 5th December last she was not (whether from the weakly condition into which the boiler and its pipes had been allowed to get or from the boiler having been filled with muddy water at Seville, the mud from which constituted an element of danger to the boiler) in what constitutes a seaworthy condition in the eyes of the law." Then the corresponding finding in point of law is "that the 'Ethelwolf' was not (in a legal sense) seaworthy at the time of her departure from Seville." I think that the opinion of the Sheriff-substitute and of your Lordships is that this unseaworthiness arose not from any defect in the machinery of the vessel, but from the fact that the boiler had been filled with very muddy water taken from the river Guadalquiver before the steamer left Seville, and the question of fact upon which I have felt the doubts I have referred to is whether the evidence shews that there was unseaworthiness before the commencement of the voyage in this respect.

I have to notice as introductory to what I wish to say that the charter-party, which was entered into in Glasgow, provides that the vessel should with all possible dispatch proceed to the port of Seville, should there take in a cargo, and should then proceed to one or other of certain ports named; and then there is the clause upon which the defenders found, guarding them against liability arising from any "errors or negligence of navigation of whatsoever nature and kind during said voyage." Under this charter-party the vessel did proceed to Seville but before she could start thence on her return voyage it had to be seen to that there was water in her boiler, and she had her boiler filled with water from the Guadalquiver. The Guadalquiver is a notoriously muddy river, but still the ships lying there do take the water from the river into their boilers. Of course the muddy state of the river may be so bad at certain times that the shipmaster instead of taking in the water from the river should send elsewhere for it. Whether this mistake of taking water from the river amounts to an error of navigation in the sense of the charter-party is a question which has never been decided. I think it was a mistake to take water into the boiler in a muddy condition, and the evidence shews that this muddiness caused or contributed to the loss of the ship, but I have a doubt as to whether it brought about what the Sheriff-substitute calls unseaworthiness in "a legal sense." The ship was seaworthy when she arrived at Seville, she was seaworthy down to the moment when those in charge of her filled the boiler with muddy water, and that the presence of that muddy water in her boiler constituted unseaworthiness is a proposition by no means clear to my mind. If it is a case of unseaworthiness as distinguished from an error in navigation, then the law is quite clear, that the shipowner is liable for any loss or damage occasioned to the cargo by such unseaworthiness. I have no doubt about that, and none was suggested to us. My only doubt is as to whether by taking in muddy water from the river this steamer became an unseaworthy vessel.

No. 112.

Mar. 20, 1888.
Seville Sulphur and Copper Co. Limited, v. Colvils, Lowden, & Co.

Lord Craighill was absent through illness, but the Lord Justice-Clerk intimated that he concurred.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark concurred.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact (1) that in December 1886 the pursuers shipped at Seville on board the steamship 'Ethelwolf' belonging to the defenders 350 tons of sulphur ore of the value of £1224, 12s. 6d., to be carried to Swansea and delivered there to the pursuers or their assigns as stipulated between the parties in the charter-party and relative bill of lading; (2) that by the said charter-party and bill of lading the defenders undertook to carry the said goods and deliver them at the port of their destination, the Act of God, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, $\frac{\text{and}}{\text{or}}$ errors or negligence of navigation of whatsoever kind during the voyage being excepted; (3) that before the commencement of the voyage from Seville the boiler of the said ship was filled with muddy water from the river Guadalquiver, which, after the ship had put to sea, caused leakage of the boiler, and ultimately failure of the steam power, in consequence of which the ship became unmanageable, was abandoned, drifted on rocks near Vigo on the coast of Spain, and became a total wreck: Find in law that the cause of the loss of the ship does not fall under any of the exceptions of the charter-party and bill of lading, and that the defenders are liable to the pursuers in payment of the value of the said goods: Therefore dismiss the appeal: Affirm the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against: Of new decern in terms of the conclusions of the petition: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses in the inferior Court and in this Court," &c.

Boyd, Jameson, & Kelly, W.S.—Webster, Will, & Ritchie, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 113.

Mar. 20, 1888.*

Philp v. Assessor for Rothesay.

ANDREW PHILP, Appellant.—A. S. D. Thomson.
THE ASSESSOR FOR ROTHESAY, Respondent.—Ure.

Valuation Acts—Method of valuation—Hydropathic Establishment—Proof—Competency of compelling proprietor and occupant to disclose his profits—Valuation Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91), sec. 10.—The valuation (on the basis of capital cost) of a hydropathic establishment in the occupation of its proprietor reduced, on a comparison with the valuation of similar establishments throughout Scotland, from £1120 to £850.

Opinion (per Lord Fraser) that the proper method of valuing such an establishment, when in the occupation of its proprietor, was to ascertain the profits which he made, and that under the 10th section of the Lands Valuation Act, 1854, he might be compelled to disclose these profits, and to produce his books.

Opinion on this point reserved by Lord Lee.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court.
Lord Lee.
Lord Fraser.

Case No. 87.

ANDREW PHILP of the Glenburn Hydropathic Establishment, Rothesay, appealed to the Magistrates and Town-council of Rothesay against an entry in the Valuation-roll for the burgh of Glenburn House and grounds (the Hydropathic), of which he was entered as proprietor and tenant at a yearly value of £1300, and craved that the valuation should be reduced to £600.

The Assessor stated that he had arrived at £1300 as the value of Glenburn House, baths, and grounds, by taking the cubic contents of the main building at 9d. per cubic foot, the baths at 4d., and adding for chimney stalk £61, for pavilion £120, and for steam-engine £100, making the total capital cost £17,396, which, at 7½ per cent, brought out an annual value of £1304, 14s., besides the estimated rent of the grounds, which he took at £51. In the absence of evidence as to any other similar subjects actually let, either in the county or out of it, or of a statement of profit and loss, which he had asked for from Mr Philp, he maintained that this was an equitable mode of arriving at the valuation of Glenburn, 7½ per cent on the capital cost being recognised as a fair return for a commercial property such as Glenburn.

The appellant maintained that it was not a proper mode of arriving at the valuation to adopt the principle of estimated cost—the method adopted by the Assessor—and that the only just and equitable principle for fixing the annual value of a hydropathic establishment in the occupancy of the proprietor was by a fair comparison with other similar establishments.

A proof was allowed. The material results of the evidence sufficiently appear from Lord Fraser's opinion.

The Magistrates and Council found that, taking into account the situation and surroundings, superficial area, and character of the appellant's premises, and the whole circumstances of the case, the fair annual value of the Glenburn House, baths, and grounds was £1120, at which sum they assessed the same, and to that extent they sustained the appeal.

The appellant took a case. The above narrative is taken from the case.

At advising,—

LORD FRASER.—I am obliged at the present, as at former sittings of this Appeal Court, to express my disappointment that we have not got that kind of evidence that would enable us to fix with somewhat like precision what a tenant would pay for the Glenburn Hydropathic Establishment if that house were let from year to year. Such is the criterion of value laid down by the 6th section of the Valuation Act. As I have repeatedly stated, the only elements that would be taken into consideration by an intending tenant are, what profits would be made out of the establishment, and this the intending tenant would endeavour to find out from the tenant that preceded him. Knowing the amount of such profit, he would be enabled to state what rent he could afford to pay. Instead of this direct source of knowledge, what this Court has been hitherto treated to is indirect sources of the most unsatisfactory kind. We have been favoured in a number of these cases with the cost of the building—what has the intending tenant to do with that? Also, with the superficial area or floor space in it, and with a comparison between it and similar or dissimilar establishments elsewhere, and the valuations put upon these. Where a man is owner and tenant at the same time of a hydropathic establishment, of a hotel, of a distillery, one can understand why he is unwilling to disclose his profits before a meeting of commissioners or magistrates of a burgh; but he need not do so to these bodies, if he satisfy the assessor, by shewing him his books, what are the real profits that he makes, and the assessor has power to compel him to make such disclosure, for by the 10th section of the statute it is declared that "It shall be competent to the Commissioners of Supply and Magistrates of burghs respectively, in the hearing of appeals under this Act, to cite and examine the parties and their witnesses on oath, and to call for all papers and documents which they may deem necessary." Under this provision, the information which I desiderate might have been obtained. Mr Philp was examined as a witness for himself, and he might have been asked, and could have been compelled to state, what were the profits that he makes; and his books might have been called for, in order to support or check his statements. But this was not done, and other courses were adopted. The cost of the building was estimated by the Assessor, and he took 7½ per cent of that cost as indicating the annual value. Also, evidence was led as to the superficial flooring, not merely of the Glenburn Hydropathic Establishment, but of hotels in Rothesay, and of hydropathic establishments elsewhere, and of their lettable rooms, and a comparison is made between the Glenburn establishment and these others. I reject altogether the mode adopted by the Assessor of taking a percentage of the cost of the building; and we are shut up to the only other kind of evidence before us, viz., comparison with other establishments elsewhere. I reject such evidence, so far as it is sought to be instructed as between hydropathic establishments and hotels. These two classes of institutions stand upon a totally different footing. An hotel has sources of profit which a hydropathic establishment does not enjoy; and a hotel upon the main street of Rothesay is better situated for traffic than the Glenburn Hydropathic Establishment, situated half a mile from the business part of the town. The profits made upon liquors consumed in hotels are the main source of income which enable the innkeepers to pay heavy rents, and this the owner of a hydropathic establishment does not possess.

---

* Decided March 16, 1888.

Thus, one is shut up to a comparison of the valuation of one hydropathic establishment with another; and the parties here have been very industrious in presenting the Court with information upon that subject, which must have been obtained at considerable cost. Two states have been laid before us, the one shewing the amount of flooring in the Glenburn establishment and in various other hydropathic establishments, and the other shewing the number of lettable rooms in each. There are, in some of these establishments, rooms which are not lettable, such as billiard-rooms, reading-rooms, recreation-rooms, &c., of

No. 113.

Mar. 20, 1888.
Philp v. Assessor for Rothesay.

a larger size in some than in others, and which make no pecuniary return. Therefore, I think that the comparison ought to be between the number of lettable rooms in each, of which there are in the Glenburn establishment ninety-six. The Magistrates have fixed the valuation at £1120. Now, this is fixing it at a higher value than any other of the eleven cases which have been brought before us. For example, Peebles has 119 lettable rooms, and the valuation there is £800; Kilmalcolm has 127 lettable rooms, and the valuation is £435; Shandon has 115 lettable rooms, and the valuation is £1100; Moffat has 156 lettable rooms, and the valuation is £800; Craiglockhart has 106 lettable rooms, and the rent payable is £600; Dunblane has 120 lettable rooms, and the rent payable is £400. Now, from these cases, it will be seen that the Glenburn Hydropathic Establishment is put at a higher rate than any one of them, and this is said to be justified by the circumstance that Rothesay is situated favourably for a hydropathic establishment. In regard to this point we have little or no evidence to guide us. All I will say is, that I do not think that any advantages which Rothesay may enjoy, if it does possess them, will justify the unequal treatment which it receives when compared with the other cases; and I am therefore of opinion that the valuation should be reduced to £850.

LORD LEE.—I concur in the result arrived at by Lord Fraser, but I cannot regard profits as being so important a factor in the ascertainment of lettable value as I understand Lord Fraser to consider it. I wish also to add that I give no opinion upon the question, how far owners and occupiers of business premises are liable to be called upon to shew their books, and disclose their incomes and earnings for the purposes of the Valuation of Lands Act.

THE JUDGES were of opinion that the determination of the Magistrates and Council was wrong, and that the valuation should be reduced to £850.

SMITH & MASON, S.S.C.—JOHN LATTA, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 114.

COLIN BERWICK, Appellant.—Party.
THE ASSESSOR FOR FIFESHIRE, Respondent.—Rankine.

Mar. 20, 1888.*
Berwick v. Assessor for Fifeshire.

Valuation Acts—Valuation—Farm let for part of year as grazings and otherwise unlet.—A farm which was entirely laid out in grass was let annually for part of the year—from Whitsunday to Martinmas—as grazings, and during the rest of the year was in the proprietor's own hands. For the year 1887 the rent of the grazings was £301, and the valuation of the farm as fixed by the Valuation Committee £400. On appeal held per Lord Lee that the valuation of the Valuation Committee was right, per Lord Fraser that the valuation ought to be reduced to £301, the rent received for the grazings. The Judges being divided in opinion the valuation stood.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court.
Lord Lee.
Lord Fraser.

COLIN BERWICK, judicial factor on the lands of Bonnytown, appealed to the Fifeshire Valuation Committee against an entry in the Valuation-roll of the county for 1887 of the farm and house of Bonnytown, of which he was entered as proprietor and occupier at a yearly rent or value of £500.

Case No. 88.

The farm of Bonnytown—in extent 300 acres—was under the management of the appellant as judicial factor. The whole lands were laid down in grass, and the grazing on the fields was annually let by public roup for the grazing season, Whitsunday to Martinmas. The total rents for

---

* Decided March 16, 1888.

No. 114.

Mar. 20, 1888.
Berwick v. Assessor for Fifeshire.

which the lands were let for the grazing season 1887 amounted to £334, 9s. 2d. Out of that the appellant had to pay outlays (in 1887) amounting to £33, 8s. 11d.

The appellant maintained that the actual rent of the farm for the current year, under deduction of the outlays, viz., the sum of £301, 0s. 3d., should be entered in the Valuation-roll as the annual value of the farm. He led no evidence as to the present letting value of the farm for ordinary agricultural purposes.

The Assessor maintained that he was not bound to regard the rent obtained for the grazing season in any one year (which did not take into account the wintering) as the annual value of the farm, but that he was entitled to enter the rent at which, one year with another, the lands might reasonably be expected to let for ordinary agricultural purposes. He admitted that the grass rents received for a series of years—say three or four—would have been helpful in ascertaining the present value, but the appellant's agent was unable to give any information except as regarded 1887. He referred to the undernoted cases[1] as confirming this basis of valuing grass lands.

The Committee fixed the annual value of the farm at £400, "being a reduction of upwards of forty per cent on the annual value appearing in roll of 1878-79."

The appellant took a case. The foregoing narrative is taken from the case, which further stated,—"During the last three years the annual value of most of the farms in Fife in the occupation of proprietors has been considered by the Valuation Committee, with the assistance of skilled agriculturists—tenant farmers—in the various districts, and they have adopted in most cases the value as appearing in the Valuation-roll for 1878-79, under deduction of from fifteen to twenty-five per cent, according to the special circumstances of the different subjects. This principle has been adopted, as the reductions in rents of let farms during the past few years in Fife have been at least to that extent. In the present year the Committee extended the abatement, owing to the continued agricultural depression, and in many cases have allowed thirty per cent, and in a few special cases even a little more, from the rents and values of 1878-79."

At advising,—

Lord Lee.—It was necessarily conceded by the counsel for the appellant that the subjects are properly entered as in the occupation of the proprietor. The statute authorises the Assessor to recognise "rent" only where the lands are "let for a yearly rent"; and it has been repeatedly decided that land let as grass parks for the grazing season is not in this position. Indeed the practice is quite settled. So that even if the subjects had consisted entirely of grass parks, let as stated by public roup for the period from May to November, it was the duty of the Assessor to value them according to the rule stated in the beginning of clause 6, viz., as unlet subjects, as to which he has to ascertain the "rent at which one year with another such lands and heritages might in their actual state be reasonably expected to let from year to year."

The question then is, whether the Commissioners have gone wrong in arriving at £400 as the rent at which they might so be expected to let? The cases of Maitland (20 D. 1356) and Ker's Trustees (9 R. 1236) make it clear that, if former decisions and settled practice are to be regarded, the Assessor was neither bound nor entitled to take the sums paid for summer grazing as conclusive. In Maitland's case the rule was applied in favour of the proprietor, and to the effect of valuing the subjects below the sums actually paid; and in Ker's Trustees it was again applied, to the effect of entering a sum greater than the amount received,—the principle in both cases being to ascertain what the subjects would bring one year with another if let as an agricultural subject. It is not said that on that principle the sum here entered is too high; but it is contended that the subjects must be valued in their actual state, and that as grass parks £400 cannot be got for them. Undoubtedly they must be valued in their actual state; but according to the decisions there is nothing in their actual state to exclude them from being considered as an agricultural subject. The fact that the proprietor prefers to keep them in his own occupation, and to sell the right of grazing for only six months in the year, is not enough; and if it be the fact, as alleged, and not disputed at the bar, that there are some farm buildings on the ground of which he retains the sole occupation for the whole year, this would make it all the more difficult to recognise the sum obtained for summer grazing as ascertaining the value by the year. It is enough, however, to say that, consistently with the decisions referred to, and the settled practice, I cannot hold the principle of valuation adopted by the Assessor and the Commissioners to be otherwise than right.

---

[1] Maitland, Dickson, and Campbell, 9th October 1858, 20 D. 1356; Ker's Trustees, 7th March 1878, 9 R. 1236.

Lord Fraser.—In this case the land is beneficially occupied as grass parks. It is occupied as such during the whole grazing season, which throughout Scotland differs in different localities. During the remainder of the year there is nothing earned from the ground, and it is allowed to lie at rest in order to recover for the next season. Now the total rents for the grazing season 1887 amounted to £334, 9s. 2d., from which there were outlays by the proprietor to the extent of £33, 8s. 11d, leaving £301, 0s. 3d. as the sum which, according to the appellant, ought to be entered in the Valuation-roll. I am of opinion that this demand by the appellant is right, and that the determination of the Committee fixing the value at £400 is wrong. The Committee discarded altogether from their view the return that was obtained from the grass parks, and proceeded arbitrarily to fix the value according to some rule that I do not comprehend. In fixing the value for the current year, what the Committee do is to go back to the year 1878—ten years ago,—and to take the rent paid in that year, when it was occupied not as grass parks, but for ordinary agricultural purposes, and from that rent they deducted 40 per cent on account of the fall in prices. Now the Committee had no right whatever under the statute to adopt this course. What they were called upon to do, was to ascertain the present annual value, as ascertained by the latest letting of the subjects; and what better criterion could they have for ascertaining the present annual value than the rent obtained for the land as grazing land, into which it has been turned for several years back. They are bound to value the land in its actual state, and not in the state it was in ten years ago. It is said that the grazing rent obtained cannot be looked at, because there was here no letting in the proper sense of the term. I deny that altogether. But let it be assumed that the graziers who pay the grazing rents are not to be held to be tenants, yet the rents that they do pay surely afford the best means of ascertaining the present value of the lands. It is not said that the proprietor is not doing his very best to obtain the present value of his estate; and whether he be entered both as proprietor and as occupier

No. 114.
—
Mar. 20, 1888.
Berwick v. Assessor for Fifeshire.

is of no moment as to the question,—What sum is to be entered in the Valuation-roll? I would have no objection to his being entered in the Valuation-roll as occupier as well as proprietor, if there be any inconvenience in entering the grazier who takes the parks as occupier; but what I object to is the valuing a subject devoted to one purpose as if it had been devoted to another and different purpose, and to the adoption of some arbitrary rule based upon a rental dated ten years ago, instead of taking the rental which is paid and received by the proprietor the present hour.

THE JUDGES being divided in opinion, the determination of the Valuation Committee stood.

ROMANES & SIMSON, W.S.—PARTY—Agents.

No. 115.
—
Mar. 20, 1888.*
Assessor for Fifeshire v. Curror.

THE ASSESSOR FOR FIFESHIRE, Appellant.—Party.
DAVID CURROR AND OTHERS, Respondents.—C. S. Dickson.

Valuation Acts—Subject of Valuation—Right to prevent coal from being worked so as to cause surface damage.—The titles of a vassal reserved to the superior the coal in the lands feued, but gave the vassal the right to prevent the coal from being worked except on the "stoop-and-room" system, one object of which was to provide against the subsidence of the surface. The vassal entered into an agreement with the lessee of the coal under which, in return for annual payments, the amount of which was to be regulated by the coal won, the lessee became entitled to work the coal on the "longwall" or complete excavation system. Held that the vassal did not fall to be entered in the Valuation-roll as proprietor of collieries in respect of such payments.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court.
Lord Lee.
Lord Fraser.

Case No. 89.

THE predecessor of Sir P. A. Halkett of Pitfirrane let on a long lease —999 years—to the predecessor of Lord Elgin, and Lord Elgin sublet to Thomas Spowart & Company, Limited, the coal (forming part of the "Elgin Collieries,") in or under the lands belonging respectively to David Curror of Wester Craigduckie, James Alexander of Meldrum's Mill, and John Brown of Colton, all in the county of Fife, which coal had been expressly reserved in the titles of Messrs Curror, Alexander, and Brown. In accordance with agreements entered into between each of Messrs Curror, Alexander, and Brown, and Thomas Spowart & Company, certain annual payments were made to these three proprietors by Thomas Spowart & Company. These agreements, which were adopted by Sir Arthur Halkett and the Earl of Elgin, narrated (1) that the coal in question under their lands was not the property of Messrs Curror, Alexander, and Brown; (2) that as owners of the surface these three proprietors were entitled to prevent the coal being worked otherwise than in a particular manner, technically known as "stoop-and-room," the object of which was to provide against subsidence of the surface; (3) that in respect of permission being granted for working and mining the coal so far as under the lands of Craigduckie, Meldrum's Mill, and Colton, by the "longwall" or complete excavation system of mining, certain annual payments, called in the agreements "royalty rents" and "lordships," should be made to each of the said David Curror, James Alexander, and John Brown; and (4) that the amount of these annual payments should be regulated and determined by the quantity of coal won. The agreements preserved the proprietors' right to compensation for surface damage.

In September 1887, Messrs Curror, Alexander, and Brown appealed to

---

* Decided March 16, 1888.

No. 115.

Mar. 20, 1888.
Assessor for Fifeshire v. Curror.

the Valuation Committee of Fifeshire against the following entries in the Valuation-roll of the county for 1887-8 :—

No.	Description of Subjects.	Proprietor.	Tenant.	Occupant.	Rent.
	Elgin Collieries.	David Curror of Wester Craigduckie.	Thomas Spowart & Co., Ld.	Same.	£92 0 3
	Do.	James Alexander of Balmule.	Do.	Do.	85 0 1
	Do.	John Brown of Colton.	Do.	Do.	109 4 4

The sums entered as the values in these entries were the amount of the payments made to the appellants respectively under the foregoing agreements for the year 1887.

The appellants maintained that the entries ought to be expunged in respect that under the Valuation Acts only "proprietors" or "tenants" or "occupiers" fell to be entered in the roll; that it had been held by the Court of Session that Mr Curror was not the "proprietor" of the coal in respect of which the payments to him were made,* and the same principle applied to the cases of the other appellants; and that the annual payments were of the nature of incorporeal rights or subjects which did not fall within the category of lands and heritages, or within any class of subjects which under the Lands Valuation Acts were to be entered in the Valuation-roll.

The Assessor maintained that the annual payments were correctly entered in the Valuation-roll as being accessory to the ownership of the surface.

The Valuation Committee were of opinion that the annual payments did not fall to be entered in the Valuation-roll, and sustained the appeal accordingly.

The Assessor took a case.

The foregoing narrative is taken from the case.

At advising,—

LORD LEE.—There appears to be a question here whether the reservation of coal from the grant of lands includes the right to work that portion of the coal which is necessary to support the surface. If it does not include that right, another question arises as to the nature of the right and interest of the proprietor of the lands in the coal necessary for the support of the surface. The Lands Valuation Act requires the valuation of all lands and heritages, including expressly "mines, minerals, and coalworks," and I incline to the opinion that the coal which the proprietor of the reserved right cannot work, and which is worked by an arrangement with the proprietor of the lands, falls under the designation of "lands and heritages" within the meaning of the statute, and ought to be entered in the roll and valued either as being within the infeftment of the proprietor of the lands, or as being the property of the superior under his reserved right. The opinions of Lords Deas and Kinloch in the case of Harvie v. Stewart (9 Macph. 129) shew the difficulties which may arise in deciding whether an interest in coal is of the nature of a right of property. But it is unnecessary in this case to give any opinion on that point. For whatever the

---

* Not reported.

No. 115.

Mar. 20, 1888.
Assessor for Fifeshire v. Curror.

nature of the right of Curror and others as proprietors of the surface, it is conceded that they are not proprietors of the "Elgin Collieries," and that they are not liable to be entered in the roll as such. Reserving my opinion as to the proper mode of dealing with the coal in question under the Valuation Act, I think that the entry as it stands cannot be sustained, and that the Commissioners in sustaining the appeal were right. It would rather appear that if the coal in question is to be valued as the property of the appellants, Curror and others, it can only be as part and pertinent of the lands held by them not included in the reservation of minerals.

LORD FRASER.—It was decided in the Court of Session that David Curror, Wester Craigduckie, had no right to any of the coal in any of his lands, but that the same had been reserved by the predecessors of Sir Peter Arthur Halkett, and let by him to Lord Elgin. The action in which this was determined was one at the instance of David Curror, and was a declarator. It first came before me as Lord Ordinary, and my judgment was affirmed by the Second Division.* The other two persons, James Alexander and John Brown, to whom payments are made, are in the same position as Curror, and are not owners of the coal. But notwithstanding this, the tenants of the coal, Thomas Spowart & Company, do make payment to Curror, Alexander, and Brown, of certain sums of money, which are now sought to be entered in the Valuation-roll as payments of rent to these persons. It is quite clear that these payments are not for rent, because neither Curror, Alexander, nor Brown, is proprietor. But the agreement which is set forth in the case shews us for what these payments are made. The owners of the surface—Curror, Alexander, and Brown—have the right to prevent the owner of the coal beneath from working in any other way than according to the old system of stoop-and-room, which does not allow them to obtain as much coal as they could do by working by longwall, or the complete excavation system of mining. They had therefore to purchase the privilege of so working the coal from the owners of the surface, who could interdict them from working longwall—and hence the payments which the coal tenants agreed to make to the surface proprietors. But the coal tenants not being tenants under Curror, Alexander, and Brown, cannot be so entered in the Valuation-roll, and the payments that they make being simply compensation for non-interference with their working, such payments cannot be entered as rent paid by a tenant. The case seems to be governed by the decision in the case of Renfrew (11 Macph. 979). The decision of the Committee is right.

THE JUDGES were of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee was right.

PARTY—CURROR, COWPER, & CURROR, W.S.—Agents.

No. 116.

Mar. 20, 1888.†
Callander and Oban Railway Co. v. Assessor for Oban.

THE CALLANDER AND OBAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appellants.—R. Johnstone.
THE ASSESSOR FOR OBAN, Respondent.—Ure.

Valuation Acts—Burgh Assessor or Assessor of Railways and Canals—Railway bookstall.—Held that the bookstall in a railway station, in the occupation of newsagents who paid the company a fixed sum annually for the privilege of supplying newspapers and books within the station, but who supplied not only passengers travelling on the railway but inhabitants of the town with newspapers

---

* Not reported.

† Decided March 16, 1888.

No. 116.
—
Mar. 20, 1888.
Callander and Oban Railway Co. v. Assessor for Oban.
—
Lands Valuation Appeal Court.
Lord Lee.
Lord Fraser.

Case No. 90.

and books, had been properly valued by the Assessor of Railways and Canals as part of the undertaking of the company, and did not fall to be separately entered by the Burgh Assessor in his roll.

THE CALLANDER AND OBAN RAILWAY COMPANY appealed to the Magistrates of Oban against an entry in the Valuation-roll of the burgh for the year 1887-8 of "Bookstall, Railway Station" of which they were entered as proprietors and John Menzies & Company as tenants and occupiers, at a yearly rent or value of £50.

The appellants maintained that the entry was erroneous, in respect that the bookstall formed part of the appellants' undertaking of the Callander and Oban Railway, and was not an independent subject of let by them to John Menzies & Company, and that the use or occupation of it by John Menzies & Company was merely ancillary to an exclusive privilege or franchise granted by the appellants to John Menzies & Company of selling books, newspapers, periodicals, stationery, and such like, within the appellants' station at Oban.

The appellants produced an agreement, dated 11th July and 25th August 1887, entered into between them and John Menzies & Company.* They stated that the sum of £50 payable by John Menzies & Company to the appellants under this agreement had been returned by the appellants to the Assessor of Railways and Canals as part of the yearly revenue of their undertaking, and as such was included in the cumulo yearly rent or value of their undertaking, as appearing in the Valuation-roll made up by him.

The Assessor maintained that the bookstall formed an independent subject of let, of which John Menzies & Company had the exclusive use and occupation as tenants and occupiers thereof, to which use and occupation the sole and exclusive right, franchise, and privilege of selling books, &c. within the station was merely incidental; and therefore that the entry appealed against was properly and legally entered in the Valuation-roll made up by him as Assessor of the burgh. In support of his contention the Assessor founded on the lease which is quoted below.† The Assessor

---

* Under this agreement the appellants granted to John Menzies & Company the sole and exclusive right, franchise, and privilege to vend, sell, lend, and exhibit for sale and loan newspapers, books, periodicals, stationery, and such other like articles required for the convenience of passengers by railway, as should be approved of by the secretary of the appellants at said station, with full liberty to the said John Menzies & Company for the purposes foresaid to use the existing bookstall at said station, provided that the appellants should be entitled to remove the said bookstall and to substitute another instead thereof, and to alter the position of the same at any time, with full and free ingress and egress to the said John Menzies & Company, their servants and agents, at all reasonable times, to the said station for the purposes foresaid: Declaring that the persons employed by the said John Menzies & Company should, while within said station, be under the control of the appellants' stationmaster, and liable to immediate removal from the station in case of insobriety or misconduct; and that for the space of five years from and after the term of Whitsunday 1887: Declaring that the said John Menzies & Company should not be entitled to assign said agreement, or to confer on or grant to any other person or persons whatever, the right, franchise, and privilege thereby granted without the express consent in writing of the appellants; the payment or consideration for the right, franchise, and privilege before mentioned being £50 per annum; and the said John Menzies & Company bound and obliged themselves to keep a regular supply of newspapers, books, &c., for sale to the passengers using the railway and station of the appellants.

† By this lease, which was entered into between the appellants and John Menzies & Company, and was dated 29th July and 13th August 1880, the

No. 116.
—
Mar. 20, 1888.
Callander and Oban Railway Co. v. Assessor for Oban.

maintained that this lease, which, he stated, had been continued by tacit relocation until the term of Whitsunday 1887, set forth the true contract between the appellants and John Menzies & Company, no change having taken place at the said term of Whitsunday 1887 in the possession had by John Menzies & Company; in other words, that the agreement founded upon by the appellants must be regarded as containing merely a repetition in a different form of words of the former arrangement, and as constituting a lease of the bookstall to John Menzies & Company.

The Assessor further averred that the books, newspapers, periodicals, stationery, and such like, sold by John Menzies & Company, were sold to all persons within the station willing to purchase the same, irrespective of their being passengers by the railway or not, and also that John Menzies & Company supplied residents in Oban at their residences with newspapers and periodicals, and thereby competed with the other booksellers and news-agents in the burgh.

The Magistrates allowed the Assessor a proof of these last averments, which were borne out by the evidence adduced.

The Magistrates held that, "in respect the said bookstall is, in the judgment of the Magistrates, an independent subject of let, of which the said John Menzies & Company have the exclusive use and occupation as tenants and occupiers thereof, to which use and occupation the sole and exclusive right, franchise, and privilege of selling books and others foresaid within the said station is, in the judgment of the Magistrates, merely incidental; and further, in respect it was proved to the satisfaction of the Magistrates that the said John Menzies & Company supply newspapers to persons at their residences outside the said station, and also sell newspapers to all persons within the said station willing to purchase the same, without reference to their being passengers by railway or not, and thereby compete with the other booksellers and news-agents in the burgh, the said bookstall is properly entered in the Valuation-roll for the said burgh at the rental of £50, and they therefore adhered to the said entry, and dismissed the appeal."

The railway company took a case.[1] The foregoing narrative is taken from the case.

THE JUDGES returned this opinion:—"We are of opinion that the appellants "let" to the said John Menzies & Company "All and Whole the bookstall" at the said station, with the fixtures and other fittings therein belonging to the appellants, with the sole right to the said John Menzies & Company of selling books, newspapers, periodicals, stationery, and such like, within the said station during the currency of the lease, and with right of ish and entry to the said bookstall on each lawful day while the station should be open for traffic, and at such other times as might be fixed by the appellants' manager or secretary, and that for the space of three years from and after the term of Whitsunday 1880; but subject to the right and power specially reserved to the appellants, in the event of the said bookstall not being conducted to their reasonable satisfaction, of terminating the lease at any of the terms of Whitsunday or Martinmas during the currency thereof, on giving three months' notice in writing to the said John Menzies & Company: For which lease the said John Menzies & Company became bound to pay to the appellants £50 sterling, "in name of rent or tack-duty for the said subjects," during the currency of the lease: And further, the said John Menzies & Company bound and obliged themselves to keep a regular supply of books and newspapers for sale to the passengers using the said railway.

---

[1] Authorities referred to.—North British Railway Co. v. Greig, March 20, 1866, 4 Macph. 645; Highland Railway Co. v. Dods, Sept. 21, 1876, 4 Poor-Law Mag. 603; Smith & Son v. Assessment Committee of Lambeth, Nov. 23, 1882, L. R., 10 Q. B. Div. 327.

determination of the Magistrates is wrong, in respect the Assessor of Railways and Canals has already properly valued the subject as a part of the undertaking."

No. 116.

Mar. 20, 1888.
Callander and Oban Railway Co. v. Assessor for Oban.

HOPE, MANN, & KIRK, W.S.—EMSLIE & GUTHRIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 117.

Mar. 20, 1888.*
Lord Elphinstone v. Assessor for Middle Ward of Lanarkshire.

RIGHT HONOURABLE LORD ELPHINSTONE, Appellant.—Dundas.
THE ASSESSOR FOR THE MIDDLE WARD OF LANARKSHIRE, Respondent.

Valuation Acts—Mines and Minerals—Lands Valuation Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91), sec. 42.—The Lands Valuation Act, 1854, sec. 42, enacts "that no mine or quarry shall be assessed unless it has been worked during some part of the year to which such assessment applies."

A freestone quarry was let on a lease for eight years from Martinmas 1885, with a break in favour of the tenant at any term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after Martinmas 1886, at a fixed rent of £100, or a lordship in the option of the landlord. The tenant did not enter into possession till after the Valuation-roll for 1885-6 had been made up, and the quarry was not entered for that year. It was entered at £100 for 1886-7, in terms of the landlord's return. The lordship paid at Whitsunday 1886 was £92, 10s., and at Martinmas 1886 £89, 10s. The quarry ceased to be worked at Martinmas 1886, but the tenant remained in possession till Whitsunday 1887, when he took advantage of the break and brought the lease to an end. The excavations were filled up, and the ground restored. At Whitsunday 1887 the tenant paid the half-yearly fixed rent of £50. He had thus paid in all £232, but only £100 of that having been entered in the Valuation-roll, the Assessor entered the balance of £132 in the roll for 1887-8, although the quarry had not been worked and nothing had been paid during that year. Held that the valuation was wrong.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court.
Lord Lee.
Lord Fraser.

Case No. 92.

LORD ELPHINSTONE appealed to the Valuation Committee of the Middle Ward of Lanarkshire against an entry in the Valuation-roll of the county for 1887-8 of £132 in respect of a freestone quarry at Broadlees, of which he was entered proprietor and Adam H. Boyle as tenant and occupier.

The facts on which the appeal depended were as follows:—By lease, dated 31st March and 7th April 1886, Lord Elphinstone let to Mr Boyle the quarries of freestone rock in the lands of Broadlees for eight years, from Martinmas 1885, with a break in favour of the tenant at any term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after Martinmas 1886, on his giving three months' notice. The tenant bound himself to pay £100 of fixed rent yearly, or, in the option of the proprietor, a lordship.

The draft lease of the quarry was revised by the tenant on 2d October 1885, and his entry to the quarry was at Martinmas 1885, both dates being after the Valuation-roll had been authenticated for 1885-6, and so no return of rent was made, or could have been made, on behalf of the landlord for that year.

The fixed rent of £100 was returned in good faith at Whitsunday 1886 for 1886-7, although the royalty received up to that term was £92, 10s.

Mr Boyle was the contractor for the construction of a neighbouring line of railway, and took the quarry for that purpose, and it was uncertain for how long or to what extent he might require it. In fact he ceased to work it at Martinmas 1886, although he remained in possession till Whitsunday 1887, at which term he took advantage of the break and brought the lease to an end. All rent and royalty then ceased, so that there was no subject and no tenant for the year 1887-8. The excavations made had been filled up, and the ground restored at considerable expense.

---

* Decided March 16, 1888.

No. 117.

Mar. 20, 1888.
Lord Elphinstone v. Assessor for Middle Ward of Lanarkshire.

The tenant paid the following rents and lordships during his possession:—

1. Lordship to Whitsunday 1886, ...	£92 10 0
2. Do. to Martinmas 1886, ...	89 10 0
3. Half year's fixed rent to Whitsunday 1887, . .	50 0 0
	£232 0 0

The appellant founded on sec. 42 of the Lands Valuation Act, 1854,* and craved that the entry should be deleted.

The Assessor referred to the case of Blantyre[1] as establishing the principle that the words of the clause founded on were not to be read literally and without regard to the plain intention of the Act, which was, inter alia, to make all rents or royalties paid subject to rating. He stated that it frequently happened that a quarry was wrought for a part of a year and then stopped in such a way that if no entry were made in the roll for the year following such working the royalty paid would escape assessment. In the present case the payments amounted in all to £232, and as only £100 had previously been entered in the Valuation-roll, he submitted that in the circumstances it was quite in accordance with the true intent and meaning of the Valuation Acts that the balance of £132 should now be entered in the roll, and this he had accordingly done.

The Committee dismissed the appeal, and sustained the valuation.

Lord Elphinstone took a case. The foregoing narrative is taken from the case.

THE JUDGES were of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee was wrong.

DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S., Agents.

No. 118.

Mar. 20, 1888.†
Duncan's Trustee v. M'Cracken.

GEORGE HERON (Duncan's Trustee), Pursuer and Real Raiser.
MISS GEORGINA M'CRACKEN, Claimant.—G. R. Gillespie.
THE LORD ADVOCATE, Claimant.—A. J. Young.

Succession-duty—16 and 17 Vict. c. 51, sec. 2—Foreign domicile—Testament creating a British trust.—Although moveable property in Scotland belonging to a person domiciled abroad will not on his death be liable to succession-duty, yet if the deceased has directed part of his estate to be invested in this country in trust for a person in liferent and for another in fee, the fund so settled, as a fund to be administered according to the law of Scotland exclusively, will be subject to succession-duty when the fiar's right to possession emerges on the death of the liferenter.

OUTER-HOUSE
Lord Fraser.

MISS MARGARET HELEN DUNCAN, a native of Scotland, went to reside in Paris in 1847, and remained there till her death in September 1869.

By her will, which was executed on 30th November 1864, she disposed of the residue of her estate as follows:—"I give and bequeath the annual revenue of all I possess . . . to my brother-in-law, Mr John Hume of Forthill Cottage, Broughty-Ferry, for all his life, after his death the same to go to Mrs Elizabeth Cairncross, wife of Mr John William M'Cracken, notary-public, No. 233 York Street, Belfast, Ireland, for her life, when the residue of all I possess shall become the property of Georgina M'Cracken, third daughter of the said John William M'Cracken, subject to the following conditions, viz., that the capital shall be placed in such a way that she can neither lend it nor spend it, but may, if she please, buy an annuity with it."

---

* Quoted in the rubric.

[1] March 15, 1883, 10 R. 773.

† Decided November 4, 1887.

Miss Duncan appointed Mr Hume and Mr John William M'Cracken to be her executors, and they entered on the administration of her estate and obtained probate of her will in Her Majesty's Court of Probate in England. The property left by Miss Duncan was all personal, and was wholly situated within the United Kingdom, with the exception of some articles of jewellery, and also certain foreign shares which were specially bequeathed. The funds forming the residue liferented by Mr Hume remained situated in this country, being invested in British stocks, and were so at the date of his death. Mr Heron, the sole surviving and acting trustee at the date of this action, was domiciled in Scotland.

Mr Hume, whose ordinary residence was at Broughty-Ferry, enjoyed the liferent of the residue until his death on 24th February 1875. He was predeceased by the other liferenter. On his death the residue became the property of Georgina M'Cracken, subject to the provisions of the will.

In a multiplepoinding brought by Miss Duncan's trustee, Miss M'Cracken claimed the whole fund in medio, or alternatively the whole fund, "that she may spend the same in buying an annuity." A claim was also lodged by the Crown for succession-duty at the rate of ten per centum on the free residue of Miss Duncan's estate, and on the dividends or interest derived therefrom since the date of Mr Hume's death; or, for succession-duty at the rate of ten per centum on the said free residue as at the date of Mr Hume's death, with interest on the said duty at the rate of four per centum per annum from said date.

The Crown maintained that the reason why moveable property belonging to a person domiciled abroad was exempted from succession-duty was that the property was subject to the jurisdiction of the Courts of the foreign country; but that did not apply when a fund had been created in this country subject exclusively to the jurisdiction of the Courts of this country. It was now a fund which, under the law of the trust, "devolved" in the sense of the second section of the Act upon the fiar on the death of the liferenter. The point had been decided by the House of Lords in the case of Attorney-General v. Campbell, April 22, 1872, L. R., 5 Eng. and Ir. App. 524. Here as there the Court had to deal with a British trust. The funds were invested in this country by the trustee, who resided here, and the trustee brought the action to distribute the estate.

Miss M'Cracken maintained that the right vested in her under the settlement and under the law of France. The restrictions imposed by the will, which prevented her getting possession of the fund till a certain event, did not affect the nature of her right, which was a succession to a person domiciled in France. The succession on which the Crown claimed duty was to an English and not to a French predecessor.[1]

THE LORD ORDINARY (FRASER) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Ranks and prefers the claimant the Lord Advocate upon the fund in medio for succession-duty, at the rate of ten per cent on the free residue as at the date of Mr Hume's death, with interest on the said duty at the rate of four per cent per annum from said date in terms of the alternative of his claim, No. 18 of process; and, subject to that claim, and to the expenses found due to the pursuer and real raiser, ranks and prefers the claimant Georgina M'Cracken to the

---

[1] Wallace v. Attorney-General, Dec. 4, 1865, 1 Ch. App. 1.

No. 118.

Mar. 20, 1888.
Duncan's Trustee v. M'Cracken.

whole balance of the fund in medio, in terms of the first branch of her claim, No. 17 of process: Finds no expenses due to or by either of the claimants, and decerns." *

DRUMMOND & REID, W.S.—MITCHELL & BAXTER, W.S.—DAVID CROLE, Solicitor of Inland Revenue—Agents.

---

* "OPINION.—The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that no proof as to the domicile of the testatrix is necessary in this case, because, assuming the domicile to have been in France, he has come to the conclusion that succession-duty is due.

"The 18th section of the Succession-Duty Act (17 and 17 Vict. cap. 51), enacts that 'No duty shall be payable under this Act upon any succession . . . by any person in respect of a succession who, if the same were a legacy bequeathed to him by the predecessor, would be exempted from the payment of duty in respect thereof under the Legacy-Duty Acts.' Now, as it was decided (Adv.-Gen. v. Thomson, 18th February 1845, 4 Bell's App. 1) that legacy-duty was not exigible where the legacy was bequeathed by a person domiciled in a foreign country, it is said that no succession-duty is claimable by the Crown in the present case. This, however, is a misapprehension of the 18th section of the Succession-Duty Act, because it has been decided that the words quoted referred to exemption by express provision contained in the 55th Geo. III., cap. 184, sched., part 3—See Att.-Gen v. Fitzjohn, 2 Hurlst. & Norman, 465. Therefore, although a bequest may be exempt from legacy-duty because the testator is a foreigner, it does not follow that it may not be a succession, and therefore liable to succession-duty under the wider words of the Succession-Duty Act.

"There are two decisions of the House of Lords of recent date, and the question as to liability for succession-duty depends upon whether the present case comes within the rule laid down in the one case or in the other. The first case was that of Wallace v. Att.-Gen. (L. R., 1 Ch. App. 1), the rubric of which is in the following terms:—'Succession-duty is not payable on legacies given by the will of a person domiciled in a foreign country.' The testator was domiciled in France, but had large personal estate in the English funds, and he bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to the hospitals of Paris and London, and upon this residue succession-duty was claimed, but the House of Lords held that the claim was untenable. The same learned tribunal had the question before them in 1872 in the case of the Att.-Gen. v. Campbell (L. R., 5 E. and I. App. 524), where it appeared that the testator was domiciled in Portugal. He directed his executors to collect all his property which was in Portugal, to convert it into cash, pay certain legacies, and invest the residue in the English three per cents, to appropriate what they should think necessary to pay a life annuity of £50 to his sister, on the termination of which the appropriated fund was to revert to and form part of his residuary estate, and be divided (like the rest) among his three children. The executors exactly performed the directions of the trust; when the sister died the part appropriated to satisfy her annuity became divisible among the children. It was held that this constituted a succession within the meaning of the 2d section of the Succession-Duties Act, and was liable to the payment of succession-duty. Now, this case of Campbell is very similar to the present one. The testatrix in the present case gives a liferent of the whole of her property to her brother-in-law, Mr Hume, whom failing, to Mrs M'Cracken. This liferent corresponds to the annuity given in the case of Campbell. The executors continued to hold the property and to pay the liferent to Mr Hume. The original executors were Mr Hume and Mr M'Cracken. Mr Hume having died, Mr M'Cracken continued to be the sole trustee in the administration till 1878, when he assumed two new trustees and executors in the persons of Francis Cairncross and George Heron, the pursuer and real raiser in this action. The whole property was conveyed over to these new trustees in trust to be applied for the purposes of the will. A further change in the administration took place in October 1878, when Mr M'Cracken died and Mr Cairncross resigned his office of trustee, thus leaving

SUMMER SESSION.

No. 119.

May 19, 1888.
Broad v.
Edinburgh
Northern Tramways Co.

HARRINGTON EVANS BROAD, Petitioner.—Murray.
SAMUEL HENRY DAY AND OTHERS, Respondents.—G. W. Burnet.
HAWTHORNS & COMPANY AND OTHERS, Compearers.—A. J. Young.
MAGISTRATES AND TOWN-COUNCIL OF EDINBURGH, Compearers.—
C. S. Dickson.

Judicial Factor—Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, secs. 56 and 57.—By the 56th and 57th sections of the Companies Clauses Consoli-

---

the administration alone in the hands of Mr Heron, the pursuer, who has continued to administer the estate for behoof of Georgina M'Cracken, to whom the revenues have been paid since Mr Hume's death. The only difference between this case and the case of Campbell is this that in the case of Campbell the property was at the time of the death in Portugal and brought to this country by the executors, whereas in the present case the property was within the United Kingdom at the time of the death, but this, according to the English decisions, as cited by Mr Hanson in his treatise on the Succession Duties Acts (p. 225), is immaterial,—'It is to be observed that in this case the testator expressly directed that his property should be invested in this country, but the principle of the decision equally applies to cases where the trustees have power to invest it here or abroad at their discretion, or where the property itself is already actually invested in this country. For when once the property has been appropriated to answer the specific gift, it acquires the character of a trust-fund as distinguished from an ordinary legacy.' Now, then, let us see what were the grounds upon which the case of Campbell was decided. The Lord Chancellor (Lord Hatherley) said (p. 528),—'In order to have the personal property administered you must seek the forum of that country where the person whose property is in question had acquired a domicile. Then, when you obtain possession of that property, you do all which has to be done in the country to which the testator belonged. The question is afterwards, when the property has been so obtained and administered, and is in the state in which the testator desired it to be placed, in what condition do you find the fund? You find it in the condition of a settled fund. That condition arises no doubt from the operation of the testator's will; but I can see no difference, in consequence of that circumstance, from its having arisen in any other manner, as, for instance, from a deed executed in his lifetime, as might have been the case, or, supposing he had transmitted to his bankers a sum of money to be invested upon the same trusts. When there is any fund standing in this country in the names of trustees in consols or other property which has a quasi local settlement, which stock in the funds has, all the dividends having to be received in this country, and the persons who have to be dealt with in respect of it being persons residing in this country, that fund is subject to succession-duty. The settlement provides for the succession, and the interest of each person on coming into possession is liable to the payment of duty upon that interest to which he so succeeds. That is really the whole question involved in this case.' Now, applying these reasons to the present case, we have an estate situated in, and with executors resident in, the United Kingdom. They obtain probate as such executors, and they and the assumed trustees vest themselves with the administration of this estate, which they continue until the liferenter dies. The fund which is to be given to Georgina M'Cracken upon the expiry of the liferents has as much the character of a settled fund as the sum which was appropriated to paying the annuity in the case of Campbell.

"The executors in the present case are required by the will to give the property over to Georgina M'Cracken, under conditions—viz., 'That the capital shall be placed in such a way that she can neither lend it nor spend it, but may, if she please, buy an annuity with it.' It is very clear that a person to whom money has been bequeathed, without any right overgiven to any other person, cannot be deprived of the jus disponendi by a mere prohibition against alienation; nor can the executor insist, and he does not insist, upon purchasing an annuity for Georgina M'Cracken. . . ."

No. 119. dation (Scotland) Act, 1845, the mortgagees of a company may, for the purpose of enforcing payment of arrears of interest upon their mortgages, apply to the Court of Session for the appointment of a judicial factor upon the undertaking.

May 19, 1888. Broad v. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co.

The duty of the factor under these sections being to receive a portion of the income of the company sufficient to pay the overdue interest, the petitioner is entitled to suggest the name of a person to be appointed to the post, and the Court will, in the absence of personal objections, appoint him.

1ST DIVISION. B.

(VIDE ante, p. 615.)

In this petition for the appointment of a judicial factor upon the undertaking of the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company at the instance of a mortgagee, Mr D. N. Cotton, C.A., was appointed, on 20th March 1888, "interim judicial factor upon the undertaking and property of the company, and to receive the whole or a competent part of the tolls or sums liable in the payment of the interest payable on the mortgages mentioned in the petition until the same, with all costs, shall be fully paid, he finding caution before extract," &c. (vide ante, p. 615). The petition was presented under the 21st section of the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Act, 1887,* and the 56th and 57th sections of the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845.†

The appointment was asked so as to secure a preference over outside creditors, some of whom had obtained decrees against the company for payment of the sums due to them.

Answers were lodged for Samuel Henry Day and others, both holders of mortgages of the company and shareholders, who objected to the appointment of Mr Cotton as factor on the ground that he was the nominee of the

---

* The 21st section of that Act was,—"The mortgagees of the company may enforce payment of arrears of interest or principal, or principal and interest, due on their mortgages by the appointment of a judicial factor. In order to authorise the appointment of a judicial factor in respect of arrears of principal, the amount owing to the mortgagees by whom the application for a judicial factor is made shall not be less in the whole than £500."

† The 56th section was,—"Where, by the special Act, the mortgagees of the company shall be empowered to enforce the payment of the arrears of interest, or the arrears of principal and interest, due on such mortgages, by the appointment of a judicial factor, then, if within thirty days after the interest accruing upon any such mortgage or bond has become payable, and after demand thereof in writing the same be not paid, the mortgagee may, without prejudice to his right to sue for the interest so in arrear in any competent Court, require the appointment of a judicial factor by an application to be made as hereinafter provided," &c.

The 57th section was,—"Every application for a judicial factor in the cases aforesaid shall be made to the Court of Session, and on any such application so made, and after hearing the parties, it shall be lawful for the said Court, by order in writing, to appoint some person to receive the whole or a competent part of the tolls or sums liable to the payment of such interest, or such principal and interest, as the case may be, until such interest, or until such principal and interest, as the case may be, together with all costs, including the charges of receiving the tolls or sums aforesaid, be fully paid; and upon such appointment being made, all such tolls and sums of money as aforesaid shall be paid to and received by the person so to be appointed; and the money so to be received shall be so much money received by or to the use of the party to whom such interest, or such principal and interest, as the case may be, shall be then due, and on whose behalf such judicial factor shall have been appointed; and after such interest and costs, or such principal, interest, and costs, have been so received, the power of such judicial factor shall cease, and he shall be bound to account to the company for his intromissions, or the sums received by him, and to pay over to their treasurer any balance that may be in his hands."

No. 119.

May 19, 1888.
Broad v. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co.

petitioner, and that their interests conflicted with his. They did not, however, object to the appointment of a neutral person selected by the Court.

Hawthorns & Company and the Magistrates of Edinburgh, who were ordinary creditors of the company, compeared and raised the same objections.

Argued for the petitioner;—The reason why the appointment of Mr Cotton had been asked for was that he was the auditor of the company, and therefore thoroughly acquainted with its accounts. Even supposing there were conflicting interests,—which was not admitted,—the judicial factor had nothing to do with these. His duties were simply to collect the tolls and to pay over the interest. The factor would not pay the interest on one mortgage more than on another. It would have been different if any personal objection had been stated to Mr Cotton's appointment, but none had been stated. Hawthorns & Company and the Magistrates of Edinburgh were mere ordinary creditors, and had no right to appear until all the interest upon the mortgages was paid.

Argued for the respondents;—They were quite willing to leave the appointment of a factor in the hands of the Court, but they objected, for obvious reasons, to the appointment of a nominee of the petitioner. It had been held in an English case[1] that the first person appointed as a receiver and manager under the 4th section of the Railways Companies Act, 1867, remained so until all the ordinary creditors had been paid their arrears. That case applied here, and consequently it was of the greatest importance that a neutral person should be appointed.

Lord President.—Although the person to be appointed under this petition is called a judicial factor, both in the petition and in the statute, that name is a little misleading, because he is not clothed with the ordinary powers of a judicial factor. He is not appointed under this clause as manager of the company, as Mr Haldane was in the case of Girvan and Portpatrick Railway Co. (8 R. 669 and 1003, 9 R. 253). He is what is called in England a receiver, and, so far as I understand, he was appointed to receive a portion of the income of the company sufficient to pay the overdue interest upon the petitioner's mortgages. That is the whole object and aim of the appointment. The mortgagee as soon as his interest is overdue is entitled, as matter of legal right, to make the application, and, in my opinion, it is only right that a creditor or mortgagee should suggest to the Court the person whom he would wish to see appointed to look after his interests. Of course if there is any personal objection to the person who is proposed that is another matter. But there is not a word to be said against Mr Cotton except that he happens to know a good deal about this company, which I think affords a very great qualification for the office. He is the auditor of the company, and I can hardly conceive a safer hand to which to entrust the collection of a portion of the company's income in order to pay the interest due to the petitioner. I do not see any reason for refusing the appointment.

Lord Adam and Lord Kinnear concurred.

Lord Mure and Lord Shand were absent.

The Court accordingly continued Mr Cotton's appointment as judicial factor.

Graham, Johnston, & Fleming, W.S.—A. & G. V. Mann, S.S.C.—J. Knox Crawford, S.S.C.—Agents.

---

[1] In re Mersey Railway Co., Jan. 11, 1888, L. R., 37 Chanc. Div. 610.

No. 120.

May 24, 1888.
Hutchison, Main, & Co. v. Pattullo Brothers.

HUTCHISON, MAIN, & COMPANY, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—D.-F. Mackintosh —C. S. Dickson.

PATTULLO BROTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—Murray—Kennedy.

Patent—Specification—Construction—Disconformity between provisional and complete specification.—The provisional specification of a patent for "improvements in treating oils and fats" set forth:—"This invention has for its object the treating of oils and fats in an improved manner and so as to render them more suitable for various applications, and it consists in subjecting the oil, whether mineral, vegetable, or animal, or the fat to a temperature about equal to that of boiling water for eight or ten days, the oil or fat being exposed to air in layers of about half an inch in depth. . . . The treating of vegetable or animal oils or fats in the described manner has the effect of at once developing any tendency to thicken, so that when the thus thickened oil or fat is thinned to the desired consistency by combination with the mineral oil it forms a superior lubricant, having less tendency to thicken when in use. The thickening of the vegetable or animal oils or fats, which is believed to be due to oxidation, makes them better adapted for saponification and other uses besides that of forming lubricants."

The complete specification set forth:—"My said invention has for its object the treating of oils and fats in an improved manner, and so as to render them more suitable for making lubricants, and it consists mainly in subjecting the oil, whether mineral, vegetable, or animal, or the fat to heat whilst exposed to the air in shallow layers. . . . In practically carrying out my said invention in dealing with vegetable or animal oils or fats I prefer to expose them in shallow pans or dishes to the combined action of atmospheric air and heat, with or without the addition of water, for a lengthened time. The addition of water accelerates the process, but the colour of the oxidised oil or fat is generally paler if treated without water. . . . The mixing of a thickened or oxidised vegetable or animal oil or fat with mineral oil to form a compound of consistency and quality suitable for a lubricant is a part of my invention, irrespective of the precise means adopted for thickening or oxidising the oil. . . ." The specification claimed as the novelty of the invention,—"1. The subjecting of oils and fats in shallow layers to the joint action of air and heat, substantially as and for the purposes hereinbefore described. 2. The combining of oxidised or thickened vegetable or animal oils or fats with mineral oils, substantially as and for the purpose hereinbefore described."

In an action for damages for infringement of the patent against an oil manufacturer who combined oxidised or thickened vegetable and animal oils with mineral oils in order to form a lubricant, and thickened the vegetable and animal oils through the influence of air and heat, but by a different process from that described by the pursuer in his patent, held, after a proof, (1) that if the first head of the pursuer's claim in his patent was to be construed as a claim to a process there had been no infringement, the defender's process being different; if it was to be construed as a claim to a product the patent was invalid for want of novelty, oxidised or thickened animal and vegetable oils having been well known long prior to the date of the patent; (2) that the patent was invalid on the further ground that the complete specification claimed more than the provisional specification, in respect that the second head of the claim in the complete specification claimed as part of the invention the combination of thickened animal and vegetable oils with mineral oils irrespective of the process by which the thickening had been effected, whereas the provisional specification was limited to the thickening of vegetable and mineral oils in the particular manner therein described; and (3) that the patent was also invalid on the ground that the mixing of animal and vegetable with mineral oils either required no invention, or, if it did, that the process had not been disclosed.

Patent—Infringement—Prior use—Trade secret.—In an action of damages for infringement of a patent the defenders pleaded, inter alia, prior use, and in support of that plea adduced a witness from the firm of manufacturers from whom they had bought the articles said to constitute the infringement. This witness

No. 120.

May 24, 1888.
Hutchison, Main, & Co. v. Pattullo Brothers.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Kinnear.
M.

deponed that his firm had been in the habit of manufacturing the articles for many years before the date of the pursuer's patent, but that they had kept their process "to themselves" as long as they could, and it appeared that it did not become a matter of public knowledge until after the date of the pursuer's patent. Held that the patent was invalid by reason of prior use.

ON 15th December 1886 Hutchison, Main, & Company, oil manufacturers, Glasgow, and Robert Hutchison, a partner of that firm, raised an action against Pattullo Brothers, oil refiners and merchants, Glasgow, concluding for payment of £10,000, as damages for the alleged infringement of a patent granted to Robert Hutchison, dated 10th October 1873 for the invention of "Improvements in treating oils and fats."

As appeared from the proof in the action animal and vegetable oils, known as "fat oils," are dear, and from their tendency to thicken in use, from the action of the atmosphere, and so to clog the machinery, they are unsatisfactory lubricants. Mineral oils on the other hand are too thin for use as lubricants except for very light machinery. Mineral oils and fat oils in their natural state cannot be advantageously mixed, because the fat oils, with the exception of castor oil, are not of sufficient gravity to bear dilution with the thinner mineral oils, and castor oil is only imperfectly soluble in mineral oil. The pursuers claimed for their invention that by oxidising or thickening fat oils in the way described in the specification they were made more suitable and valuable for use in the manufacture of lubricants, and that by combining the oxidised or thickened fat oils with mineral oils as mentioned in the specification a superior lubricant was produced at a low price.

The provisional specification set forth the invention thus:—

"This invention has for its object the treating of oils and fats in an improved manner and so as to render them more suitable for various applications, and it consists in subjecting the oil whether mineral, vegetable, or animal, or the fat to a temperature about equal to that of boiling water for eight or ten days, the oil or fat being exposed to air in layers of about half an inch in depth.

"The elements of the process may be modified; thus, with a greater depth or lower temperature, the treatment must be prolonged. In the case of mineral oil an alkali or alkaline carbonate or alkaline earth, by preference in solution or suspended in water, is added to the oil before heating it—and the treatment has the effect of removing the blueness or fluorescence which is considered objectionable in some mineral oils, and of rendering the oil more suitable for combining with a vegetable or animal oil or fat to make a good lubricant.

"The treating of vegetable or animal oils or fats in the described manner has the effect of at once developing any tendency to thicken, so that when the thus thickened oil or fat is thinned to the desired consistency by combination with the mineral oil it forms a superior lubricant, having less tendency to thicken when in use.

"The thickening of the vegetable or animal oils or fats, which is believed to be due to oxidation, makes them better adapted for saponification and other uses besides that of forming lubricants."

The specification, dated 7th April 1874, as amended 24th September 1886 under the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, set forth the nature of the invention in the following terms, the deletions made at the amendment being within brackets and the additions in italic type:—

"My said invention has for its object the treating of oils and fats in an improved manner, and so as to render them more suitable for [various applications;] making lubricants, and it consists mainly in subjecting the oil, whether mineral, vegetable, or animal, or the fat to heat whilst exposed to the air in shallow layers.

No. 120.
May 24, 1888.
Hutchison, Main, & Co. v. Pattullo Brothers.

"One important object of my invention is to oxidise or thicken vegetable or animal oils or fats so as to render them better adapted for mixing with mineral oils to form lubricants of various qualities.

"The treating or oxidising of vegetable or animal oils or fats in the manner indicated is believed to have the effect of at once developing any tendency to thicken, so that when the thus thickened oil or fat is subsequently thinned to the desired consistency by being mixed with a suitable mineral oil it forms a superior lubricant, having less tendency to thicken when in use.

"[The thickening of the vegetable or animal oils or fats, which I believe to be due to oxidation, makes them better adapted for saponification and other uses besides that of forming lubricants.]

"In practically carrying out my said invention in dealing with vegetable or animal oils or fats, I prefer to expose them in shallow pans or dishes to the combined action of atmospheric air and heat, with or without the addition of water, for a lengthened time. The addition of water accelerates the process, but the colour of the oxidised oil or fat is generally paler if treated without water.

"The duration of the treatment has in practice to be regulated to suit the kind or quality of the oil or fat operated upon, and is best ascertained by trial. I may, however, state by way of example that if lard oil is exposed without water in a depth of one-half to three-quarters of an inch, and the heat is maintained at about 212 degrees Fahrenheit, it continues to increase in body and specific gravity for eight or ten days and nights. It is then of about the same body and specific gravity as castor oil, and will readily mix with mineral oil in any proportion.

"The mixing of a thickened or oxidised vegetable or animal oil or fat with mineral oil to form a compound of consistency and quality suitable for a lubricant is a part of my invention, irrespective of the precise means adopted for thickening or oxidising the oil.

"In the case of mineral oil [whether] to be used for forming a lubricant [or not], I add to the oil an alkali or alkaline salt or alkaline earth, by preference in solution or suspended in water, and then expose the oil to the action of atmospheric air and heat, and the treatment has the effect of removing the blueness or fluorescence which is considered objectionable in mineral oils, and of rendering the oil more suitable for combining with a vegetable or animal oil or fat to make a good lubricant. Owing to the great variety in the sources and modes of production of mineral oils and their various qualities and degrees of purity, the treatment requires to be adjusted by means of practical trials to each kind. I may however state as an example that with most Scotch shale oil, which has been well refined, ten to fourteen days will suffice for a depth of oil of a few inches, the temperature maintained being about 212 degrees Fahrenheit. The proportion of alkali required is very small, and if caustic alkali is used it will be sufficient if when it is well mixed with the oil its presence is barely detected by the taste. In treating mineral oil the depth need not be limited, but a better result as regards colour is obtained when the oil is heated in shallow layers.

"Having thus particularly described my said invention, and the manner of performing the same, I have to state that what I believe to be novel and original, and claim as the invention secured to me by the hereinbefore in part recited letters-patent, is,—

"1. The subjecting of oils and fats in shallow layers to the joint action of air and heat, substantially as and for the purposes hereinbefore described.

"2. The combining of oxidised or thickened vegetable or animal oils or fats with mineral oils, substantially as and for the purpose hereinbefore described."

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 3) "It has recently come to the pursuers' knowledge, and it is the fact, that the defenders have for many years past, without any right or liberty to do so, been using the said invention and infringing the said letters-patent. In particular, they have for several years past been regularly and habitually buying, using, and selling large quantities of vegetable and animal oils and fats which had been treated and oxidised or thickened in the manner described in the specification of said letters-patent, or in a manner substantially the same. They have thus infringed the said letters-patent. They have also for many years past, in their premises in Glasgow, been combining oxidised or thickened vegetable or animal oils or fats with mineral oils for the purpose and in the manner, or in a manner substantially the same as that described in the specification of said letters-patent; and they have thus made and they have also sold large quantities of lubricants of various qualities in violation of said letters-patent. When so buying, using, selling, and combining oils and fats as aforesaid the defenders were well aware of the pursuers' said letters-patent, and that the said oils and fat so bought, used, and sold by the defenders had been made or treated in infringement of the pursuers' said patent, and that the defenders in buying, using, selling, and combining as aforesaid, were infringing the said letters-patent."

The defenders averred;—(Stat. 2) "The only thickened or oxidised oil or fat which the defenders, so far as they knew, have purchased, or used or sold, or mixed or combined with mineral oils to form a lubricant, is a substance known as lardine. . . . The said substance has been in common and extensive use, and has been a familiar article in the market for many years, and known to be so by the pursuers. Lardine was offered to the defenders by first-rate manufacturers in the ordinary course of business through their respective agents or travellers . . . The said manufacturers are Messrs Charles Price & Company, London, Messrs Palmer & Company, London, Messrs C. H. Handyside & Company, Dalkeith. The said substance, as the defenders are now informed, consists of seed oil oxidised or thickened, but not by the process or method of treatment set out in the said Robert Hutchison's specification. The defenders had no means of ascertaining, and it cannot be ascertained from any examination of the said substance as purchased and used by the defenders, by what process or method of treatment it was made or prepared. The substance was bought and used by the defenders in the limited quantities mentioned, in good faith and in entire ignorance of the pursuer Robert Hutchison's patent. . . ." (Stat. 3) "The letters-patent granted to the said Robert Hutchison are invalid,—(1) The alleged invention, at least in so far as regards the combining or mixing of oxidised or thickened vegetable or animal oils or fats with mineral oils to form lubricants, being the second part set out in the foresaid amended specification, was not the subject-matter of a grant of letters-patent within the meaning of the Patent Acts. There is no ingenuity or invention displayed in the said second part. (2) The specification, even as amended, was disconform to the provisional specification lodged by the said Robert Hutchison with his petition on or about 10th October 1873, and claims an invention different from or not embraced in that disclosed in the provisional specification. There is no sufficient distinction between what was old or was in use and known at and prior to the date of the said letters-patent, and what was new or claimed as new by the said alleged inventor. Further, there is claimed as new, inventions which were old and well known at the date of the said patent. (3) The specification, as amended, was insufficient, and was unintelligible. It does not particularly disclose the nature of the invention and in what manner it is to be performed. (4) The alleged invention was not new or original. At least material parts of the said alleged invention were not new or original. The said Robert Hutchison was not the first and true inventor of the alleged invention described in the said letters-patent and relative specifications, and it was not first published in Great Britain by him. It was published and was publicly known and used in Great Britain prior to the date of the said letters-patent. . . . The subjecting of oils and fats to the joint action of air and heat for the purpose of oxidising or thickening them, so as to render them more suitable for making lubricants, was not novel or original, having been used prior to the date of the said patent and down to the present time by the foresaid Messrs Price & Company," and others, "at their respective works aforesaid, and by manufacturers generally in Scotland and England. Further, the combining oxidised or thickened vegetable or animal oils or fats with mineral oils, for forming lubricants, was not novel or original. Oxidised or thickened oils or fats, vegetable or animal, have been commonly used from a period long prior to the date of the said letters-patent down to the present time, for combining with mineral oils to form lubricants, and for other purposes, by the foresaid Messrs Price & Company, and by oil refiners and merchants generally, and by members of the public throughout Scotland and England."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defenders having infringed the said letters-patent as aforesaid, and having thereby caused loss to the pursuers, the defenders are liable therefor.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers' averments not being relevant or sufficient in specification of particulars of the alleged infringements, the action should be dismissed with expenses. (2) The said alleged letters-patent being invalid in respect of (a) disconformity between the provisional specification and the final specification as amended relative thereto, (b) insufficiency and unintelligibility of the said final specification as amended, the defenders should be assoilzied, with expenses. (3) The alleged invention for which the said alleged letters-patent were granted not being, at least quoad a material part thereof, competently the subject-matter of a grant of letters-patent within the meaning of the Patents Acts, the said letters-patent are not valid or effectual. (4) The said alleged letters-patent are not valid or effectual in respect (a) the said Robert Hutchison was not the first and true inventor of the alleged invention described in the said letters-patent and specification; (b) the alleged invention was publicly known prior to the date of the said letters-patent; (c) the alleged invention was publicly used prior to the said date; (d) the alleged invention is of no public practical utility. (5) The material averments of the pursuers being unfounded in fact, the defenders should be assoilzied, with expenses. (7) The defenders not having infringed the letters-patent granted to Robert Hutchison, assuming the same to be valid, should be assoilzied.

On 12th March 1887 the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, in so far as regards the second head of the claim in the complete specification, No. 6 of process, the said specification does not set forth a new and original invention with sufficient clearness and precision to sustain a patent: Finds that, in so far as regards the said second head of the claim, the complete specification claims an invention larger than and different from that disclosed in the provisional specification: Therefore finds that the patent is void in law: To this extent and effect sustains the defences, dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

No. 120.

May 24, 1888.
Hutchison, Main, & Co. v. Pattullo Brothers.

---

* "OPINION.—The pursuer's patent is challenged on various grounds, which involve disputed matters of fact. But the objection taken to the second head of the claim arises upon the construction of the specification alone; and I think the validity of the objection may be determined without subjecting the parties to the expense of a proof.

"By this second head the pursuer claims as part of the invention secured to him by the patent, 'the combining of oxidised or thickened vegetable or animal oils or fats with mineral oils, substantially as and for the purpose hereinbefore described.' There is no question that the purpose of the combination is to make a lubricant. But the only part of the specification in which the supposed invention of a combination of oils for that purpose is described, is a single sentence at page 3, line 13, where the patentee says,—'The mixing of a thickened or oxidised vegetable or animal oil or fat with mineral oil, to form a compound of consistency and quality suitable for a lubricant, is a part of my invention, irrespective of the precise means adopted for thickening or oxidising the oil.' These last words appear to me to be the material words to consider in construing this claim. In the previous part of the specification the patentee had described a particular method of treating vegetable or animal oils or fats for the purpose of oxidising or thickening the oil so as to make it suitable for a lubricant; and in the immediately following paragraph he describes a particular method of treating mineral oil for the same purpose. These processes are the inventions claimed under the first head of the claim; and if the patent is good it will protect the pursuer against the unauthorised use of oils prepared in the manner described, whether the animal or vegetable and the mineral oils are used separately or in combination. But when he comes to describe the mixture which he claims under the second head, he does not confine his claim to oils which have been treated by his own methods, but claims as part of his invention the mixing of oils of the kind described irrespective of the means by which they have been prepared or made suitable for mixing. It appears to me that this part of the specification does not set forth a new and original invention with sufficient clearness and precision to sustain the patent; because the process of mixing oils which are supposed to be suitable for being mixed either requires no invention at all, or, if it does require invention, the process is not disclosed.

"The specification assumes that in order to be suitable for a lubricant the compound must be of a certain quality and consistency. But the patentee gives no information as to the means by which the necessary consistency and quality are to be obtained.

"If it depends entirely on the original quality or treatment of the separate oils, there is no invention in bringing them together and mixing them. If it depends upon any adjustment of proportions or upon any process in making the mixture which it requires study or ingenuity to discover, there is no explanation of the process to be found in the specification. It is not immaterial that in describing his own treatment of the oils the patentee alleges that it is one of the advantages of his system that it makes the animal and mineral oils respectively more suitable for combining with one another. I assume that the process for which he claims this advantage is a novel and meritorious invention. But he does not say that it is the only means of preparing oils so as to be suitable for mixing. On the contrary, he assumes that there may be other methods, because he makes his claim for the compound wide enough to include oils which have been thickened or oxidised by some other method than his. The assumption of the claim therefore is, that the manufacturer may be possessed of oils which are not only suitable for mixing but which have been specially prepared for that purpose, either by means that are known to all the world or by some method which he has discovered by his own ingenuity, and yet that he cannot mix them without infringing the pursuer's patent. It does not seem likely that there should be any difficulty in mixing oils which are suitable for mixing.

No. 120.

May 24, 1888.
Hutchison, Main, & Co. v. Pattullo Brothers.

The pursuers reclaimed.

On 29th June 1887 the Second Division recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary.

The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof.

The evidence led by the defenders shewed that long prior to the date of the pursuers' patent a process for thickening fat oils with a view to mixing them with mineral oils, similar to but not identical with theirs, had been in use at the works of Messrs Price & Co. in London. The details of the evidence on this point are given in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, infra, p. 652, note. With reference to the question how far the nature of this process became known to the public, the evidence quoted below was given.* There was no evidence that this process was in use at any other works than Price's prior to the date of the pursuers' patent.

But if there is, the patentee has not explained where it lies or how it is to be removed.

"Another construction of the specification was suggested, by which the patentee's invention was supposed to be the thickening or oxidising of oils, irrespective of the precise means by which they might be thickened or oxidised. And if this were so, he might be entitled to include in his claim all oxidised or thickened oils, whether used separately or in combination. But then the patent would be bad as a patent for a principle independently of any method for carrying it out. And, accordingly, the patentee has sufficiently guarded against this misconstruction by the first head of his claim, when he makes it clear that his invention does not consist in thickening or oxidising oils, but in subjecting them, for that purpose, to a particular process, which he describes.

"If I am right in thinking that by the second head of his claim the pursuer claims as part of his invention the mixing of oils which have been treated by other methods than those claimed under the first head, the complete specification claims a different invention from that set forth in the provisional invention, which is confined to one particular process for oxidising oils, by exposing them to the joint action of air and heat."

* Mr John Harvey, one of the partners of Price & Company, gave this evidence:—"We did not at first offer to the trade the thickened oil in an unmixed state, because we supplied consumers with the compound and not manufacturers of lubricants. In fact, so long as we could keep the process pretty well to ourselves it paid us better to get both profits by supplying the total compound than by supplying thickened oil to the manufacturer, who would proceed to make the compound and get his profit out of that. We managed for a long time to keep the matter to ourselves. At the same time, as regards this process which was going on in our works, it was not in any way kept secret any more than any other process in the works. It was patent to all the workmen who were concerned in it, and we sold the manufactured oil all over the world. We used to treat probably from eight to ten tons at a time in each tank. In a busy season we can treat sixty or seventy tons of the heavy oil in a week. About 1869 we did about forty tons a-week. Eventually the method was more widely promulgated. One of our employees was dismissed, and he disclosed the secret to a rival firm. After that we found that these thickened oils were put largely into the market by other people than ourselves. The term lardine was invented by a French clerk whom we had for the purpose of selling thickened oil on the Continent."

Mr J. D. Palmer, managing partner of Palmer & Company, oil merchants, London, deponed,—"It was in 1880 that we first began to blow oil in the way we have been doing lately. A man came to our office one day bringing with him two samples of oil, and asked me whether I would be inclined to employ him. He said he was able to take the one sample, and by processes of which he was the master turn it into the other. The one sample was evidently much more viscous than the other. He stated that he had been in Price & Company's works, but had ceased his connection with them. We accordingly

No. 120.

May 24, 1888.
Hutchison, Main, & Co. v. Pattullo Brothers.

The patent expired in October 1887.

On 10th January 1888 the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor assoilzieing the defenders from the conclusions of the action.*

---

allowed him to put up machinery with the view of doing that. He did not communicate the process to us in the first instance. He asked employment to carry out the process secretly himself, and said he would divulge it if we gave him an agreement for a certain number of years. This we eventually did, and he then divulged it. He told me it was a process which he had brought from Price & Company's place. We put up machinery and proceeded to blow oil. These oils became thicker, and we mixed them with mineral oil and sold them in the trade. I never heard of pursuer's patent till this case arose."

* "OPINION.—The object of the pursuer's invention, as expressed in the specification, is the treatment of oils and fats in an improved manner, so as to make them more suitable for lubricants. In his evidence he says that prior to 1873, when his invention was made patent, the lubricating oils known to the trade were very unsatisfactory. Animal and vegetable oils, which are known as fat oils, were dear; and they had a tendency to thicken in use from the action of the atmosphere, so as to clog the machinery which they were intended to lubricate. Mineral oils which had recently come into use were too thin, except for very light machinery; and mineral oils and fat oils could not be advantageously mixed, because the fat oils, with one exception, were not of sufficient gravity to bear dilution with the thinner mineral oil. The one exception was castor oil; and from causes which have not been explained, castor oil is not soluble, or only imperfectly soluble, in mineral oil. In that condition of matters the pursuer says that he set himself to discover a method of thickening the mineral oil so as to obtain as the result an oil of sufficient gravity for heavy machinery, which should be free from the tendency of fat oils in their natural condition, to thicken in use. And his case is that he has discovered a method of treatment for that purpose, by which he thickens fat oils in such a way as to enable them to be advantageously mixed with mineral oil, and to form a satisfactory lubricant. The process which he has thus discovered is described in his specification as consisting 'mainly in subjecting the oil, whether mineral, vegetable, or animal, or the fat to heat while exposed to the air in shallow layers.' But he explains that the main purpose for which he subjects mineral oil to this process is to remove what he describes in the specification as the blueness or fluorescence, which is considered objectionable in mineral oils; and the purpose with which he subjects fat oils to the same treatment is to thicken or oxidise them.

"I do not think it at all doubtful that the pursuer's process, which he has protected by his patent, has in fact the valuable effect which he ascribes to it. The oil by being exposed to the air in the manner described becomes oxidised, and it has been proved by experience that this oxidised oil may be produced of any thickness or gravity that may be desired up to the gravity of castor oil; that the oil so treated is readily mixable with mineral oil, and that the mixture has no tendency to thicken in use. Whether the thickening of the oil is entirely due to oxidation does not appear to be certain, but the thickening and oxidation, according to the evidence, are always found together; and, at all events, it is not disputed that the result which the pursuer desired to obtain, and has obtained successfully, is due to the exposure of the oil to the combined action of air and heat, which causes oxidation.

"The product, according to the evidence, is of considerable commercial value, and the pursuer alleges that his invention has had a great effect upon the trade; that it has enabled mineral oil, which before could not be used for lubricating work at all, to be used in enormous quantities when mixed with thickened vegetable oil, and that the thickened oil has been so largely used that it has come to be known in the trade by a special name which has been given to it, and is called lardine.

"The defenders are said to have made use of this invention and infringed the patent by purchasing lardine, manufactured according to the pursuer's method by Messrs Price & Company, Messrs Palmer & Company, and Messrs

No. 120.
May 24, 1888.
Hutchison, Main, & Co. v. Pattullo Brothers.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—(1) On the question of prior use.—Down to 1876 Price & Company had applied air and heat to animal and Handyside, and combining it with mineral oils to form a lubricant, or selling it for the purpose of being so combined. There can be no doubt that the lubricant purchased by the defenders, and manufactured by these London firms, and sold under the name of lardine, is a thickened vegetable oil, or that the thickening is produced by a process by which the oil is oxidised by the combined action of air and heat. But it is an entirely different process from that described in the pursuer's specification, and before considering whether it falls within the scope of his patent or not I think it is desirable to see exactly what the process is, and what is the history of its use by the firms in question.

---

"The evidence upon both of these points is perfectly distinct. The process in question was adopted first by Messrs Price & Company of London. It differs from the pursuer's process in this respect, that instead of being exposed, as he directs, in shallow layers, the vegetable oil is put into circular vessels 10 feet in diameter by 6 feet 6 inches deep; in the interior of these vessels there is an arrangement of pipes for conducting air, steam, and cold water; the oil is heated by the application of steam, and air is blown through the heated oil, which, under this treatment, becomes oxidised so as to enable it to be mixed advantageously with mineral oil. I think it proved that this is a more expeditious and economical method than the pursuer's, because it enables larger quantities of oil to be treated in a given time. But it undoubtedly resembles the pursuer's in this respect, that the oil so treated is oxidised by the action of heat and air alone; and being so oxidised, it is found to possess the advantages which he claims as the special merits of his process.

"I think it proved that this process has been in use in Messrs Price & Company's manufactory for many years before the pursuer began his experiments in 1873. Mr Harvey, a partner of that firm, says that he found it in operation when he joined the firm in 1869. Mr Colls, who has been in their employment since 1871, says that it has been in operation during the whole time of his service; and Mr Dodd, their general manager, says that it began so far back as 1862. He says that in the winter of 1861-62 he was present at a conversation between Mr Price, a former partner of the firm, and Mr Keats, their consulting chemist, who is now dead, in the course of which they discussed a lecture about to be given by a Mr Hubbard on the thickening of oils by oxidation; that Mr Keats attended the lecture, and afterwards made certain experiments, and ultimately instructed the witness to fit up an apparatus of the kind now in use; that this was done; and that since this first beginning in 1862 the firm has been carrying on the process continuously and with success.

"It is suggested that the process thus described was borrowed from that disclosed in Dunn's patent of 1843, for 'purifying and bleaching oils and fats'; and that its true purpose was not to thicken but to purify the oil. All of the witnesses whom I have mentioned say that they never heard of Dunn's patent; and, what is more important, they all state most positively that their purpose was not to bleach but to thicken. If this is true, and I see no reason to doubt their testimony, it is of no consequence whether their process was originally borrowed from Dunn's or not. Nor should I have thought it very material, even if it were shewn that Messrs Price & Company's apparatus was originally constructed for the purpose of bleaching, provided it has been used in fact for the purpose of oxidising, and so of thickening, for a period beginning before 1873. That their process is in fact identical with Dunn's there can be no doubt. But they carry it on further than he directed, for the purpose of producing an effect which he did not foresee or did not disclose. He describes a process of blowing air through oil, for the purpose of bleaching and not of thickening. But it is in evidence that it is impossible to bleach effectually without thickening to a certain extent; that thickening is an essentially progressive process; and that the greater or less extent to which the oil may be thickened depends upon nothing but the quantity of air blown through it.

"The question, therefore is, Whether this process was in fact employed by

No. 120.

May 24, 1888.
Hutchison, Main, & Co. v. Pattullo Brothers.

vegetable oils only for the purpose of bleaching, and not for the purpose of thickening, and as the pursuers' patent was dated in 1873, there had

---

Messrs Price & Company before 1873, for the purpose of oxidising animal or vegetable oils, so as to produce a lubricant, either to be used alone, or to be mixed with mineral oils? The evidence, to my mind, leaves no room for doubt that it was so used, and with a view to the advantages described in the pursuer's specification. Mr Harvey says that since he joined the firm in 1869, they have been in the habit of treating fat oils in the manner described, of mixing the oils so treated with mineral oils, and of selling the compound to a very large extent in their business. And the evidence of the two managers is to the same effect. It is true that in the earlier years they did not thicken to the same extent as they do now; but that is not of material importance, because thickening to an appreciable extent will involve an infringement or an anticipation of the pursuer's patent, provided it be produced by a process which will fall within his claim. Taking the gravity of rape seed or cotton oil, in their unoxidised condition, Mr Harvey's evidence is that in 1869 they used to thicken to 930 or 940, whereas they now thicken to the gravity of castor oil (969), which is given in the pursuer's specification as an example of the effect of his process, and to much higher gravities. He cannot give the exact date when they began to use the higher gravities. But the material considerations are that the advance is not due to any new discovery, but to the natural progress of the manufacture, and to a great increase in the number of mineral oils available for mixing; and, secondly, that the process of which the pursuer complains as an infringement is exactly the same as that in use in 1869. The only difference is that the oil is treated for a longer time, so that a greater quantity of air may be blown through. . . .

"It is said, however, that the evidence as to Messrs Price & Company's process is not trustworthy. This is a question of credibility, as to which it is enough to say that I see no reason to doubt the veracity of the witnesses, and that I accordingly accept their testimony as true. Their statement is in no way inconsistent with the evidence as to the great increase which is said to have taken place in recent years in the consumption of lardine. The pursuer has failed to prove that this is to be ascribed to his invention. It is not unimportant that the name of 'lardine,' which he says has been given to his product, appears to have been invented by a French clerk of Messrs Price & Company to denote the blown oils of that firm. But it is more material that there is no evidence that the pursuer's patent, or the process which it describes, had become known to manufacturers or dealers in oils until shortly before this action was raised. Lardine had undoubtedly become known as an article of commerce, but his invention was not known; and it is certain that it was not from his invention that Price & Company and Palmer & Company, who would appear to be the largest manufacturers, have borrowed their process.

"If this view of the facts is correct, the question which has been raised as to the construction of the specification is of little importance; because if Messrs Price & Company's process differs substantially from the invention which is claimed to be novel, there is no infringement. And, on the other hand, if it does not substantially differ, the patent is invalidated by the prior use, which in that case must be held to be established. But since the question of fact is in controversy, it may be proper to consider also the question of construction. It is said that the pursuer's invention consists—first, in the discovery that it is possible to thicken fat oils without decomposition and without the addition of any foreign substance, by heat and air alone; second, in the discovery that it is possible to mix oils so thickened with mineral oils, so as to form a lubricant; and, third, in the elaboration of a particular process for applying the discovery in practice. The invention that is claimed as novel is therefore said to be the thickening of oils by exposing them to air and heat, either by the method described or by any other method which operates exclusively by air and heat. I am unable to adopt this reading of the specification. Without taking Messrs Price & Company's process into consideration at all, there is evidence that before thus been no prior use by Price & Company in point of fact. The Lord Ordinary had taken a wrong view of the evidence. But admitting that the 1873 it was known generally that the exposure of fat oil to air would have the effect of thickening it, and also that the process would be accelerated by heat. I do not think it proved that this was generally recognised as a principle which could be applied to any practical effect, so as to produce an article of commercial value. But it is proved by the evidence of Mr Allan and Mr Falconer King that these general facts were known. I do not think if the pursuer's specification be fairly construed with reference to the statements which he gave in the box as to the experiments which he made and the purpose of these experiments, that he represents himself to have discovered either of these facts as an entirely new principle. I think that what he does claim to have discovered is —first, that fat oils may be thickened by treating them in the particular manner which he describes—that is, by subjecting them to heat and air in shallow layers; and secondly, that when animal or vegetable oils have been so thickened or oxidised, they will mix with mineral oils. And accordingly, when he comes to define what is novel and original in the process which he describes, he states his claim under two separate heads; the first of which relates to the treatment of unmixed oils and fats; and the second to the mixing of oxidised or thickened vegetable or animal oils with mineral oils. But under the first head he limits his claim in clear and distinct terms to the subjecting of oils and fats in shallow layers to the joint action of air and heat, substantially as and for the purposes described. That is not a claim for the oxidation of oils by any other method than that described; it is a claim for the particular process described for the purpose of oxidising or thickening. It may still be a perfectly good claim for a new invention, which is a fit subject for a patent, even although it be proved, as I think it is, that a different method of oxidation had been publicly used by Messrs Price & Company before the pursuer's invention was made patent; and it follows that Messrs Price & Company's process would not be an infringement if it were later than the pursuer's patent.

---

"It is said that the second claim is intended to cover any method of oxidation which operates by heat and air exclusively; but the second claim is not for the treatment of unmixed oils, but solely for the mixing of fat oils, already treated in the manner described by the pursuer, or oxidised in some other manner, with mineral oils. There can be no infringement under this second head of the claim, unless the oil, thickened or oxidised in whatever manner, has been mixed. There is no infringement by merely oxidising or thickening. In construing this second claim without the information which is now to be obtained from the evidence as to the nature of the process which is described, it appeared to me objectionable for the reasons stated in my former opinion. The special subject of this claim is not the treatment of the oil, but the mixing of the oil after it has been treated. The assumption of the claim therefore is, that the manufacturer is possessed of oils which have been treated in such a way as to make them fit for mixing; and that being so, the pursuer goes on to say, 'If he mixes the oils which have been so treated, then he infringes my invention.' It appeared to me that the process of mixing oils, already treated in such a way as to render them suitable for mixing, either involved no invention, or skill, or ingenuity at all, and in that case there was no proper subject for a patent; or else, that it did involve some skill, ingenuity, or special knowledge, and in that case the process was not described; and the evidence which has been led has not, in my opinion, displaced that objection. I think the pursuer has proved, and so far I agree with his view of the evidence, that in the great majority of cases there is no difficulty in effecting the mixture, which required any further explanation by the patentee than that which he has given. But if that be so, then the mere process of mixing is not a subject for a patent. But then it is said, and there is evidence to that effect, that in the case of oils of certain specific gravity there is so great difficulty in mixing them that it cannot be known without experiment in what proportions they will effectually mix. If that is sufficient to create a serious difficulty then the process is not explained by the

No. 120.

May 24, 1888.
Hutchison, Main, & Co. v. Pattullo Brothers.

Lord Ordinary was right on that point, the prior use had been a secret not a public use, and in order to invalidate a patent the method of the invention must have been matter of public knowledge. It was plain from Harvey's evidence that Price & Company kept their process secret as long as they could, and Palmer's evidence shewed that it did not become public until 1880. Prior use meant prior publication, the theory of the patent law being that in return for the benefit which the public obtained from the publication of the invention the State gave the inventor protection under certain conditions.[1] (2) On the construction of the patent.—The patent was a patent for a product—or rather for three products—a thickened vegetable or animal oil, a better coloured mineral oil, and the combination of the two. One who invented a new result or application of a known principle was entitled to patent his invention, and must specify one method of producing the result, but he was not tied down to that method—his patent covered other methods not specified.[2] That being so, there was no disconformity between the provisional and the complete specification, and the defenders' method of thickening was covered by the pursuers' patent.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) On the question of prior use.—The Lord Ordinary had taken the sound view of the evidence; there had in fact been prior use,—assuming, that was to say, that the defenders' process was within the pursuers' patent. Further, there had been no such secrecy about the defenders' working of their invention as to deprive this prior use of its legal effect.[3] (2) On the construction of the patent.—The defenders' process of oxidising fat oils was admittedly not the same as the pursuers'; consequently in order to bring the former process within their patent they were compelled to construe their first head as a patent for a product and not for a process. But in the first place, if it was merely oxidised fat oil that they sought to patent, the patent was bad on the ground of want of novelty—for that fat oil would oxidise under the influence of air and heat was perfectly well known long before the pursuers obtained their patent. Then, secondly, the first head of their specification really embraced two totally different products—thickened or oxidised fat oil and clarified mineral oil; that shewed that what they really patented was a process by which these two products might be obtained. Their case also failed on the second branch of their claim, on the ground of disconformity between the provisional and the complete specification, for the former was limited to the combination of fat oils thickened in a particular way with mineral oils, while the latter claimed to cover the combination of fat oils thickened by any process with mineral oils.

---

patentee. If the specification is to be construed as claiming a product, that will not remove the objection, because in that case the patent would cover every mixture of mineral oil and oxidised fat oils, irrespective of the method of oxidation.

"For these reasons I am of opinion that the defenders ought to be assoilzied."

[1] Sykes v. Wilson, Feb. 2, 1866, 4 Macph. 349, 38 Scot. Jur. 181; Smith v. Davidson, March 11, 1857, 19 D. 691, 29 Scot. Jur. 237; Hancock v. Somervell, 1851, Newton's London Journal, vol. 39, p. 158,—see also Higgin's Digest of Patent Cases, p. 82; Neilson v. Harford, June 9, 1841, 1 Webster's Patent Cases, 331; Heath v. Smith, Jan. 23, 1854, 3 Ell. and Blackb. 266.

[2] Neilson v. Househill Coal Co., March 6, 1843, 2 Bell's Apps. 1, 15 Scot. Jur. 524.

[3] Tennent's case, 1802, 1 Webster's Patent Cases, 125; Stead v. Williams, 1843, 2 Webster's Patent Cases, 126; Carpenter v. Smith, 1842, 1 Webster's Patent Cases, 540.

No. 120.

May 24, 1888.
Hutchison, Main, & Co. v. Pattullo Brothers.

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—This case, which relates to the existence of a patent right, has been the subject of a very full investigation, and we have a very exhaustive opinion from the Lord Ordinary in regard to the questions at issue. We have now to decide those questions.

When the case first came before us we found that the Lord Ordinary had decided it on the construction of the patent itself, that is, on the provisional specification and the final specification—and the conclusion to which he had come was that the patent was not a good but a bad patent. It was our view however that the whole facts of the case should be disclosed, and accordingly we recalled the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, and remitted the cause to him to allow a proof.

The Lord Ordinary has now pronounced a judgment after hearing the proof, in which he adheres to the view that he formerly took upon the legal import of the patent, and he has also come to be of opinion that there has been a prior use of the alleged invention, or of a part of it, which was covered by the patent, and also that there had been no infringement of anything to which the pursuers had a patent right. He has accordingly assoilzied the defenders.

I have come to be of opinion, and that very clearly, that upon both these points the Lord Ordinary has arrived at the sound conclusion. I shall only add a sentence or two to the very full exposition of his views with which the Lord Ordinary has favoured us.

An inventor who desires to patent his invention has sometimes rather hard measure dealt to him. His invention may be very useful and very profitable to those who use it, and yet he may have so expressed himself in his specifications as not to be entitled to obtain the protection for which the patent was intended to provide, and that either from discrepancies between the provisional and the complete specification, or from flaws or omissions in the words in which he describes his claim. Here, however, while I feel that Mr Hutchison is a meritorious inventor, or a meritorious observer of the results which he has patented or endeavoured to patent, I rather think that his difficulties have arisen from the very nature of the operation itself, and of the subject-matter to which the patent applies.

There were two results which Mr Hutchison endeavoured to protect by patent, both of which were decidedly meritorious. In dealing with fat, i.e., animal, or vegetable oils, the difficulty which oil merchants seem to have found was that these oils got coagulated and were therefore unfit for use as lubricants—or rather that in the use of them as lubricants this coagulation or viscosity was generated, so that the machinery to which they were applied became clogged. From observation and experiment Mr Hutchison found that if these fat oils were exposed to the influence of the air and of heat in open vessels for a certain time, and at a certain temperature, the result was to thicken them and to remove any tendency to further thickening. In the second place he found—and this was a remarkable part of the invention—that after the fat vegetable or animal oils had been treated in this manner, they were capable of combination with mineral oils. The fat oils had been found to be incapable of such a combination in their ordinary condition, but after being treated according to Mr Hutchison's method they became suitable for that purpose, and as mineral oil had come to be a very large article of commerce, and was comparatively inexpensive, but by itself was unsuitable as a lubricant from its thinness, it was of course desirable that traders should be able to thicken it by mixture with fat oil.

It was to protect these two results that this patent was obtained, and the question in the first place is, is this patent a good one? Is it a good patent according to the rules by which such rights are ordinarily judged? The object of a patent is to give a monopoly or protection to the inventor. That means that it gives him a right to prohibit all other persons from doing what the inventor has protected by his patent. A patent is a monopoly and a prohibition.

The Lord Ordinary has decided that this patent is bad, and he has given the reasons which have led him to that conclusion at considerable length. I shall endeavour to summarise the more important of these reasons.

I rather think that on a construction of the documents themselves there is a variance, and a fatal variance, between the provisional specification and the amended specification. The provisional specification evidently contemplated the obtaining of a patent for a process—the mechanical means of attaining a particular end—and the particular end was the attainment of the twofold results I have already mentioned. Accordingly, Mr Hutchison in his provisional specification says that his invention consists in the exposing of the oils to the atmosphere. He says,—"This invention has for its object the treating of oils and fats in an improved manner and so as to render them more suitable for various applications, and it consists in subjecting the oil whether mineral, vegetable, or animal, or the fat to a temperature about equal to that of boiling water for eight or ten days, the oil or fat being exposed to air in layers of about half an inch in depth." That is the first paragraph of the provisional specification, and in the last paragraph he concludes by saying,—"The thickening of the vegetable or animal oils or fats which is believed to be due to oxidation makes them better adapted for saponification and other uses besides that of forming lubricants." But when he comes to enlarge his specification, and to amend it after the patent had been obtained, it is quite plain that his view in regard to that had changed. The claim which he makes in the amended specification is not for a process. The process of the shallow layers and the application of heat is not treated as an essential part of the invention. On the contrary he says,—"In practically carrying out my said invention in dealing with vegetable or animal oils or fats I prefer to expose them in shallow pans or dishes to the combined action of atmospheric air and heat, with or without the addition of water, for a lengthened time. The addition of water accelerates the process, but the colour of the oxidised oil or fat is generally paler if treated without water." That is a way in which the oxidation, which is the essence of the operation and of the alteration of the fat oil, may be carried out, but he only says that he prefers to carry it out in that particular manner, and when he comes to speak of the mixing of the fat oils with the mineral oils he says,—"The mixing of a thickened or oxidised vegetable or animal oil or fat with mineral oil to form a compound of consistency and quality suitable for a lubricant is a part of my invention, irrespective of the precise means adopted for thickening or oxidising the oil." I am of opinion that this variance exposes the patent to very great hazard. It is not a patent for the application of a principle, because the application of heat or atmospheric air is not a principle, at all events it is not a principle specified here. It is not said to be a necessary part of the invention, and that for the plainest possible reason, that the oxidation might be brought about in a great variety of ways besides that particular mechanism suggested but not patented on the part of this patentee.

No. 120.

May 24, 1888.
Hutchison, Main, & Co. v. Pattullo Brothers.

Without going any further I should have come to that conclusion. I think this patent as it stands is not a patent of a process. It is not a patent of a principle. It is a pointing out of an advantageous method of dealing with ordinary mechanical agents not invented by the patentee. This pointing out is not exclusive; it might embrace a great variety of modes not comprehended in this patentee's description.

I think the views I have now expressed lie at the very foundation of the claim which is here made. The only novelty is in the second branch of the claim, where the mixing of the fat and the mineral oils is claimed, but if that is intended to be a claim for a process the pursuer neither shews what the difficulty is in mixing mineral oils with fat oils, nor does he shew any mode in which he claims that that can be done.

I think that the views of the Lord Ordinary, which he has elaborated with great care, will be found truly to turn on the pivot I have mentioned.

Then as to the prior use, the novelty and the infringement, I concur with the Lord Ordinary. I think it very doubtful whether any case of infringement is relevantly libelled here—much less proved. The Lord Ordinary heard the evidence and saw the witnesses, and has expressed himself satisfied with that branch of the defenders' case, and I have heard nothing from the bar to induce me to reach another result.

On the whole matter, I think we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord Young.—I am of the same opinion. I hesitate to add anything to what your Lordship has said, concurring with the Lord Ordinary, but I think it right to point out this, that the pursuer does not seek protection for his patent. His patent has now expired—has expired for more than a year. It was on the eve of expiry when the action was brought, for it expired in October 1887 and the action was raised in December 1886. The action therefore is not for an interdict, but concludes for damages for alleged infringement.

I desire also to say that I share your Lordship's doubt as to whether the statement of the alleged infringement here is relevant so as to found an action of damages. The only averment on that head is contained in condescendence 3, and I think it is of very doubtful relevancy indeed.

Two questions were argued to us. One of these regarded a matter of fact: Whether the process described or referred to in the specification, and of which the invention was said to consist, was new at the date of the patent—that is, whether this gentleman was the first and true inventor, or whether there had been prior use. The Lord Ordinary in the note to his second judgment, which proceeded on the evidence, says,—"The question therefore is, whether this process was in fact employed by Messrs Price & Company before 1873, for the purpose of oxidising animal and vegetable oils, so as to produce a lubricant either to be used alone, or to be mixed with mineral oils. The evidence to my mind leaves no room for doubt that it was so used, and with a view to the advantage described in the pursuer's specification." It was conceded by the learned counsel for the pursuer—and indeed could not be denied—that there is evidence to that effect abundant and conclusive, if the witnesses who gave that evidence are to be believed; and if the fact be so upon the evidence then the patent is bad. Upon that matter the Lord Ordinary expresses himself thus :— "It is said however that the evidence as to Messrs Price & Company's process is not trustworthy. This is a question of credibility, as to which it is enough to say that I see no reason to doubt the veracity of the witnesses, and that I accept their testimony as true." Reasons were urged and arguments were stated to us why we should disbelieve those witnesses who were examined in the presence of the Lord Ordinary, and whom he believed. Of course we attended to the reasons urged to that end and to the argument stated to us. The result in my mind is the same as in your Lordship's—that on this question of credibility I agree with the Lord Ordinary,

No. 120.
May 24, 1888.
Hutchison, Main, & Co. v. Pattullo Brothers.

That concludes the case upon the facts. Upon the question of law I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary and your Lordship that the patent is bad in law, and that for the reasons so fully explained by the Lord Ordinary.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am satisfied that the pursuer made independently an important discovery when he found that animal and vegetable oils, oxidised or thickened by the action of air and heat, readily combined with mineral oil so as to make a good lubricant. So far there may be material for a patent. But the defenders maintain that the patent is bad on various grounds.

In the argument which we heard the pursuer maintained that his patent was a patent for a product, or rather for three several products. As this was the construction which the pursuer adopted, I take it to be the most favourable that could be advanced on his behalf. Viewing the patent in this light, I find that the products are—1st, vegetable or animal oil thickened or oxidised by the action of air and heat; 2d, mineral oil clarified by the same process; and 3d, the compound formed by the mixture of the thickened or oxidised oil with mineral oil. It follows that as each of these products is claimed as falling within the patent, each of them must be a novelty or invention. If not, the patent is necessarily bad.

I shall now consider the first product.

I should have great difficulty in believing that at the date of the patent it was not known that vegetable and animal oils could be oxidised or thickened by the action of air and heat. It seems to be the obvious and necessary result of the application of these agents. But this matter is not left in doubt. For Mr Falconer King says,—" It was known long before 1873 that vegetable and animal oils would thicken by exposure to air. It was also known that heat would accelerate the process." It was not suggested by the pursuer that this statement was not true, and for my part I cannot see any reason to doubt its truth. If this be so, the product which the pursuer claims as his invention is not new; and if it be old, the patent is invalid. There is neither novelty nor invention.

But the pursuer, as I understood, maintained that the product was claimed with a qualification, inasmuch as the words of the first claim run thus :—" The subjecting of oils and fats in shallow layers to the joint action of air and heat substantially as and for the purposes hereinbefore described." If the patent be for a product, as the pursuer contends, and if the words which I have quoted qualify or limit the claim, the meaning must be that the pursuer claims the product when made in a particular way and for a particular use. But he very expressly disclaimed all novelty in the process, and apart from this disclaimer I can see neither novelty nor merit in it. If, therefore, the process were part of the invention which is claimed by the pursuer there would be much to say against the validity of the patent. But if the process be put aside, there only remains the specified purposes or uses.

No. 120.

May 24, 1888.
Hutchison, Main, & Co. v. Pattullo Brothers.

It would seem to be the law that there cannot be a patent privilege for a new use of an old invention, even though there be merit in the discovery of the new use—Kay v. Marshall, H. L., 6 Clark & Finelly, 425. But putting that question aside, let me consider what the uses are which are specified by the pursuer. I have said that he discovered that the thickened oil would combine with mineral oil so as to make a good lubricant. That is not the only use in connection with which the thickened oil is claimed as a novelty. The claiming clause uses the plural, "the purposes hereinbefore described." What are these purposes? One undoubtedly is to combine the thickened oil with mineral oil. The other, so far as I see, can be nothing else than to use it by itself as a lubricant. The specification sets out:—"The said invention has for its object the heating of oils and fats in an improved manner, and so as to render them more suitable for making lubricants, and it consists mainly in subjecting the oil, whether mineral, vegetable, or animal, or the fat, to heat, while exposed to the air in shallow layers." Further, it says,—"One important object of my invention is to oxidise or thicken vegetable or animal oils or fats so as to render them better adapted for mixing with mineral oils to form lubricants of various qualities." Reading these sentences together, it is plain enough that the preparation of the animal and vegetable oils so as to make them better adapted for mixing with mineral oils is not the sole invention which the pursuer claims. The words "one important object," as well as the plurality in the claiming clause, are conclusive on that point. If so the vegetable and animal oils are treated in the manner described in the specification with a view to a use apart from the admixture of mineral oils, or, in the words of the specification, "for making lubricants." I take that to mean that the thickened oil is itself to be used as a lubricant. There is no other use suggested, and if the use was to be a part of the claim the pursuer was bound to specify it. It is certain, as I have already said, that the thickened oil is claimed as being adapted to more than one use.

The result, in my opinion, is that the product claimed by the pursuer as his invention is a known product, manufactured by a known process, and intended for a known use. For I do not think that it can be said that there can be any novelty or invention in using thickened oil as a lubricant.

For these reasons I think that the patent is bad, and I have stated them in order that I might deal with the argument which was submitted to us, but I have further to say that I concur in the view expressed by the Lord Ordinary in his note.

LORD CRAIGHILL was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—GREGOR MACGREGOR, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 121.

May 25, 1888.
Walker, Hunter, & Co. v. Hecla Foundry Co.

WALKER, HUNTER, & COMPANY, Complainers (Respondents).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Ure.

HECLA FOUNDRY COMPANY, Respondents (Reclaimers).—Jameson—Younger.

Copyright of designs—Infringement—Registration for "shape or configuration"—Patents, Designs, and Trades-Marks Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 57),

No. 121.

May 25, 1888.

Walker, Hunter, & Co. v. Hecla Foundry Co.

sec. 58.—A design was registered for shape or configuration under the 60th section of the Patents, Designs, and Trades-Marks Act, 1883, the application being for "a range door, with moulding on top, moulding forming front of range, shape to be registered." The drawing shewed a moulding on the top of the door fitting into the moulding on the front of the range, and flush with it. The merit of the design lay in attaching the moulding to the door instead of to the fire-cover, the arrangement formerly in use in convertible kitchen ranges. Held that another design, which differed from the above in this, that the moulding on the door overlapped the moulding on the front of the range, was, except in certain immaterial respects, an "obvious imitation" of or identical with the registered design, and an infringement of it.

1st Division.
Lord M'Laren.
M.

(Vide ante, Walker, Hunter, & Co. v. The Falkirk Iron Co., July 20, 1887, 14 R. 1072.)

Messrs Walker, Hunter, & Company, of the Port-Downie Iron-works, Falkirk, brought a suspension and interdict against the Hecla Foundry Company, and the individual partners thereof, in which they prayed the Court to interdict the respondents "from infringing the copyright of a registered design for kitchen range fire-doors, No. 16,596, the property of the complainers, conform to certificate of registration, dated 10th November 1884, granted in pursuance of the Patents, Designs, and Trades-Marks Act, 46 and 47 Vict. c. 57, and, in particular, from making, vending, or using any fire-doors for kitchen ranges having a moulding, cast or fixed, thereon, in manner shewn in the design, a copy of which is annexed to the said certificate of registration, or in manner substantially the same, and from infringing the copyright of said registered design in any other manner of way."

The design in question had been registered by the complainers under the Patents, Designs, and Trades-Marks Act, 1883, and the 60th section thereof, for "shape or configuration," the application being for "a range door, with moulding on top, moulding forming front of range, shape to be registered"; and it had been held by the Court to be a proper subject of registration in the case at the instance of the complainers against the Falkirk Iron Co., July 20, 1887, 14 R. 1072.

The respondents, inter alia, stated that the fire-door of their range which it was sought to interdict was entirely different in shape from that of the complainers.

The complainers pleaded;—(1) The respondents having infringed the complainers' copyright as above condescended on, and having refused to discontinue said infringement, the complainers are entitled to have interdict as craved.

The respondents, besides stating various pleas against the validity of the exclusive privilege claimed, pleaded;—(6) The respondents not having infringed any rights of the complainers, the note should be refused.

The result of the proof is fully set forth *infra, and in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren).

---

* Mr J. T. King, a patent agent and consulting engineer, who was examined for the respondents, deponed in regard to the distinctions between Nos. 14 (the complainers' design) and 15 (the respondents' design), as follows:—"I have examined Nos. 14 and 15 with a view to arriving at an opinion whether No. 15 is an infringement of the design shewn in No. 14. My opinion is that No. 15 is not the same design as No. 14, and does not resemble it. In the first place, the shape of the moulding on the top is not the same; the moulding in No. 15 projects, whilst in No. 14 it is flush or cut off. The two sides and bottom of No. 15 are not the same as No. 14; No. 15 has an ogee moulding on the sides and bottom, while No. 14 is simply beaded or rounded. Then the hinges are not of the same outline, nor

His Lordship, on 16th November 1887, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds it proved that the respondents have infringed the suspenders' exclusive privilege, by making for sale fire doors of the pattern produced: Therefore suspends the proceedings complained, interdicts, prohibits, and discharges, in terms of the prayer of the note of suspension and interdict, and decerns," &c.*

---

rivetted on with the same number of rivets; in No. 14 the straps are straight, with lancet points, whilst in No. 15 they are cut away narrow, and terminate in much longer lozenge points, and they are fastened by three rivets in place of two; and, what is not represented in No. 14, there are two screws in No. 15 fastening the moulding on the top. That leads to another distinction, that in No. 15 the moulding is cast separate and fastened to the door, whilst in No. 14 the door-plate and moulding are cast in one. And there is still a further difference, that in No. 15 the moulding stands out from the face of the door, and, therefore, is not in line with the moulding in front of the range. (Q.) Do you consider that a material difference in design? (A.) As far as I am capable of forming a judgment, the design is entirely different. There was about as much thought required to devise or design the one as the other."

* "OPINION.—This is the second action at the instance of Walker, Hunter, & Company, for contravention of the exclusive privilege which they claim under the Registration of Designs Act.

"The design was for a door for a convertible range, and it has been shortly described as a rectangular door with a moulding on the top of it. It appears that in these convertible kitchen ranges the fire is opened by lifting or sliding back the fire-cover, and opening the fire-door in front of the bars, and then there is, I think, a bar that folds over; but when the fire-place is closed, then according to the usual construction of these ranges, a moulding was cast on the fire-cover or fall-bar which might or might not be continuous with the moulding on the other part of the grate, but generally was of the same pattern or design. The practice has been to put the moulding upon the fire-cover or fall-bar, but, for reasons which I need not discuss, this was found inconvenient, and it occurred to the complainers as an improvement that the moulding might be cast upon the door, with the result that, when the door was closed, the appearance of the range was exactly the same.

"In a former action the validity of the exclusive privilege claimed was contested. It was contested upon three different grounds. First, it was said, having regard to the evidence in support of the exclusive privilege that it was rather the subject of a patent than of a certificate under the Designs Acts, if it was of any value at all. Then I think it was also said to be of no value, or that the improvement was so inconsiderable and so obvious as not to be entitled to protection. And then, further, the validity of the claim was disputed on the usual ground of anticipation, and there were, I think, two cases of anticipation brought forward, neither of which however was established. In the opinion of the Court on a reclaiming note from my judgment, all those objections to the exclusive privilege were rejected, and interdict was granted against the attempted infringement. If this had been a patent case, the questions to which I have referred could not have been tried again; because I should unquestionably have granted a certificate in terms of the Act that the validity of the patent had been in question in the former case. But as the special provisions to which I am referring have not been made part of the copyright law, the respondents in this case were entitled to raise these questions over again. It had been intended, I understand, to try the question of anticipation; but for reasons which I stated in the course of the discussion, I held that no such question could be tried under this record.

"With regard to the other objections, to wit, that this design is unworthy of legal protection at all, or that if entitled to protection, it should be given by means of letters-patent, I need do no more than refer to the judgment of the Inner-House in the former action—a judgment which unreservedly disposes of

No. 121.

May 25, 1888.
Walker, Hunter, & Co. v. Hecla Foundry Co.

The respondents reclaimed, and argued;—The design fell to be looked at as a whole, and there was no infringement unless it was exactly copied.*

---

these objections, and which I conceive to be authoritative on this question, superseding the necessity of any further consideration of these points by myself.

"There remains therefore only the question of infringement, whether the design of the door, which is undoubtedly made by the Hecla Company, is an infringement of the complainers' exclusive privilege? Now, the respondents' door is a rectangular door surmounted by a moulding; and except that the moulding has a different section from the moulding of the complainers, if those two doors were looked at in face as represented in the drawing (or in the manner of an elevation) then I say that, except in the particular which I have just noticed, I think there is really nothing to distinguish the two designs. But when you come to look at the respondents' door in section, a difference becomes apparent, because the door is so attached to its hinges that instead of fitting into the space between the adjoining plates of the range, it lies over them, and the moulding, instead of fitting into the space left between the mouldings at the two sides, overlaps them, having its corners rounded off so as to make a transition more agreeable to the eye than if they had been cut off square. The difference that I refer to does not come out by comparing the respondents' drawing with the design for which the certificate was granted. It only comes out when the door is seen in section, and when the manner of its superposition upon the grate is considered.

"Now, upon the question of whether there is here an infringement, nothing was said to the contrary of the complainers' proposition, that mere differences in the outline of the moulding would not take the respondents' design out of the protected copyright. That seems to me perfectly clear, because there is nothing original in the moulding, and in the claim of registration it is made evident that the registration was claimed not for the particular moulding, but for the material form given by placing a moulding—any suitable moulding—upon a fire-door in the described position. Well, then, I have to consider if there was no exclusive privilege claimed for the particular pattern of moulding, whether the exclusive privilege is limited to the case of a moulding which exactly fits into the adjoining mouldings, so as to present a continuous flowing surface; or whether it is not a privilege granted for putting such a moulding upon a fire-door in such a manner as to exclude air and to accomplish the object which had previously been accomplished by putting the moulding upon the fire-cover or fall-bar. It occurred to me, as one way of testing the question, to consider whether it would be possible for the respondents to obtain any right by registration of their design consistently with the right already given to the complainers. There is evidence to the effect that the respondents' pattern had been independently devised, and that they had not wilfully copied the complainers' design. But of course that will not avail them if the copyright obtained by the complainers is good. I think the true way of looking at the question is, to assume or suppose, for the sake of the argument, that the respondents had been aware of the registered design, and with that knowledge had set about to make a design of their own, which should not copy, or colourably imitate, the complainers'. Now, if they had set about making a design in that view, and had produced the complainers' design, with this difference, that the moulding of the door overlapped the adjacent mouldings at the side instead of fitting between them, the question is, whether that design involves the exercise of any inventive skill at all, and whether it is capable of being distinguished from the complainers' design as a design?

I think that in this case the difficulty, if there is any, is in finding out the

---

* The Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, sec. 58, provided that "During the existence of copyright in any design (a) it shall not be lawful for any person, without the licence or written consent of the registered proprietor, to apply such design or any fraudulent or obvious imitation thereof, in the class or classes of goods in which such design is registered, for purposes of sale," &c.

The case of Houldsworth v. M'Crea[1] was an authority to that effect, although that case arose under the previous Act of 21 and 22 Vict. cap. 70. In the reclaimers' door the moulding stood out from the face, and was not in line with the moulding in front of the range. In the other it was flush with it. To constitute an infringement the design must be the same, or an obvious or fraudulent imitation of the original.[2] The outline here was different, and that was sufficient to take the case out of the category of imitation.

The respondents' counsel were not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question which we have now to decide is entirely one of infringement of patent. In the former case, at the instance of the present complainers against the Falkirk Iron Company (14 R. 1072), we held that the design for the door of a kitchen-range was a "new or original design," and was in consequence a proper subject for registration under the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883. Assuming that to be so, the only question remaining is whether the respondents' design is an obvious imitation of the design which has been registered by the complainers. I think it is. I think the difference between the two is absolutely immaterial, and the ground of judgment I am disposed to adopt is that which has been well stated by the Lord Ordinary in his opinion, as follows:—"Upon the question of whether there is here an infringement, nothing was said to the contrary of the complainers' proposition, that mere differences in the outline of the moulding would not take the respondents' design out of the protected copyright. That seems to me perfectly clear, because there is nothing original in the moulding, and in the claim of registration it is made evident that the registration was claimed not for the particular moulding, but for the material form given by placing a moulding—any suitable moulding—upon a fire-door in the described position." I think that that was distinctly the subject of the complainers' claim, and that the improvements registered by them consisted just in what is there described by his Lordship. It seems to me that that description equally embraces the one door and the other. The respondents' design is either an obvious imitation of the other, or, as the Lord Ordinary says in the conclusion of his opinion, it is identical with it, except in certain respects, which are absolutely immaterial.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion, and I am quite satisfied with the question for consideration; because, when that is once stated, I think it carries its own answer. If it be the question whether, in the assumed knowledge of the complainers' pattern, and wishing not to imitate it, the respondents have successfully achieved their object in making the door which is the subject of complaint, I think no one can doubt that the attempt is a failure—that to present what is a mere copy of the complainers' door, but to place it so that the moulding overlaps instead of fitting in between the adjacent parts, is not an independent design, but a very plain and obvious imitation of the complainers' design. I do not call it a colourable imitation, because I rather think it is the identical thing. It is either directly and literally the complainers' design, or it is in my judgment a very obvious imitation of it, and that being my view of the facts, I shall give decree in the terms sought, interdicting the respondents from making, vending, or using fire-doors of the description complained of, with expenses."

---

[1] Holdsworth v. M'Crea, June 25, 1867, 2 L. R. Eng. and Ir. Apps. 380 (Lord Chancellor Chelmsford, p. 384, and Lord Westbury, p. 387).

[2] Barran v. Lomas, May 7, 1880, 28 Weekly Reporter, 973.

No. 121.

May 25, 1888.
Walker, Hunter, & Co.
v. Hecla
Foundry Co.

view of the case which has been taken by the Lord Ordinary. I think the two designs are the same. There is no doubt a difference when they are looked at in section, but this difference is slight, and indeed trifling, and beyond it I see none. Such is my view upon the question of fact, and as that is the only matter which has been submitted to review I need say no more.

There is one portion of the Lord Ordinary's opinion which seems to give countenance to a view with which I do not entirely concur. His Lordship appears to indicate that wilful imitation is necessary in order to bring a person in the position of the respondents within the provisions of the 58th section of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883. I do not think that this is required. If the design complained of is the same, or is substantially the same, as the design registered, it appears to me that the owner of the copyright is entitled to be protected against the infringement of his right. There may be a right on the part of one claiming to be the true proprietor of the design to set aside the registration, but this cannot be done in defence to an action of interdict for infringement.

Lord Adam concurred.

Lord Mure was absent.

The Court adhered.

Auld & Macdonald, W.S.—J. & J. Ross, W.S.—Agents.

No. 122.

May 26, 1888.
Molleson v.
Hope.

James A. Molleson (Hope's Judicial Factor), Petitioner (Respondent).—
Sol.-Gen. Robertson—Don Wauchope.
James Hope and Cecil Arthur Hope, Respondents (Reclaimers).— Murray.

Trust—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 97), secs. 3 and 4, and Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict. c. 63), sec. 2—Authority to sell trust-subjects—"Expedient for the execution of the trust."—A trust-deed conferred upon the trustees a power of sale, either by public roup or by private bargain. A judicial factor, who had been appointed on the estate, applied, under the Trusts Acts, 1867 and 1884, for authority to sell privately for £2100 certain feuing ground belonging to the estate, which at that time yielded £18 a-year. The liferenter approved of the proposed sale, but the fiar objected, and urged delay until the demand for building ground improved. After a report from men of skill that the offer should be accepted, the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) granted the prayer of the petition. On a reclaiming note the Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and refused the petition, on the ground that the proposed sale might be prejudicial to the interests of the fiar.

1st Division.
B.

Miss Frances Jane Hope died in 1880, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, in which she directed her trustees to hold the residue of her estate for behoof of Miss Anne Hope Johnstone and Mrs Charlotte Hope or Mackinnon, and the survivor of them in liferent, and thereafter to pay the residue to the youngest surviving child of her brother, Mr James Hope, W.S., alive at the death of the longest liver of the two liferenters. Under the deed the truster gave her trustees full power and authority to sell and dispose of her heritage, either by public roup or private bargain.

Among the subjects belonging to the trust-estate were four separate pieces of ground, the largest being somewhat over two acres, all in close proximity to a villa situated near Edinburgh, called Wardie Lodge, which belonged to the trustees of the late Professor Hope, and of which Miss Frances Jane Hope had had a liferent.

No. 122.

May 26, 1888.
Molleson v.
Hope.

Professor Hope's trustees having resolved to sell Wardie Lodge, Mr Molleson, C.A., who had been appointed judicial factor on Miss Frances Hope's trust-estate, presented a petition, under the Trusts (Scotland) Acts, 1867 and 1884,* for authority to sell the four pieces of ground, either by public or private sale, stating that he was satisfied "that it is expedient and for the benefit of the trust-estate under his charge that the said heritable subjects should be sold."

No answers were lodged by Mr James Hope nor by the sole surviving liferentrix, upon both of whom the petition was served, but upon a remit having been made by the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) to Mr H. B. Dewar, S.S.C., to inquire into the circumstances set forth in the petition, and to report, Mr Hope put himself in communication with the reporter.

Mr Dewar reported that lot IV. of the subjects in question was necessary to the beneficial enjoyment of Wardie Lodge, and recommended that it should be exposed to public sale along with the house at £2700, being £2300 for the house, and £400 for the ground. As to lots I., II., and III., he reported that they were not necessary to the amenity of Wardie Lodge, and that the view of the men of skill whom he consulted was that they would sell better apart from it and No. IV. than along with them. It further appeared that a neighbouring proprietor, Mrs Boswell, had offered either to bid at a public sale £1800 for the three lots, or to give £2100 for the three lots together by private sale. The reporter concluded that he was of opinion that the judicial factor "should be authorised to accept of Mrs Boswell's offer of £2100 by private bargain." †

---

* The Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (sec. 3), provided that "it shall be competent to the Court of Session, on the petition of the trustees under any trust-deed, to grant authority to the trustees to do any of the following acts, on being satisfied that the same is expedient for the execution of the trust, and not inconsistent with the intention thereof, ... (1) to sell the trust-estate, or any part of it."

Section 4 provided that "all powers of sale conferred on trustees by the trust-deed, or by virtue of this Act, may be exercised either by public roup or private bargain, unless otherwise directed in the trust-deed or in the authority given by the Court."

The Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884, sec. 2, provided that "in the construction of the Acts recited therein, including the foresaid Act 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 97, 'trustee' shall include tutor, curator, and judicial factor."

† The report bore, inter alia,—"At the date of the remit in this case, when these 4½ acres (lots I., II., and III.) were lying unoccupied and almost waste, the reporter felt much difficulty as to the practical course that he should recommend to your Lordship. The men of skill considered that they should be let at about £4 an acre to a neighbouring dairyman. They thought that if they were exposed to public sale no offer would be got for them, as there is no demand at present, nor any early prospect of a demand, for building ground in that neighbourhood. Moreover, Mr James Hope, on behalf of the fiars, with whom the reporter has had meetings on the subject, strongly objected to any endeavour to force a sale of these 4½ acres of feuing-ground. Accordingly, the position was, that the interest of the liferentrix and the interest of the fiars seemed to be directly opposed to each other. On the one hand, for the liferentrix to get only £18 a-year for these three pieces of ground was like sacrificing her interests. On the other hand, as there is undoubted prospective value in the ground in question, as building ground, it seemed hard to sell the ground for what it would bring, at a time when there seemed absolutely no demand for such ground.

"Happily, however, as the reporter ventures to think—a neighbouring proprietor, Mrs Boswell . . . . . has made an offer to purchase the

No. 122.

May 26, 1888.
Molleson v. Hope.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 14th March 1888, pronounced an interlocutor in terms of the report, authorising the exposure of lot IV. to public sale, and the sale by private bargain of lots I., II., and III.

Subsequently Mr James Hope and his son tendered answers to the petition, which the Lord Ordinary allowed to be received and seen. In these they stated their willingness to concur in the public sale of lot IV., on condition that the sale of the other lots should not be insisted in. "As regards the other portions there is no immediate necessity for sale. There is at present no demand for building ground, and to sell these portions now is simply to sacrifice the interests of the fiars in order to give a small increase of income to the liferentrix, a lady of seventy-one years of age. The respondents particularly object to the prayer of the petition, as to these portions, being granted de plano. They are of opinion—First, That any sale ought to be deferred till after the sale of Wardie Lodge. Second, That, ... no sale should be allowed till an attempt has been made, after due advertisement, &c., to test the market at a considerably higher upset; and third, That, in any view, the sale ought to be by public roup and not by private bargain."

They reclaimed against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and argued;—The petitioner's proposal was unreasonable. To sanction it would be to construe the words "expedient for the execution of the trust" as meaning "expedient for the interests of the liferenter." Before the passing of the Trusts Act, 1867, the Court required that a case of necessity should be made out.[1] It was true that now only a case of expediency was needed, but that meant that there must be some purpose which could not be attained without a sale, which was not the case here.[2] As regarded the opinion of the valuators, they valued as for an immediate sale. They admitted that the present was a bad time to sell.

Argued for the petitioner;—If this had not been a lapsed trust, and there had been trustees in office, they would not have needed to come to the Court. The powers of judicial factors were largely enhanced by the Acts of 1867 and 1884, and were now very nearly assimilated to those of trustees. The respondents' view was entirely unsupported, the view of the men of skill being all the other way, and the course suggested by the reporter, and approved by the Lord Ordinary, was the best for both liferentrix and fiar.

---

whole of lots I., II., and III. Her offer is alternative—either to undertake to bid at a public sale £1800 for the three lots, or separately £400 for lot I., and £700 for each of lots II. and III.; or to give £2000 for the three lots together by private sale. If £2000 were got, this invested at four per cent would give the liferentrix £80 a-year in place of £18, and would give to the fiars within £100 of the joint valuation obtained in August last. The reporter communicated personally with the men of skill as to this offer. He asked them whether, if they themselves were the owners of the ground, they would accept of the £2000. Without any hesitation, each of them said that he certainly would. The reporter pointed out that £2000 was £100 less than their valuation; but they said that they were satisfied that no one else than Mrs Boswell would bid for them. Mrs Boswell has since increased her offer, by private sale, to £2100, being the full amount of the joint value of August. Mr James Hope, however, does not see his way to the fiars giving any consent to that sum being accepted. The reporter, however, is humbly, but clearly, of opinion that the offer is a fair and favourable one, even in the interests of the fiars, and that the interests of the liferentrix make it eminently desirable that the offer should be accepted. . . ."

[1] Auld, Feb. 5, 1856, 18 D. 487, 28 Scot. Jur. 182.

[2] Weir's Trustees, June 13, 1877, 4 R. 876; Downie, June 10, 1879, 6 R. 1013; Morrison v. Wedderspoon, Dec. 1, 1855, 18 D. 132.

No. 122. At advising,—

May 26, 1888. Molleson v. Hope.

Lord President.—This application is presented at the instance of the judicial factor on the trust-estate of the late Miss Frances Jane Hope. It relates to the sale of four separate lots of ground belonging to the trust-estate which are adjacent to Wardie Lodge, a house belonging to the trustees of the late Professor Hope, and of which the late Miss Hope had a liferent. They are situated in a locality well adapted for building purposes, but the ground has hitherto been unbuilt upon, and its present annual value is very small, amounting to about £18 a-year.

Miss Hope's settlement is of this nature. She left her estate to be liferented by two ladies, Miss Hope Johnstone and Mrs Mackinnon, and the survivor of them. The latter of these ladies is dead, but the former still survives. The fee of the estate after the death of Miss Hope Johnstone is to go to the youngest surviving child of the brother of the testatrix, as at the time of the death of the survivor. The presumptive fiar is Mr Cecil Arthur Hope, Mr James Hope's youngest child, but his succession depends on his surviving Miss Hope Johnstone. The sums offered for the different portions of land are (1) £400 for lot IV., which it is proposed to sell by public roup, along with Wardie Lodge, and as regards that lot there is no dispute. It is the view of all concerned that that piece of ground should be sold along with Wardie Lodge. But it is proposed to sell the three remaining lots by private bargain, and an offer of £2100 for the three lots has been received from a neighbouring proprietor. The result of the acceptance of that offer would be very favourable to the liferentrix, because it would raise her income from £18 to £80 per annum, and accordingly it is to the interest of the liferentrix that we should grant the power which is asked. But the interest of the prospective fiar, whoever he may be, requires to be attended to, and no doubt this is a very bad time for selling property of this description. Besides, it is not improbable that the money market may improve before the death of the liferentrix, and therefore the interest of the prospective fiar would be sacrificed by a sale at the present time, which would be all for the benefit of the liferent interest. Hence the difficulty and the puzzle which we have to solve.

The Trusts Act, 1867, authorises the Court to grant the authority which is asked, "on being satisfied that the same is expedient for the execution of the trust, and not inconsistent with the execution thereof," that is, that instead of its being required that a case of necessity should be made out, it is enough that the applicant shall set forth a case of expediency. In the present case, trustees were appointed by Miss Hope with a power of sale, but in consequence of the failure of the trustees and the appointment of a judicial factor, it is necessary to see whether a power of sale ought to be granted to him.

That being so, it appears to me that the petitioner has not made out his case. It is no doubt expedient in one sense that the subjects should be sold, because the sale would increase the annual income and benefit the liferentrix. But, on the other hand, the interests of the fiar would be sacrificed by a sale. Can we say in these circumstances that it would be "expedient for the execution of the trust" that we should authorise the sale? It will not facilitate the administration of the trust in any way to grant the power. I am quite impressed with the value of the opinion of the men of skill who were consulted, and with the sufficiency of the price offered, and if one were dealing with an estate which belonged in fee-simple to an existing individual, it would probably be a very doubtful thing to reject such an offer. But in that case the owner would get an immediate benefit. That is not the case here. He gets no immediate benefit, in short he gets no benefit at all, and may be subjected to a future and not improbable loss; so that as the interests of the prospective fiar may in this way be sacrificed, I am for refusing the prayer of the petition.

Lord Adam.—With reference to the three lots of ground which are not contiguous to Wardie Villa, it does not seem to me to be necessary that they should be sold. Neither do I think it is "expedient for the execution of the trust," in the sense that it would facilitate its execution, that they should be sold. In fact I think the judicial factor will just as easily carry out the purposes of the trust in the case of their not being sold as in the case of their being sold.

The reporter states the case as follows,—"At the date of the remit in this case, when these 4½ acres (lots I., II., and III.) were lying unoccupied, and almost waste, the reporter felt much difficulty as to the practical course that he should recommend to your Lordship. The men of skill considered that they should be let at about £4 an acre to a neighbouring dairyman. They thought that if they were exposed to public sale no offer would be got for them, as there is no demand at present, nor any early prospect of a demand, for building ground in that neighbourhood." It is thus clear that an unlimited fiar would not think of selling the subjects in the present state of the property market. Indeed no one would sell them unless he absolutely required to do so. But a private offer to purchase lots I., II., and III., has been made by Mrs Boswell, who resides in a neighbouring house. No doubt that offer is made with reference to the present unsaleable nature of the subjects. Probably, however, if there was a desire to sell on the part of all those interested, it would be wise to accept that offer. But that is not the position in the present case. There is a competition of interests between the fiar and the liferentrix, the result of a sale at the present time being that the liferentrix would be immediately benefited by a rise of income from £18 to £80 a-year. It appears to me, however, the substantial and permanent interest is with the fiar, that of the liferentrix is subsidiary, and so far as I can see a sale would lead to the detriment of the fiar's interest. I accordingly think that the petitioner has not made out a case to warrant our granting authority to sell.

Lord Kinnear concurred.

Lord Mure and Lord Shand were absent.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall said interlocutor in so far as it authorises the sale by private bargain of the lots of ground consisting of those second and third described in the prayer of the petition; quoad ultra adhere to the said interlocutor: Find no expenses due," &c.

Tods, Murray, & Jamieson, W.S.—James Hope, W.S.—Agents.

No. 123.

May 26, 1888.
Clarke v. M'Nab.

DAVID WILKIE CLARKE, Complainer (Respondent).—C. S. Dickson.
MRS JANE M'NAB AND OTHERS, Respondents (Reclaimers).—G. W. Burnet.

Process—Expenses—Modification—Suspender not insisting in suspension.—While a note of suspension of a charge upon a bond and disposition in security was in the Bill-Chamber, the complainer, in respect of the decision of the Inner-House refusing a petition for recall of an inhibition used by the charger, which raised the same question as the suspension, moved the Lord Ordinary to refuse the note. The Lord Ordinary refused the note, found the complainer liable in expenses, and modified the same to five guineas. The respondent reclaimed. The Court held (following Hare v. Stein, June 8, 1882, 9 R. 910) that the Lord Ordinary was entitled to modify the expenses, and in the circumstances refused to alter the sum at which he had modified them.

Bill-Chamber.
1ST DIVISION.
Lord Trayner.
M.

IN January 1888 David Wilkie Clarke presented a petition to the First Division praying for recall of inhibition used against him at the instance of Mrs Jane M'Nab and others, on the ground that they had no title to sue. The inhibition was used with reference to a debt of £2000 contained in a bond and disposition in security granted by Clarke in favour of Mrs M'Nab and others.

On 24th January 1888 Clarke was charged on the bond and disposition in security, and warrant thereon, at the instance of Mrs Jane M'Nab and others.

On 31st January 1888 Clarke raised a suspension of the charge on the same ground as that on which he sought recall of the inhibition.

On 10th March the First Division refused the petition for recall of inhibition (Clarke v. M'Nab, March 10, 1888, ante, p. 569).

On 14th March the Lord Ordinary in the Bill-Chamber (Trayner) pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary, on the motion of the suspender, refuses the note of suspension: Finds the suspender liable in expenses: Modifies the same to £5, 5s. sterling, for which sum decerns."

It appeared from the interlocutor that both parties were represented by counsel when it was pronounced.

On 16th March the respondents' agents wrote to the complainer's agents stating that the amount of their account was £18, 5s. 2d., and stating that the respondents had good reason to complain of the modification of expenses made by the Lord Ordinary, as he had dealt with the question of expenses "without hearing counsel or knowing the case sufficiently to warrant his deciding the point in the arbitrary way he did"; they therefore requested that the whole amount of the account should be paid, and stated that if that was not done they would reclaim to the Inner-House.

The complainer having refused to pay the account the respondents reclaimed.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The suspension was recalled, because it raised the same question as that which was settled in the petition for recall of inhibition. They did not deny that in such circumstances the Lord Ordinary could act as auditor, and tax the amount of the account, but he must give some grounds for the amount of the modification at which he had arrived, and not merely name an arbitrary sum as he had done here. The sum here allowed was not sufficient to pay the mere outlay in a case which had gone so far as the present. In Hare v. Stein[1] the Lord Ordinary had exercised this power, but he had given reasons for the amount of his modification.

Argued for the respondent;—The two processes, viz., the petition for recall and the suspension, were in reality only one—the papers were duplicates, and one set of instructions did for both. The sum allowed by the Lord Ordinary was, therefore, sufficient in the circumstances. The case of Hare v. Stein was precisely in point.

---

[1] Hare v. Stein, June 8, 1882, 9 R. 910.

No. 123.

May 26, 1888.
Clarke v. M'Nab.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am not prepared to interfere with the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. I cannot distinguish the present case from Hare v. Stein (9 R. 910). In that case Lord Shand and I both said in effect that the Lord Ordinary in such circumstances as were there present is entitled to fix a sum of expenses so as to avoid the further expense of remitting the successful party's account to taxation.

LORD SHAND.—It appears to me that what the Lord Ordinary really did here was to tax the account at a sum which he thought would cover the expenses incurred. If the case were one in which there were no considerations tending to cut down the claim, I should have had some difficulty in adhering, for it is clear that in ordinary circumstances the sum of £5, 5s. would not have been a sufficient award to cover even outlay where there had been so much procedure as there has been here. But this is one of two cases in which there were duplicate papers and instructions, and the Lord Ordinary thought himself entitled to take that into account in his taxation. I should perhaps myself not have fixed so low a sum, but in the circumstances I am not inclined to alter it.

LORD ADAM.—In the special circumstance of the case I agree in your Lordship's decision. At the same time I think this power which is undoubtedly in the Lord Ordinary should be sparingly used, and only where there has been little expenditure, and where he really knows what expenditure there has been, and is in a position to judge as to what part of it should be allowed.

LORD MURE was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

J SMITH CLARK, S.S.C.—WATT & ANDERSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

SIR CHARLES TENNANT AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Respondents).—
D.-F. Mackintosh—Jameson.
JANE H. SMITH AND ANOTHER (Napier Smith's Trustees) AND OTHERS, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Asher—Watson.

No. 124.

May 31, 1888.
Tennant v. Napier Smith's Trustees.

Servitude—Real burden—Ground-annual.—Where a disposition to a piece of ground conferred on the disponee a right to take water for manufacturing purposes from an adjoining canal on the disponer's ground, and to use the canal for navigation, it being stipulated that the disponee should be bound to bear jointly with the disponer the cost of maintaining the canal in good order in so far as it adjoined his ground, held that this obligation was a condition of the servitude, and that singular successors of the disponee could not retain the servitude without implementing the condition.

In and subsequent to 1824 the proprietor of a piece of ground held burgage conveyed a part of it to purchasers in various lots by contracts of ground-annual, in which he obliged himself to make a canal through the remainder of his ground for the use of the works to be erected on the several lots. He made this canal, which communicated with others, and was suitable for navigation by barges. The contracts of ground-annual gave the disponees "the privilege of taking water from the" canal "for the use of the works to be erected on the said lot of ground, provided the said water be returned into the said" canal, "and not suffered to run to waste, and that no impurities be suffered to run into the" canal, "together with the right of using the said canal

No. 124.
——
May 31, 1888.
Tennant v. Napier Smith's Trustees.

as a navigation . . . under the conditions and provisions hereinafter written." It was further stipulated that each disponee "shall be obliged to be at the expense of maintaining and keeping in good order and repair the . . . bank of the said side-cut or canal, which will bound the said lot of ground," (the disponer binding himself to keep in good order the other bank), and "both parties being jointly obliged to defray all other expenses of maintaining and keeping in good order and repair" the said canal, so far as it bounded said lot; and that the stipulated ground-rent and grassums, "and also the proportional expense of maintaining and keeping in good order and repair the said" canal "as aforesaid . . . are and shall be real liens and burdens affecting the ground so conveyed, and each part and portion thereof," and should be inserted in future transmissions.

In 1886 an action was raised at the instance of the representative of the original disponer, who was proprietor of the solum of the canal, and the proprietors of several of the lots, to have it found that the owners of the other lots, who were singular successors of the original purchasers, were bound to concur with the pursuers in cleaning out and maintaining the canal, which had become much silted up with mud and refuse. It was proved that navigation on the canal had ceased for nearly forty years, but could be profitably resumed if the canal were cleaned out, and that the privilege of taking water for manufacturing purposes from the canal had been all along exercised. The defenders, while insisting in their right to take water from the canal, pleaded that the obligation sought to be enforced was an obligation to pay an indefinite sum of money, and therefore not capable of enforcement as a real burden. Held that the obligation was a counterpart of the privilege conferred upon the defenders' authors, and that they were not entitled to maintain the privilege without submitting to the obligation, and therefore that the pursuers were entitled to decree.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Fraser.
M.

IN 1824 Messrs Charles Tennant & Company were owners of a piece of ground at St Rollox, Glasgow, which they exposed for sale in lots suitable for the erection of public works. The ground (which was held burgage) lay between the Monkland Canal and the Forth and Clyde Canal, and Tennant & Company, in the contracts of ground-annual in which they disponed the various lots to purchasers, bound themselves to construct upon ground retained by them adjoining the lots a canal communicating with the above-mentioned canals. In implement of this obligation a canal was formed, which was navigable by small barges, and bore the name of the St Rollox Canal.

In October 1886 an action was raised by Sir Charles Tennant, the representative of Tennant & Company, and proprietor of the solum of the canal and of one of the lots, and D. Y. Stewart & Company and others, proprietors of other lots, against Napier Smith's trustees, William Syme, and others, proprietors of the remaining lots, for declarator that the defenders were bound to concur with the pursuers in maintaining and keeping in good order the sides of the canal, so far as it bounded the respective properties of the defenders, and in "cleaning out the said canal so as to leave a channel of not less than 15 feet in width, and 5 feet 6 inches in depth, and in rendering the said canal fit for navigation by boats and vessels, and the water therein available and sufficiently pure for the use of the pursuers' works, and are bound to defray along with the pursuers the expense of the operations necessary for the maintenance and cleaning of the said St Rollox Canal as aforesaid, the amount to be defrayed by the defenders being the one-half of the expense required for cleaning and maintaining, as aforesaid, the portion of the said canal ex adverso of their respective properties."

The pursuers founded on the obligation contained in the contracts of ground-annual which formed the basis of defenders' titles. The contracts of ground-annual held by the various defenders were practically identical.

No. 124.
—
May 31, 1888.
Tennant v.
Napier
Smith's
Trustees.

and the contract of ground-annual entered into in March 1829 between Charles Tennant & Company as first party, and John M'Aslan, iron liquor maker, as second party, may be taken as a specimen. By that contract the first party conveyed to the second party one of the lots of ground—"declaring that upon the ground belonging to the said first party to the north of the lot before disponed it is proposed to make a side-cut or canal, the south bank whereof will form the north boundary of said lot as after mentioned of the width of 15 feet, and of the depth of 5 feet 6 inches, to join the canal or cut of junction between the Forth and Clyde and Monkland Canals, and which side-cut or canal, with a recess as after mentioned, the said first party bind and oblige themselves to complete within six months of the date hereof, and to face and cope the same in a sufficient manner with stone and lime, at least on the south side, all conformably to a plan thereof and of said lot of ground, docqueted and subscribed by the parties as relative hereto." The contract then defined the boundaries of the lot and declared it to be conveyed "with the privilege of taking water from the said side-cut for the use of the works to be erected on the said lot of ground, provided the said water be returned into the said side-cut, and not suffered to run to waste, and that no impurities be suffered to run into the said side-cut; together with the right of using the said side-cut as a navigation to and from the said cut of junction, under the conditions and provisions hereinafter written." It fixed a certain ground-rent and grassums as payable under it, and further provided that "the said John M'Aslan shall be obliged to be at the expense of maintaining and keeping in good order and repair the south bank of the said side-cut or canal, which will bound the said lot of ground on the north; and the said Charles Tennant & Company, and their successors, being bound to be at the expense of maintaining and keeping in good order and repair the north bank, and the parties hereto being jointly obliged to defray all other expenses of maintaining and keeping in good order and repair the said side-cut or canal so far as it bounds said lot of ground. . . . Which ground-rent and grassums, and also the proportional expense of maintaining and keeping in good order and repair the said side-cut as aforesaid, and the said bridge and stop-gates, are and shall be real liens and burdens affecting the ground above conveyed, and each part and portion thereof, and on the houses and other buildings erected and to be erected thereon, and as such shall be inserted in the instrument of sasine to follow thereon, and in all the future transmissions and investitures of the premises, otherwise the same shall be void and null." It was further provided that "the said John M'Aslan hereby binds and obliges himself, and his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever, to content and pay . . . the ground-annual . . . and also to . . . perform the whole other prestations, conditions, and obligations incumbent on them by these presents."

The various provisions above quoted were inserted or validly referred to in the series of titles.

All the lots of ground were built upon or otherwise occupied for the purposes of public works.

The pursuers averred that the St Rollox Canal was valuable to them as a means of communication with the Forth and Clyde Canal, that it had been so used by them, and might again be so used if cleaned out, that it was specially suitable for coal and other barges of a small size; further, that the right of drawing water from it had always been exercised by them, and was of great value to their works; that the bed of the canal had from time to time become much silted up, and had been several times cleaned out, on which occasions much difficulty had been occasioned in collecting the outlay from the various proprietors; that it had again become much choked up, so that navigation had become impossible, while the quantity of water available for the pursuers' works had become much reduced and its quality much deteriorated. "The whole canal has been nearly reduced to the condition of a stagnant ditch. To render it fit for the uses for which it was intended, and to which the pursuers are, in terms of their titles above quoted, entitled to apply it, and to make it wholesome to the neighbourhood, it is necessary that it should be thoroughly cleaned and cleared out, and restored to its original dimensions of 15 feet in width and 5½ feet in depth in all its length, or at least in so far as it bounds the properties of the pursuers and defenders respectively."

The defenders admitted that the canal had become silted up in certain places, and that they had refused to contribute to the expense of cleaning out the canal. They explained that it had not been used for navigation for forty years, and that it was unsuitable for use by barges of the size which plied on the Monkland or on the Forth and Clyde Canal. They stated that it was of no use or benefit to them, and had not been used by them for any purpose for many years. They admitted that the pursuers had exercised their right to draw water from it.

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) It being in present circumstances necessary for the maintaining and keeping in good order and repair of the St Rollox Canal that it should be cleaned out as concluded for, the pursuers are entitled to have the same cleaned out accordingly, and to recover from the defenders their respective shares of the expense of such cleaning, as concluded for, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers have no title or interest to sue this action. (5) The defenders ought to be assoilzied in respect that the obligations in the titles of the defenders' authors relative to maintaining and repairing the canal are personal obligations, and not enforceable against the defenders as singular successors. (6) The obligations founded on not being such as can by law be made real burdens on property, and not being conditions of the grant, and separatim, the same not having been effectually transmitted against the defenders, absolvitor should be pronounced. (7) Assuming the obligations founded on to have been inserted in the titles of the defenders' authors with the view and intention of maintaining the use of the canal for purposes of navigation, they are inapplicable to present circumstances, and cannot now be enforced by action. (8) The defenders not having in any way contributed to the accumulation of mud and rubbish in the canal, and the cleaning out of the canal being an operation which would be of no benefit to the defenders, they are not chargeable with the expense of the cleaning.

The Lord Ordinary (Fraser), on 18th March 1887, found and declared in terms of the declaratory conclusions, and ordered the cause to the roll for further procedure.*

---

* "OPINION.—The object of the present action is to enforce liability to clean out the St Rollox Canal at Glasgow, against various persons, the owners of the property through or by which it runs.

"Charles Tennant & Company, of the St Rollox Chemical Works, Glasgow, were owners of the ground at St Rollox, which they resolved to dispose of in lots for the erection of public works. To afford inducements to intending purchasers they resolved to make what is termed in the titles a 'cut or canal' through the grounds, so as to afford to the persons purchasing the lots a means of communication with the Forth and Clyde and Monkland Canals. The St Rollox Canal accordingly was formed, though not until after some of the lots had been disposed of; and in reference to these the matter is stated as follows in the contract of ground-annual between Charles Tennant & Company and John M'Aslan, dated 16th and 17th March 1829,—'Declaring that upon the

No. 124.

May 31, 1888.
Tennant v. Napier Smith's Trustees.

The defenders having obtained leave, reclaimed.

The pursuers obtained leave in the Inner-House to amend the record, ground belonging to the said first party [Tennant & Company], to the north of the lot before disponed, it is proposed to make a side-cut or canal, the south bank whereof will form the north boundary of said lot, as after mentioned, of the width of 15 feet and of the depth of 5 feet 6 inches, to join the canal or cut of junction between the Forth and Clyde and Monkland Canals, and which side-cut or canal, with a recess as after mentioned, the said first party bind and oblige themselves to complete within six months of the date hereof, and to face and cope the same in a sufficient manner with stone and lime at least on the south side, all conformably to a plan thereof and of said lot of ground, docqueted and subscribed by the parties as relative hereto.' In the later contracts the canal was referred to as having been finished. There were in all fifteen lots given off; and the persons who obtained these lots did so under very special conditions as to upholding the banks of the canal ex adverso of the lot of each, and of keeping them and the canal in good condition. It is not necessary to refer to these conditions in any detail. They are identical in all the contracts, except in immaterial particulars, and one of them only need be referred to. In the 5th article of the condescendence there is an excerpt from the contract of John M'Aslan, already mentioned, in the following terms:—'And farther, the said John M'Aslan shall be obliged to be at the expense of maintaining and keeping in good order and repair the south bank of the side-cut or canal, which will bound the said lot of ground on the north, and the said Charles Tennant & Company, and their successors, being bound to be at the expense of maintaining and keeping in good order and repair the north bank, and the parties hereto being jointly obliged to defray all other expenses of maintaining and keeping in good order and repair the said side-cut or canal so far as it bounds said lot of ground.'

---

"Thus, then, there was imposed upon the owners of the lots an obligation to defray the expense of maintaining and keeping in good order and repair the cut or canal. This is the important clause, the enforcement of which is sought in this action.

"Then the conditions of the contract are made a real burden in the following terms:—'Which ground-rent and grassums, and also the proportional expense of maintaining and keeping in good order and repair the said side-cut as aforesaid, and the said bridge and stop-gates are and shall be real liens and burdens affecting the ground above conveyed, and each part and portion thereof, and on the houses and other buildings erected and to be erected thereon, and as such shall be inserted in the instrument of sasine to follow hereon, and in all the future transmissions and investitures of the premises, otherwise the same shall be void and null.'

"The persons who took the lots, or their successors, erected upon them, on the banks of the canal, buildings according to their wants. The canal at various times got silted up, so that the navigation of barges in it was impeded, and its usefulness as a water supply was very much impaired. To remedy this state of matters voluntary contributions were made from time to time for the purpose of meeting the expense of cleaning it out. Some of the owners of the lots paid; and others did not; and as the canal has got into a very bad state again, this action has been brought in order, by means of a decree of the Court, to compel contributions to be made by all parties who may be liable thereto.

"The pursuers of this action are—(First), Sir Charles Tennant of the Glen, who is now the representative of Charles Tennant & Company, and is the owner of the solum of the canal and of one of the lots; (secondly), three other persons who are proprietors of lots on the banks of the canal, and who are interested in having it cleaned and made navigable. The whole owners of the lots have now been called as defenders by this action and by a supplementary action, which latter brought into Court a number of persons who were omitted from the first action.

"The defenders are singular successors of the persons who had originally obtained the lots of ground from Charles Tennant & Company, and they plead and they added this averment, viz., "The obligations sought to be enforced under the conclusions of the summons are imposed upon the

---

that they ought to be assoilzied, 'in respect that the obligations in the titles of the defenders' authors relative to maintaining and repairing the canal are personal obligations, and not enforceable against the defenders as singular successors.' Take the case of the defenders the trustees of Napier Smith and the defender William Syme as a typical instance. They are the singular successors of John M'Aslan. It is said that it is M'Aslan alone who was obliged to defray any part of the expense of maintaining and keeping in good order and repair. But assuming that this were the case, an obligation by him is incumbent on his representatives without any special clause. And there is such a special clause —'The said John M'Aslan hereby binds and obliges himself, and his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever, to . . . perform the whole other prestations, conditions, and obligations incumbent on them by these presents.' The real question is whether the obligation is of such a character as could be made a real burden,—or a condition of the grant which can be enforced against a singular successor.

"Now, the object of the obligation was one upon which the very existence of the canal depended. The canal required constant supervision, and periodical cleaning out and repairs. In the case of the Tailors of Aberdeen v. Coutts (3d August 1840, 1 Rob. App. 296), a distinction was drawn between such a continuous obligation and an obligation which was to be extinguished by a single act of payment. The former, although not declared a real burden, could be enforced against a singular successor if it had reference to the naturalia of the grant, where the latter would not. The matter is stated in the opinion of Lord Corehouse and other Judges. After stating that it is incompetent to burden heritage unless the sum be specified and not left indefinite, it is added,—'Thus also, if the obligation is to be performed, and so extinguished, by a single act, the presumption is that the granter of the feu-right meant to impose it on the grantee and his heirs exclusively, and not to extend it against singular successors; the case being the reverse of those where the obligation has a continuance, and is comparatively of little use unless it remains attached to the subject.'

"Such a case as is here suggested of the performance of the obligation by a single act is illustrated very clearly by the case of the Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Begg (20th December 1883, 11 Ret. 352), where a singular successor was assoilzied from a claim at the instance of a superior, who demanded from him payment of a proportion of the expense of making a roadway, founding upon a stipulation in the feu-charter that the feuars should pay the expense upon the completion of the roadway. The roadway was completed, and liability for payment of the debt immediately accrued. In these circumstances, it was held that the superior not having recovered the money from the feuar, who was the proper debtor in it, he could not come against a singular successor acquiring the property long afterwards. But such is not the present case. The obligation to keep the canal in good order is perpetual. One payment will not suffice.

"It is next said that this cannot be enforced, because the sum to be paid is indefinite; and it cannot, it is further said, for the same reason, be looked upon as a real burden. The obligation, it is said, is one not to repair but to 'defray the expenses of maintaining and keeping in good order and repair the said side-cut or canal.' But what is this but an obligation to repair? and undoubtedly if it be so, it can, being an obligation ad factum prœstandum, be made a real burden, and effectual as a standing obligation. The matter is thus referred to again in the case of the Tailors of Aberdeen v. Coutts, and almost the very case that this record presents is dealt with. 'It may be proper to explain,' said the Judges, 'that an obligation ad factum prœstandum may be enforced, and is so every day, though indirectly and practically it may resolve into payment of an indefinite sum. Thus it is one of the usual mill services, that the vassals of the sucken shall bring home mill-stones when required, and clear out the aqueduct when it becomes filled with mud and rubbish. This, in general, can only be done by hiring labourers to perform the work, whose wages the vassals pay, in defenders by the titles conveying the said subjects to them respectively"; and this relative plea,—"The obligations sought to be enforced in the present action having been validly imposed upon the defenders by their respective titles, the defenders are bound to implement the same."

The Inner-House, without expressing any opinion on the construction proportion to the extent of their feus or the nature of their thirlage. But these obligations are unquestionably real burdens, because the fact to be performed is in itself specific, whatever means the vassal may resort to for his own convenience in accomplishing it. There is accordingly a finding in the interlocutor proceeding on that familiar distinction. An obligation to pay a proportion of the expense of keeping certain wells in repair is of the same nature.' The clearing out of an aqueduct and the keeping wells in repair do not differ from the cleaning out of a canal either as regards the law applicable to them or the facts.

---

"Therefore, holding that this is a continuous obligation, the only point remaining to be considered is whether the pursuers of this action have a right to enforce it. A question apparently presenting in some respects the same features as the present occurs in reference to the right of one feuar to enforce building restrictions against a neighbouring feuar in whose titles these restrictions occur. The case of Hislop v. MacRitchie's Trustees (23d June 1881, 8 Ret. (H. L.) 95), indicates how, under certain circumstances, the title to sue would there be dealt with. The House of Lords in that case held that one feuar, merely because he was a neighbour of another feuar in whose title there were restrictions, had no right to enforce these restrictions. But, at the same time, in pronouncing this judgment the House of Lords recognised the doctrine that there would be a title to sue if there was mutuality and community of rights and obligations established between the feuars, 'which,' said Lord Selborne, 'can only be done by express stipulation in their respective contracts with the superior, or by reasonable implication from some reference in both contracts to a common plan or scheme of building, or by mutual agreement between the feuars themselves.' Now, all these things concur in this case. There is mutuality and community of rights of the most strict character existing amongst the owners of the lots of ground at St Rollox. All the owners are taken bound in the same way to keep the canal in good order opposite their respective lots, and if one fails in doing so, the work of the others becomes useless, their expenditure a waste, and the canal itself ceases to be a canal.

"But further, there is in the present case what there was not in the case of Hislop. It was not disputed in that case that if the superior himself had sued he could have enforced the restrictions against his contracting feuar. Now, here one of the pursuers is the owner of the solum of the canal, being the representative of the owners of the St Rollox ground, who contracted with each of the allottees. That contract he has a title to enforce although the title of the other pursuers should be denied. An averment is made by the defenders to the effect that 'the silting up of the canal has been mainly caused by the operations of the pursuers,' which is an averment of too vague a character to be attended to. But then the defenders proceed to aver that one of the pursuers, D. Y. Stewart & Company, by their operations, have polluted and rendered unnavigable the canal. That may or may not be, but in any view this would only operate as a personal bar to their obtaining decree against the defenders. It cannot stand in the way of the other pursuers obtaining the remedy they ask.

"As regards the condition of the canal, the pursuers give a rather depressing account of it in the 9th article of the condescendence, and the answer to this is,—'The pursuers' statement of the present condition of the canal is admitted to be generally correct.' If this answer had been a little more specific, the Lord Ordinary would have at once, in terms of the second conclusion of the summons, authorised the pursuers, at the sight of some person of skill to be appointed, to execute the operations necessary for cleaning out the canal, without any previous report by an engineer. But before taking such a step he has appointed the case to be put to the roll in order that parties may state their views as to the future course of action."

No. 124.

May 31, 1888.
Tennant v. Napier Smith's Trustees.

of the titles, recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and remitted the cause to his Lordship to allow the parties a proof of their averments.

A proof was then taken. The following were the facts established at the proof:—

The canal was navigated down to the year 1851, when navigation, which had for some years before that been very slight, entirely ceased. This was attributed in part to the existence of other means of transit to the works on it, and in part to its becoming somewhat silted up. At the time of the proof it was so much silted up with mud and refuse of various kinds as to make navigation quite impossible. The water was also very filthy. It had been used by certain of the pursuers for their manufacturing purposes. It was proved that if the canal were cleaned out it would be valuable to the pursuers, both as a means of navigation and as a water supply. It had been cleaned out four times at the expense of the allottees—once in 1850, again in 1858, again in 1874, and again in 1878.

The Lord Ordinary found and declared in terms of the declaratory conclusions, and authorised the pursuers, at the sight of Mr Barr, C.E., "to execute all such operations as may be necessary for cleaning out the channel of St Rollox Canal, to the depth of 5 feet 6 inches, and to the width of 15 feet: Finds the pursuers and the defenders liable in the expense of such operations, according to the proportions to be hereafter ascertained and fixed after the said operations are completed, and the whole cost thereof ascertained, and decerns."

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) On the proof the defenders had shewn that not they but one of the pursuers themselves was responsible for the state of the canal. But (2) the defenders were not by their titles laid under the obligation sought to be enforced on them as singular successors of the original allottees. It was sought to have the obligation to pay "the proportional expense of maintaining and keeping in good order" the canal enforced as a real burden on the defenders. But that was an obligation for an indefinite sum of money, and therefore, however much it was declared by the titles to be a real burden, it could not be enforced as such.[1] The case of Coutts had been always followed, and was precisely in point. That decision was entirely contrary to the doctrine of the Lord Ordinary's judgment. This was not an obligation ad factum præstandum, but clearly, on the very words of the contract, an obligation to make an indefinite payment. This construction derived force from the nature of the thing demanded. One party could not alone clean out the canal ex adverso of his ground. It must be a joint operation followed by a subsequent division of the expense which might be incurred. If, then, there was no real burden, was there a personal obligation? There was no connection by tenure, for the properties were held burgage.[2] The connection must therefore be by contract, if at all. What Sir C. Tennant was attempting was what Gardyne in vain attempted against the Royal Bank.[2] But Gardyne's case settled that while the original grantee under the ground-annual must be liable, because it was his contract, the singular successor was not. He took the subject, but the obligation did not transmit to him, there being, as already shewn, no real burden. Millar's case[2] shewed that the personal obligation remained with the person who undertook it, though he

---

[1] Tailors of Aberdeen v. Coutts, Dec. 20, 1834, 13 S. 226, H. L., May 23, 1837, 2 Sh. and M'L. 609, and Aug. 3, 1840, 1 Rob. Ap. 296; Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Begg, Dec. 20, 1883, 11 R. 352.

[2] Gardyne v. Royal Bank, March 8, 1851, 13 D. 912, and H. L., May 13, 1853, 1 Macq. 358; Small v. Millar, Feb. 3, 1849, 11 D. 495, March 17, 1853, 1 Macq. 345.

No. 124.

—

May 31, 1888.
Tennant v. Napier Smith's Trustees.

might choose to part with the land. (3) But, in any view, the obligation was not one which the Court would enforce in the circumstances. There had been no navigation since 1851, and very little for many years before that. When the pursuers had allowed a complete change of circumstances to begin and to continue so long, the Court would not disturb the arrangement which the parties had so long consented to. Restrictions on the use of property, e.g., building restrictions, formed a good illustration.[1] Suppose the obligation had been to maintain a road, and that all interested in using that road had for many years used a different road, allowing the solum of the old one to be used for some other purpose, the Court would not thereafter allow the creditor in the obligation to enforce it. It would hold that by his actings he had abandoned it.

In answer to the Court the defenders stated that they did not abandon the rights in the canal conferred on them by their titles.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) The proof very clearly established that the pursuers had an interest to enforce the obligation. Drawing water had been always continued by them, and navigation had again become important in the existing state of railway rates, and would be resumed when the canal was cleaned out. Coutts' case did not apply, for the obligation here was inter naturalia of the grant. Besides, the words imported, not an obligation to pay an indefinite sum, but to be at the expense of it, i.e., either do it or refund the person who did. Indirectly and practically, as was shewn by the Judges who agreed with Lord Medwyn in Coutts' case, such obligations resolved themselves into a payment, and the Court would not extend the fine distinction which prevailed with the House of Lords. (2) The attempt here made was to enjoy the right and yet escape from the conditions on which it was given. The question of personal obligation could not arise in the case of Coutts, for the terms of the titles there did not admit of that. In Gardyne's case neither the plea of personal obligation nor that of jus quæsitum tertio arose, whereas here the former plea favoured Tennant and the latter the other pursuers. The obligation was a perpetual contract right, and the delay in getting the canal cleaned was immaterial, for the right was res meræ facultatis. Cases like Campbell v. Clydesdale Bank were not in point, for there it had become impossible to enforce the condition sought to be enforced equally on all. Here, on the contrary, it was quite possible.

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—If I thought that the case before us really raised the more important points which have been argued to us, I should have desired to take more time for consideration of the authorities. But I am quite satisfied that at least the more difficult of them do not truly arise. The issue to be decided is an issue outside the category to which much of the argument addressed to us belongs.

I shall briefly state the grounds on which I think we ought to adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. The circumstances are somewhat unusual. So far back as 1824 the then proprietors of St Rollox projected and formed a canal which joined the Monkland Canal, which itself communicates with and is fed from the Forth and Clyde Canal. The works at St Rollox were even then important and valuable, and the main object of the formation of the canal by the proprietors was that of transit. They gave off ground at the sides of the cut, which in course of years was made, to various persons. In the titles

---

[1] Campbell v. Clydesdale Bank, June 19, 1868, 6 Macph. 943, 40 Scot. Jur. 539; Duke of Bedford v. Trustees of British Museum, July 6, 1822, 2 Mylne and Keen, 552; Sayers v. Collier, Nov. 6, 1884, L. R., 28 Ch. D. 303.

No. 124.

May 31, 1888.
Tennant v. Napier Smith's Trustees.

to these pieces of ground certain privileges were given to the riparian proprietors, as I may call them, which were a right of navigation and a right of taking water. As the counterpart of these privileges over their property, Tennant & Company put the riparian proprietors under an obligation to maintain the banks and to clean out the canal itself. It is quite manifest that the commercial state of the country which then existed made it quite worth the proprietors' while to incur the expense of these operations. But, at the same time, these operations made their property of additional value to those proprietors of the lots which had been given out. In process of time the canal became disused, railways and other modes of transit rendered it antiquated, and therefore there has been no navigation by it for many years—since 1851 indeed. But there was another use to which it was put, and which has been manifestly of great value to some of the pursuers. The allottees were all entitled to take water out of it for their works, but were under an obligation to restore the water, and clean out the canal and maintain it. Now, it seems that while the privileges of taking water are still maintained by the feuars, some of them, the defenders here, say that they are not bound by the conditions on which their rights were granted, and, in particular, that they are not bound as singular successors to clean out the canal or maintain the bank. This contention is founded on the phraseology of their contracts of ground-annual and on the analogy of the case of Coutts, and the decisions which come under the same category of law. This case does not, I think, depend in any respect on that branch of law. The obligation to clean out the canal and to maintain the bank is a counterpart of the right of navigation and of taking water from the canal. We are not driven, I think, to consider subtle distinctions between obligations ad facta præstanda and money payments. The obligation to clean out the canal may result in a money payment on the part of the disponee who is under the obligation. In the same way the obligation to maintain the bank must be in the same position. But the question is, whether a disponee can take the privilege without implementing the obligation which is the condition of it. That was not the question in the case of Coutts. The question there was not the nature of the right. The obligation was a specific obligation separate from the right. It was found that it did not run with the lands. I should rather think, if driven to a consideration of that case, that the principle enunciated in that case which would apply to this one is that which is thus described by Lord Brougham. He says, speaking of the obligation in the case of Coutts, "In a matter confessedly of some nicety, and on which I have had great doubts, it seems the safe course to consider this obligation as it directly and apparently is—an obligation to pay an indefinite sum unconnected with the naturalia of the right. The obligation to pay the expense, or any proportion of the expense, of repairing immediately connected with the subject granted would clearly stand in a different predicament." That latter sentence, I think, states the position in which the obligation here stands. Meantime, however, I consider the case solely in view of the grant by the proprietor of a privilege on certain conditions, and do not inquire whether the granter, on the one hand, is bound in perpetuity to give it, nor whether, on the other, the disponee is entitled to renounce it, or what the effect would be in either case. The disponees, on the question being put to them, maintained without hesitation their right to take water and to navigation. If so, they must obey the condition on which they obtained their rights.

On these grounds I am for adhering to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. The only difficulty I ever entertained was whether the obligation sought to be enforced had not ceased in respect that the canal with regard to which it existed had ceased to be a canal for navigation substantially for more than half a century, and literally in the sense that there had been no navigation at all for thirty-six years. That difficulty has on further argument and consideration disappeared. I think the canal still exists as a canal, and it is the subject with respect to which the obligation sought to be enforced was imposed. That being so, I think the case is clear. There is no feudal relation between the parties. The property is held burgage. Sir Charles Tennant, as the successor of Tennant & Company, holds the solum of the canal by burgage tenure. The defenders hold their property on the south side of the canal by burgage tenure also. The canal is their north boundary, and no part of their property extends over it. They hold that burgage property under an obligation to pay a certain ground-annual, a rent-charge as it would be called in England, to Sir Charles Tennant and his heirs. They hold and assert a right over his property—the solum of the canal—adjoining theirs. I put the question pointedly at the end of the discussion whether they repudiated any right over it or claimed any such right. The answer was that the case must be decided on the footing that they claimed a right.

The contract referred to as a specimen of the rights of the disponees was that in favour of M'Aslan. The right conferred on him, and to which the defenders now assert their right, is "the privilege of taking water from the said side-cut for the use of the works to be erected on the said lot of ground, provided the said water be returned into the said side-cut and not suffered to run to waste, and that no impurities be suffered to run into the said side-cut, together with the right of using the said side-cut as a navigation to and from the said cut of junction under the conditions and provisions hereinafter written." That is a valuable right over a neighbour's property. It is a servitude, and the dominant tenement is the property on the south side. It is the right to use this piece of ground covered with water, taking the water out of it on certain conditions, and also navigating it on certain conditions, and these conditions are that "M'Aslan shall be obliged to be at the expense of maintaining and keeping in good order and repair the south bank of the said side-cut or canal, which will bound the said lot of ground on the north . . . and the parties hereto being jointly obliged to defray all other expenses of maintaining and keeping in good order the said side-cut or canal, so far as it bounds said lot of ground, . . . which ground-rent and grassums, and also the proportional expense of maintaining and keeping in good order and repair the said side-cut as aforesaid . . . are and shall be real liens and burdens affecting the ground above conveyed and each part and portion thereof, and on the houses and other buildings erected and to be erected thereon, and as such shall be inserted in the instrument of sasine to follow hereon, and in all the future transmissions and investitures of the premises, otherwise the same shall be void and null." That is to say, a servitude, a right to use an adjoining property in a certain manner, is conferred on certain conditions. The owner of the dominant tenement is asserting his right to exercise the servitude, but refuses to comply with the conditions, and hence this action. I think there is no answer to it. There is no question of real burden in my opinion. On the ordinary principles of law I think the conditions ought to be enforced. Mr Asher put the case of the defenders thus,—"The obligation is a condition of my right, good against my author, who parted with the right to use Sir Charles Tennant's property in this way, and transferred it to me, the disponee; but the condition, the obligation, remains with him, the disponer." That was maintained to us as a proposition in the law of contract, for, as I have said, there is no feudal relation. It is said that the right of the grantee of the property now belonging to the defenders has been transferred to the defenders, the obligation which is the condition of it remaining with the disponer of it. No one could so read the contract without having a feeling of amazement. The right to use Sir Charles Tennant's property has been transferred to the defenders by the title on which they hold their adjoining property, and they maintain that the right is transferred but that the obligation which is the condition of it is not. I think it a plain case for the enforcement of the condition, and I think it ought to be enforced, and that the defenders are liable to have it enforced against them.

No. 124.

May 31, 1888.
Tennant v. Napier Smith's Trustees.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I am of the same opinion.

Lord Craighill was absent.

The Court adhered.

F. J. Martin, W.S.—Morton, Neilson, & Smart, W.S.—Agents.

No. 125.

June 1, 1888.
Baird's Trustees v. Lord Advocate.

The Trustees of the Baird Trust, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Murray—C. S. Dickson.

The Lord Advocate, Defender (Respondent).—Lord-Adv. Macdonald—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—A. J. Young.

Revenue—Income-Tax—Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 105, and sec. 88, Schedule C, Rule Third—Exemption—" Charitable purposes only."—The words "charitable purposes," as used in the exempting clauses of the Income-Tax Act, 1842, are to be interpreted in their ordinary and popular signification as meaning the relief of poverty, and do not cover purposes of general benevolence and of public utility.

By trust-deed a truster provided a fund of £500,000 for the promotion of religion and the mitigation of the "spiritual destitution" which prevailed "among the poor and working population of Scotland." The income of the fund was principally applied towards the building and endowment of churches. Held that it was not exempt from the payment of income-tax as a "trust established for charitable purposes only," in the sense of the 105th section and sec. 88, schedule C, of the Income-Tax Act, 1842.

1st Division.
Lord Fraser.
M.

Under a trust-deed executed by the late James Baird of Auchmedden, on 24th July 1873, the truster made over to the trustees a sum of £500,000 in the following terms, and for the following purposes, inter alia,—"I, James Baird of Auchmedden, . . . feeling deeply impressed with the extent to which spiritual destitution prevails among the poor and working population of Scotland, and being satisfied that this proceeds in a great measure from the want of properly organised and endowed territorial work; and considering also that there appears to be a tendency to a departure from the truth, and to an exclusion of religion in the teaching of the young, and that the means available by law are insufficient to provide for the faithful preaching and teaching of the word of God, and for the exposure and refutation of error, and for the support of church, and educational and other purposes of a religious character; and being satisfied that under existing circumstances the evils foresaid cannot properly be met, nor the objects before mentioned attained, without the aid of

No. 125.

June 1, 1888.
Baird's Trustees v. Lord Advocate.

private benevolence, and additional organisations, and fresh influences, I have resolved . . . to provide a fund of £500,000 sterling, &c., . . . Declaring, as I hereby declare and direct, that the said funds shall be expended for the support of objects and purposes in connection with the Established Church of Scotland, all of a religious character, as after described, and for the aid of institutions having the promotion of such purposes in view, my grand object being to assist in providing the means of meeting, or at least as far as possible promoting the mitigation of, spiritual destitution among the population of Scotland, through efforts for securing the godly upbringing of the young, the establishing of parochial pastoral work, and the stimulating of ministers and all agencies of the said Church of Scotland, to sustained devotedness in the work of carrying the gospel to the homes and hearts of all. And as such spiritual destitution exists to the greatest extent in populous places it is my wish that the operation of this trust be directed in the first instance chiefly to such populous places," &c.

The funds in the possession of the trustees were all lent out or invested in various ways in the United Kingdom, partly on heritable security and partly in stocks, annuities, and debentures of various railway and other public companies. Upon the whole of the annual returns of these investments, income-tax was deducted by the debtors before paying over the annual proceeds of the investments to the trustees.

The expenditure of the trust from the yearly income of the trust-funds for the year from 1st January to 31st December 1886 was as follows:—Grants, viz.,—1. Towards church building, £14,350. 2. Towards church endowing, £3292. 3. Towards augmentation of stipend, £690. 4. Miscellaneous, £200. Baird lectures—Rev. Professor Milligan, £200. Allowance to Baird Trustees, £500. Amounting in all to £19,232. The income of the trust was only slightly larger.

The income-tax paid upon the investments of the trust for 1886-87 was £691, 5s. 4d. Of that sum £46, 6s. 8d. represented the tax upon the abovenamed three items, viz. £690 granted in augmentation of stipend, £200 for the Baird lectures, which were both paid free of income-tax, and £500 allowed to the trustees, in which case the tax was deducted before payment.

Of the remaining sum of £644, 18s. 8d., the trustees claimed repayment from the Lord Advocate as representing the Inland Revenue in this action. They founded upon the 105th section and schedule C, therein referred to, of the Income-Tax Act, 1842,* maintaining that the payment in question

---

* The 105th section of the Income-Tax Act, 1842, provided,—"Any corporation, fraternity, or society of persons, and any trustee for charitable purposes only, shall be entitled to the same exemption in respect of any yearly interest or other annual payment chargeable under schedule D of this Act, in so far as the same shall be applied to charitable purposes only, as is hereinbefore granted to such corporation, fraternity, society, and trustee respectively, in respect of any stock or dividends chargeable under schedule C of this Act and applied to the like purposes, and such exemption shall be allowed by the Commissioners for special purposes on due proof before them; and the amount of the duties which shall have been paid by such corporation, fraternity, society, or trustee, in respect of such interest or yearly payment, either by deduction from the same or otherwise, shall be repaid under the order of the said Commissioners for special purposes in the manner hereinbefore provided for the repayment of sums allowed by them in pursuance of any exemption contained in the said schedule C."

Section 88, schedule C, rule 3d, provided,—"The stock or dividends of any corporation, fraternity, or society of persons, or of any trust established for

No. 125.

June 1, 1888. Baird's Trustees v. Lord Advocate.

fell within the terms of the exempting clauses. They stated that the claim for exemption had been allowed every year from the commencement of the trust up to 1886.

The Lord Advocate stated in answer that the funds in question had not been proved to have been applied to "charitable purposes only," and further founded upon the terms of exemption contained in Rule 6, schedule A, section 61 of the Income-Tax Act, 1842.*

The pursuers pleaded;—Upon a sound construction of the provisions of the Income-Tax Acts, the pursuers are entitled to the exemptions claimed, and decree ought to be pronounced in terms of the conclusions of the summons, with expenses.

The defender pleaded;—On a sound construction of the said trust-deed, and of the provisions of the Income-Tax Acts, the pursuers are not entitled to repayment as claimed.

The Lord Ordinary (Fraser), on 14th March 1888, assoilzied the defender.†

---

charitable purposes only, or which, according to the rules or regulations established by Act of Parliament, charter, decree, deed of trust, or will, shall be applicable by the said corporation, fraternity, or society, or by any trustee, to charitable purposes only, and in so far as the same shall be applied to charitable purposes only, or the stock or dividends in the names of any trustees applicable solely to the repairs of any cathedral, college, church, or chapel, or any building used solely for the purposes of divine worship, and in so far as the same shall be applied to such purposes, provided the application thereof to such purposes shall be duly proved before the said Commissioners for special purposes by any agent or factor on behalf of any such corporation, fraternity, or society, or by any of the members or trustees."

* Under schedule A (duties on lands and heritages), section 61, No. 6, of the Income-Tax Act, 1842, allowance was authorised to be made for the duties charged "on the rents and profits of lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages belonging to any hospital, public school, or almshouse, or vested in trustees for charitable purposes, so far as the same are applied to charitable purposes." It was further provided that the said allowances were "to be granted on proof before the Commissioners for special purposes of the due application of the said rents and profits to charitable purposes only, and in so far as the same shall be applied to charitable purposes only."

† "OPINION.—By the 105th section of the Income-Tax Act of 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), continued by subsequent Acts, it is enacted, that '. . . . Any trustee, for charitable purposes only, shall be entitled to the same exemption in respect of any yearly interest or other annual payment chargeable under schedule D of this Act, in so far as the same shall be applied to charitable purposes only, as is hereinbefore granted to such . . . trustee . . . in respect of any stock or dividends chargeable under schedule C of this Act and applied to the like purposes.

"Now, schedule C thus referred to enacts that the stock or dividends 'of any trust established for charitable purposes only, or which, according to the rules or regulations,' of any deed of trust or will shall be applicable 'to charitable purposes only, and in so far as the same shall be applied to charitable purposes only,' shall be exempted from the duty. The pursuers of this action aver that they are trustees holding funds for 'charitable purposes only,' and have paid duty upon trust-funds in their hands which they have applied to charitable purposes only, viz., (1) towards church building, £14,350; (2) towards church endowing, £3292. They now claim a return of the duty paid in regard to these two sums, the same being, according to their contention, exempted from duty by the statute.

"This raises simply the question, What is the construction to be put upon the words 'charitable purposes only'? According to the pursuers these words have the wide interpretation given to them by the Court of Chancery in England, in interpreting the statute of 43 Elizabeth, cap. 4 (commonly called the Statute

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—In order to succeed in their argument, it was not necessary for them to shew that the words "charitof Charitable Uses), and the Statutes of Mortmain. In the case of Morice v. Bishop of Durham (9 Vesey, 405), Sir William Grant, Master of the Rolls, stated that the word 'charity' in the Court of Chancery in England derived its signification chiefly from this statute of Elizabeth. The title of this statute is 'an Act to redress the misemployment of lands, goods, and stocks of money heretofore given to charitable uses'; and the preamble of the Act is in the following terms:—'Whereas lands, tenements, rents, annuities, profits, hereditaments, goods, chattels, money, and stocks of money, have been heretofore given, limited, appointed, and assigned, as well by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, and her most noble progenitors, as by sundry other well-disposed persons, some for relief of aged, impotent, and poor people, some for maintenance of sick and maimed soldiers and mariners, schools of learning, free schools, and scholars in universities, some for repair of bridges, ports, havens, causeways, churches, sea-banks, and highways, some for education and preferment of orphans, some for or towards relief, stock, or maintenance for houses of correction, some for marriages of poor maids, some for supportation, aid, and help of young tradesmen, handicraftsmen, and persons decayed, and others for relief or redemption of prisoners or captives, and for aid or ease of any poor inhabitants, concerning payments of fifteens, setting out of soldiers, and other taxes; which lands, tenements, rents, annuities, profits, hereditaments, goods, chattels, money, and stocks of money nevertheless have not been employed according to the charitable intent of the givers and founders thereof, by reason of frauds, breaches of trust, and negligence in those that should pay, deliver, and employ the same: For redress and remedy whereof, be it enacted by authority of this present Parliament,' &c. Enactments are then made authorising the Courts to give redress against the frauds, &c., which called for repression. The Court of Chancery extended very much the list of charitable purposes contained in this preamble. Mr Jarman (Treatise on Wills, vol. i. p. 208) says,—'Charity is not confined to the objects comprised in this enumeration; it extends to all cases within the spirit and intendment of the statutes.' And he enumerates a vast number of cases (all established by decision of the Court) which have been held to be charitable uses, and of which these are examples:—Gifts for the erection of water-works; for the general improvement of a town; for the establishment of a lifeboat; or of a botanical garden; to the trustees, and for the benefit of the British Museum; to the Royal, the Geographical, and Humane Societies; keeping the chimes of a church in repair; for building an organ gallery in a church; founding prizes for essays; for deserving literary men who have been unsuccessful; for the increase and encouragement of good servants; for establishing and upholding an institution for the investigation and cure of diseases of quadrupeds and birds useful to man. The Statute of Mortmain (9 Geo. II. c. 36), which restricted the power of persons to make bequests to 'charitable uses,' adopted the wide definition of these words already recognised in the Court of Chancery in the interpretation of the statute of Elizabeth.

---

"Now the question arises whether these decisions have any application to the exemptions given by the Income-Tax Act, which is an imperial statute, and the Lord Ordinary thinks that they have not. His opinion is that the words 'charitable purposes' in the 'Income-Tax Act' (intensified by the addition of the word 'only') must be interpreted according to their ordinary and everyday familiar use. Charity in this sense does not mean 'goodwill,' or 'benevolence,' or 'the application of funds to public utility,' or for the promotion of learning. It has the restricted sense of 'liberality to the poor,' 'alms,' as given by Dr Johnson. In one sense it may be regarded as charity to devote a sum of money to paying ministers' salaries, and building churches for the spread of religion, even although wealthy agnostics may obtain the benefit of such spiritual instruction. But how is this teaching of religion anywise different from the granting funds in trust for the purpose of teaching science by means of a mechanics' institute, or giving literary instruction by hired lecturers? The income-tax able purposes" were synonymous with the words in the English Statute of Charitable Uses. The words "charitable purposes" had been used in other statutes, for instance in the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act, 1882, sec. 10, and in the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, sec. 11, subsec. 3.[1] The "maintenance and promotion of religious ordinances and education" had been held to be a "charitable purpose" under the first of these Acts.[2] The words had also been used by the Lord President (Inglis) as applicable to a fund devoted to religious and other purposes in a recent case.[3] In that case his Lordship had used ordinary colloquial language in speaking as he had done. There being no interpretation clause in the Income-Tax Acts, the same meaning ought to be put upon the words when found there. It was matter of every-day practice in Scotland to construe the word charity as applicable to a case like the present. If the Lord Ordinary's view was sound, it would lead to a breaking up for income-tax assessment of the different purposes which a hospital served into assessable and non-assessable purposes. For instance, the funds devoted to education would not be held to be charitable, those devoted to housing, feeding, or clothing, would be charitable. Funds belonging to the poor of a parish were not necessarily applied to physical destitution.[4] The mere fact that funds applied to the repairs of a church were specially exempted in schedule C did not affect the question.

No. 125.

June 1, 1888.
Baird's Trustees v. Lord Advocate.

---

plainly was not intended to be diminished by payments such as these. It is a tax upon everyone having a certain income, and it is only when the clamant calls of poverty and distress render it expedient to relax the incidence of the duty that such relaxation will be given. It was perfectly right to give a wide interpretation to the words 'charitable uses' in the statute of Elizabeth, looking at the object of that statute—to repress frauds that had grown very much in the application of trust-funds left for the purposes of public utility. But the very opposite mode of interpretation ought to be given in regard to an exemption contained in a statute imposing a general tax borne by the whole community who are able to bear it.

"The clause in schedule C itself affords conclusive evidence that the words 'charitable purposes' have not the wide meaning given to the words 'charitable uses' by the Chancery decisions; for besides giving the exemption to moneys applied for charitable purposes, the clause goes on to specify that there shall also be exempted from the duty 'the stock or dividends in the names of any trustees applicable solely to the repairs of any cathedral, college, church, or chapel, or any building used solely for the purpose of divine worship.' Now, such expenditure was not regarded as a charitable purpose, otherwise there would be no necessity for this special clause, and yet such expenditure for repairs upon a church is specially mentioned in the Act of Elizabeth as the application of money to a charitable use. Furthermore, by section 149 it is provided that the trustees of the British Museum shall be allowed the like exemptions 'in respect of any dividends of stock vested in such trustees, or any of them, or in any other for their use, as are granted to charitable institutions by this Act.' Therefore, money given to the British Museum was not a 'charitable purpose' falling under the clause in Schedule C, and would not have been exempt from duty but for this special clause; and yet it has been decided by the Court of Chancery that a gift 'to the trustees, and for the benefit of the British Museum,' was a charitable use within the meaning of the English Statutes (British Museum v. White, 2 S. and St. 595)."

[1] Incorporation of Tailors in Glasgow v. Inland Revenue, May 26, 1887, 14 R. 729.

[2] Ferguson Bequest Fund v. Commissioners on Educational Endowments, March 15, 1887, 14 R. 624.

[3] Grant v. Macqueen, May 23, 1877, 4 R. 734 (Lord President, p. 736).

[4] Hamilton v. The Minister and Kirk-Session of Cambuslang, Nov. 23, 1752, M. 10,570.

Argued for the Lord Advocate;—"Charitable purposes" in the sense of the Income-Tax Acts meant eleemosynary uses; the element of giving to those who had not must be present. The view of the reclaimers was that a much wider interpretation must be given; indeed they would make it equivalent to public uses. They had indeed avoided using any argument based on the Chancery use of the word arising out of the Statute 43 Elizabeth, cap. 4, and the Mortmain Acts. But, as the Lord Ordinary observed, the true purpose of the passing of the Act of Queen Elizabeth was to prevent the misapplication of trust-funds, and it was right to give a wide interpretation, looking at the object of the statute. The words "charitable purposes" in the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, were not there used in the wide sense which would include moneys devoted to purposes of public amelioration. Religious purposes were in that statute specially enumerated as separate from "charitable" purposes. The word "destitution" as used in the trust-deed had been founded on on the other side. But the destitution in question was spiritual destitution, and as such was not confined to the poorer classes of the community. The construction to be put upon the words used in the Income-Tax Acts must in a taxing statute be the popular one. The statute was an imperial one, and could not have one meaning in one part of the kingdom, and another in a different part of it. No assistance could be got from the cases which had been cited on the other side. In the Ferguson Bequest case there was no decision as to what constituted "charitable uses." In the Heriot's Hospital case[1] there was no attempt to define, nor was there in other cases which had raised the question of the Court's jurisdiction over charities.[2] In England, everything from the Royal Society to a Home for Lost Dogs had been held to be a charity in the sense of the Chancery Courts. Used in that sense, the proper Scottish equivalent for "charitable purposes" was "pious uses." All the considerations of probability and expediency were against the respondents. Dr Johnson's definition of charity as "liberality to the poor" was the best.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action by the gentlemen known under the name of the Trustees of the Baird Trust to recover a sum paid by them as income-tax for the year 1886-7, and amounting in all to £644, 18s. 8d. The ground on which the action is laid is that the pursuers, the Baird Trust, are entitled to an exemption from income-tax under the clauses of the Income-tax Act of 1842.

The exempting clause under which the pursuers seek to bring themselves is thus expressed,—"Any trustee for charitable purposes only shall be entitled to the same exemption in respect of any yearly interest or other annual payment chargeable under schedule D of this Act, in so far as the same shall be applied to charitable purposes only, as is hereinbefore granted to such trustee in respect of any stock or dividends chargeable under schedule C of this Act, and applied to the like purposes." Schedule C which is thus referred to enacts that the stock or dividends "of any trust established for charitable purposes only, or which according to the rules or regulations" of the trust-deed shall be applicable to "charitable purposes only," and in so far as the same shall be applied to "charitable purposes only," shall be exempted from the duty. The sole question therefore before us is whether, under the provisions of the Baird Trust, the dividends which have been subjected to income-tax, and the income of the [1] Ross v. Governors of Heriot's Hospital, Feb. 14, 1843, 5 D. 589.

---

[2] Dundas, March 15, 1869, 7 Macph. 670.

No. 125.

June 1, 1888.
Baird's Trustees v. Lord Advocate.

Trust generally, is applicable to "charitable purposes only," and has been applied to "charitable purposes only"? That is the only question before us.

The truster has expressed pretty distinctly in his deed that his object is to promote religion, and to make provision against the existing spiritual destitution, particularly among the poor and working population of Scotland. And accordingly the income of the year of taxation has been applied to a large extent, as we see in the record, towards the building of churches. The largest sum was applied to that purpose, and another sum of smaller amount has been applied towards the endowment of churches. There are some other subordinate items of expenditure which are of the same character; there is "augmentation of stipend," and "miscellaneous expenses" which are not very clearly defined, payment for "Baird lectures," and "allowance to the Baird Trustees." Now, are any of these purposes to which the money has been applied—strictly in terms of the deed as we must assume, and it is not disputed—"charitable purposes"?

It appears to me that in the construction of taxing Acts we must always take it for granted, where these Acts apply to the whole United Kingdom, that the words used by the Legislature are used in their popular and ordinary signification, and are not technical legal terms belonging to one system of jurisprudence which may exist in one part of the United Kingdom and not in another. The occurrence of such technical terms as these in a taxing Act would have the most disturbing and confusing effect, and it would be very difficult indeed to administer such a statute as applicable to the whole United Kingdom. And accordingly we always find in a taxing Act that the words used are words of ordinary meaning which are understood by everybody, whether in England, Scotland, or Ireland, in the same sense. To endeavour, therefore, to import into the construction of this statute the meaning attached to the word "charity" in certain classes of cases that have occurred in the Court of Chancery in England would be in direct contradiction to the principle which I have just stated. Of course, if the statute itself affixes a particular meaning or interpretation to a word of ordinary popular use, it must receive the meaning which the statute gives it, but if there is nothing to interpret it in the statutory sense—if there is no interpretation clause, and no context to shew that the word is used in other than its ordinary sense—then we are bound in administering the statute to give to it that ordinary sense, and no other.

It appears to me that "charity" and "charitable" have one sense, and one only, in ordinary familiar and popular use. Charity is relief of poverty, and a charitable act or a charitable purpose consists in relieving poverty, and whatever goes beyond that is not within the meaning of the word "charity" as it occurs in this statute. The Court of Chancery, as we know, has extended the use of the word "charity" to very different purposes—to purposes of general benevolence and of public utility—but I think it is quite impossible, where we are applying the proper rule of construction of a taxing Act, to give it any such meaning here.

Therefore, without adverting in the first place to the particular clauses of the statute to which the Lord Ordinary has appealed as supporting the construction he has put upon the words, I think prima facie, and reading this statute as we are bound to read every taxing Act, we must read this word "charity" in the sense which I have stated. I am not at all insensible to the strength of the Lord Ordinary's argument on the various clauses of the statute, and particularly on the extension of the exemption to purposes which in a wider sense of the word "charity" would be comprehended within it. I rather desire to rest my judgment upon the plain and broad ground that in an Act of this description, applicable to the whole United Kingdom, and for the purpose of levying taxation, we are bound to give to such a word as this nothing but its ordinary popular signification. I am therefore for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

No. 125.

June 1, 1888.
Baird's Trustees v. Lord Advocate.

LORD SHAND.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The words in the statute to be construed by the judgment of the Court for the purpose of ascertaining what is the extent of the exemption are "any trust established for charitable purposes only"; and I am of opinion, apart from the considerations to which your Lordship has alluded, that in the statute itself we have the means of ascertaining the force and effect of these words. Schedule C, after the provision which your Lordship has read, proceeds to enact that "the stock or dividends in the names of any trustees applicable solely to the repairs of any cathedral, college, church, or chapel, or any building used solely for the purposes of divine worship," shall be subject to exemption. It appears to me to be clear that if the term "charitable purposes only" had been used in the large sense contended for by the trustees, so as to cover the building of churches, and indeed to include religious purposes generally, any provision of this kind as to the funds provided for the repairs of a church or chapel would be unmeaning and unnecessary. If the statute in an earlier clause has already provided that funds dedicated to religious purposes are to be regarded as given for charitable purposes within the meaning of that term as used in the statute, and that therefore expenditure on the building of churches and cathedrals, being of course directly for a religious purpose, is within the exemption, I cannot understand that it could possibly have been specially provided, as is here done by a later clause, that money spent on the repairs of such churches shall be exempt from the tax. The only inference that I can draw from this special provision that funds laid out in the way of executing repairs on churches or chapels or buildings used solely for the purpose of divine worship are to be so exempt is that the general exemption given under the head of charitable purposes does not cover or include religious purposes, and so does not include expenditure for building or endowing churches. And so, without going outside of schedule C of the statute, I am of opinion that we have a construction put upon the words "for charitable purposes only" which is conclusive against the argument maintained by the reclaimers, the Baird Trustees.

But I further agree with your Lordship that the true meaning of the words is as your Lordship has expressed it. It is said that we ought to adopt the more extensive meaning of the words "charitable uses" for which the trustees plead, because of the wide signification given to them in the English Statute of Charitable Uses, and the Statutes of Mortmain, and in the judgments of the Courts in England following on later statutes. But it is very evident that this argument goes a great deal too far for the purpose of the trustees who are seeking this exemption. If we were to give effect to it, the term "charitable uses" employed in these statutes,—obviously in an unusually wide sense so as to check the evils which the statutes were designed to remedy,—would embrace not merely institutions founded for the relief of the poor, but schools and educational institutions of every kind, and even funds left for the repair of bridges, ports, havens, causeways, seabanks, highways, and the like. Counsel for the reclaimers could not maintain that the terms used in this statute in a popular modern sense could receive an interpretation so wide. But if the words have not this extended meaning, where is the line to be drawn? It becomes necessary that the Court should draw the line. If the term cannot be carried to the length of covering all public uses, then is it to be carried to the extent of including funds dedicated for the promotion of colleges, schools, and educational endowments, and also for the promotion of religion? For that, I think, there is no warrant. I agree with your Lordship in holding that the term "charitable purposes only," used in a modern statute, in the absence of any other terms indicating that a wider meaning is intended, is to be taken in its ordinary sense as referring to funds given for the relief or pecuniary assistance of persons in poverty. I think it relates to funds dedicated to the relief of physical necessity or want,—to funds given as alms or as a provision for the relief of persons from physical privations or suffering arising from poverty, and that it goes no farther. It was maintained by the trustees that Mr Baird had in view assistance to the poor in reference to their religious necessities, for the evil which he avows it is his purpose to meet is "spiritual destitution." Even if the funds had been given entirely to overcome this evil in the case of the very poorest, the exemption claimed would not be within the provision of the statute. But further, a perusal of the deed shews, that while the religious benefit of the poor was one of the objects the truster meant to promote, the purpose he had in view really was to promote the extension of his own religious views among the rich as well as the poor—that he considered there was spiritual destitution to be met with in the one class as well as in the other—and that it was his purpose to remedy this by inducing all to agree in the particular creed which he has set forth at length in his deed.

The only other observation which I have to make is this, that I think there is much force in the argument presented to us on the terms used in the 11th section of the Statute 48 and 49 Vict. c. 51—the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1885—which renders liable to duty the income of incorporations at certain fixed periods. That statute provides an exemption in favour of "property which, or the income or profits whereof, shall be legally appropriated and applied for any purpose connected with any religious persuasion, or for any charitable purpose, or for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts." We find, therefore, that in a modern statute passed for the purpose of taxation, where an exemption is intended to be given with reference to funds which are used in connection with "any religious persuasion," that is specially provided in the statute, and that this provision is separate and distinct from what follows,—"any charitable purpose." There seems to me to be in that statute a clear distinction drawn between the two—the words are "any purpose connected with any religious persuasion or for any charitable purpose." The latter words alone would not have been sufficient to cover and include the former; and I draw the same distinction in the statute with which we are dealing, and hold that "any charitable purpose" will not cover "any religious purpose," as the trustees here contend that it does.

On these grounds, and concurring in all that your Lordship has said, I think that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

Lord Adam.—I concur in all your Lordships have said. It appears to me to be quite impossible to extend the term "charitable purposes" used in this Act so as to cover religious purposes, which is the nature of the expenditure here in question; and I have nothing to add.

No. 125.

June 1, 1888. Baird's Trustees v. Lord Advocate.

LORD MURE was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE—Agents.

No. 126.

June 1, 1888. Graeme's Trustee v. Giersberg.

FRANCIS MORE (Graeme's Trustee), Pursuer (Reclaimer).—H. Johnston. MRS AMELIA A. GRAEME OR GIERSBERG AND HUSBAND, Defenders (Respondents).—Sir Charles Pearson—Low.

Bankruptcy—Trustee—Tantum et Tale—Assignation.—By antenuptial marriage-contract a lady who, with her husband, was domiciled in Germany, conveyed her whole estate, including acquirenda, to trustees, of whom her brother was one, for behoof of herself and her children. She subsequently succeeded to a legacy, which was arrested ad fundandam jurisdictionem in the hands of the representative of the donor (to whom the marriage-contract trust had not been intimated), by the trustee on her brother's sequestrated estate, for a debt alleged to be due by her to the latter.

Held (diss. Lord Shand) that the arrestments were bad, as the trustee had no higher right than the bankrupt, who could not have benefited by his failure to intimate the marriage-contract trust to the testamentary trustee to the prejudice of the beneficiaries under the trust, whose interests it was his duty to protect.

Observations (per the Lord President and Lord Shand) on Lord Westbury's opinion in the case of Fleeming v. Howden, 6 Macph. (H. L.) 113.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kinnear. B.

CAPTAIN GIERSBERG AND MRS AMELIA ANNE GRAEME OR GIERSBERG were married in April 1874, and after their marriage were domiciled in Germany. By antenuptial marriage-contract Mrs Giersberg, with consent of her husband, assigned to certain trustees, of whom her brother, Patrick J. F. Graeme of Aberuthven, was one, "the whole estates, heritable and moveable, real and personal, wheresoever situated, now belonging to the said Amelia Ann Margaret Graeme, or which she shall conquest, acquire, succeed to, or become interested in during the subsistence of the said intended marriage." The purposes of the trust were to pay the annual income of the trust-estate to Mrs Giersberg exclusive of the jus mariti of her husband, and of the diligence of her creditors, as an alimentary provision. The fee of the estate was to be held for the children of the marriage, if there were any, and failing them, for Mrs Giersberg and her heirs and assignees.

Mr Graeme acted as a trustee.

Under the settlement of Mrs Oliphant of Gask, who died on 9th December 1886, Mrs Giersberg became entitled to a legacy of £4000.

In April 1887 the estates of Mr Graeme were sequestrated, and Mr Francis More, C.A., was appointed trustee. Immediately thereafter the trustee used arrestments in the hands of Mrs Oliphant's trustee, in respect of certain advances which he alleged had been made by Mr Graeme to his sister, and raised an action against Mrs Graeme and her husband, concluding for payment of £1509, 6s. 2d., being the amount of these alleged advances. These arrestments were used both to found jurisdiction and upon the dependence of the action.

The defenders, inter alia, stated that "the said legacy does not belong to Mrs Giersberg, cannot be available for payment of her debts, and cannot be arrested to the effect of founding jurisdiction against her, in respect that it falls under the conveyance by her to the trustees under her antenuptial contract of marriage, to be held and administered by them in terms thereof."

In answer the pursuer stated that at the date of the execution of the arrestments Mr and Mrs Giersberg's marriage-contract had not been intimated to Mrs Oliphant's trustee.

The defender pleaded, inter alia (1), No jurisdiction.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear), on 21st February 1888, sustained the defender's first plea, and dismissed the action.*

---

* "NOTE.—The question of jurisdiction depends upon the validity and effect of an arrestment by which the pursuer has endeavoured to attach a legacy bequeathed by Mrs Oliphant of Gask to the defender Mrs Giersberg, in the hands of Mrs Oliphant's trustees.

"By her antenuptial contract of marriage, the defender conveyed to trustees the whole estate then belonging to her, or which she should conquest, acquire, or succeed to during the subsistence of the marriage; and the purposes of the trust are to pay the annual income of the trust-estate to Mrs Giersberg exclusive of the jus mariti of her husband, and of the diligence of her creditors, as an alimentary provision, and to hold the fee for the children of the marriage. If the trust had been brought into operation, therefore, so as to affect the legacy in question, it is clear enough that it could not be attached by the diligence which the pursuer has used, on the allegation that as trustee on the sequestrated estate of Mr Patrick Graeme he is a creditor of Mrs Giersberg. But it is settled by the case of Tod v. Wilson (7 Macph. 1100), and Campbell's Trustees v. Whyte (11 R. 1078), that such an assignation in an antenuptial contract must, like any other, be completed by intimation, in order to exclude subsequent assignees for onerous causes or the diligence of creditors; and the assignation in question was not intimated to Mrs Oliphant's trustees before the date of the arrestments. The only question, therefore, is whether the trustee on Mr Graeme's sequestrated estate was in a position to use this diligence as coming in place of the bankrupt.

"The objection is that Mr Graeme was himself a trustee under the marriage-contract; and it appears to me to be well founded. It is not disputed that Mr Graeme had accepted the trust, and it follows that, assuming him to be a creditor of Mrs Giersberg, he could not attach for payment of his own debt funds which it was his duty to protect from the diligence of her creditors for the benefit of the children of the marriage. But the trustee takes the personal rights of the bankrupt subject to the conditions under which he himself held them; and if the bankrupt, supposing him to have recovered the fund in question, would have been bound to hold it for the purposes of his trust, it would appear to me to follow that his trustee cannot recover it for payment of a debt due to the bankrupt himself. It is said that the doctrine by which the trustee takes the bankrupt's rights exactly as they stood in him applies only to property actually vested in him so as to be carried by the vesting clauses of the Bankruptcy Act, and not to the property of his debtors, which the trustee may recover independently of him by the use of the diligence which is open to any creditor. But the trustee can have no right independently of the antecedent rights of the bankrupt. He has no title to sue the defenders in respect of their alleged debt to the bankrupt except by virtue of a personal right of action in the bankrupt, which carries with it as an incident the right to use diligence; and if the bankrupt's right of action would not enable him to attach the particular fund in question by the diligence of arrestment, the fund must be equally protected against the diligence of the trustee. The pursuer's argument is that the trustee in a sequestration may recover, for payment of debts due to the bankrupt, a fund which the bankrupt himself could not have recovered or applied to that purpose without a breach of trust. This appears to me to be inconsistent with the principle laid down by the House of Lords in Fleeming v. Howden, 6 Macph. (H. L.) 113. The fund lies open to the diligence of Mrs Giersberg's creditors by reason of the bankrupt's failure to perform his trust; and that is an omission

No. 126.
—
June 1, 1888.
Graeme's Trustee v. Giersberg.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The marriage-contract trust had not been intimated to Mrs Oliphant's trustee, and so the legacy fund which had been arrested had been attached by the diligence.[1] (2) It was no doubt true that as a general rule the trustee took an estate tantum et tale as it existed in the bankrupt. But to extend that doctrine to a case like the present would be a novelty. It was important to observe that the case arose in circumstances where the failure on the part of the bankrupt had taken place after the sequestration. The trustee in using such diligence as had been used here did not represent the bankrupt. The bar against the bankrupt did not affect the claim of debt, but merely the fund which was arrested. To exclude the trustee's diligence, the bar must not be personal to the bankrupt, but must be inherent in the title on which the claim was founded. The trustee had a right to use remedies which the bankrupt could not use. For instance, in the case of a loan heritably secured in the bankrupt's name without mention of a trust, the trustee took it over free of such conditions,—which were personal to the bankrupt.[2] Here there was a condition which did not attach to the property arrested. The Lord Ordinary had introduced an obligation or condition which was personal to the bankrupt as governing the right of the trustee to attach the property in question. His Lordship had extended the views of their Lordships in the House of Lords, and particularly of Lord Westbury in the case of Fleeming[3] too far in applying them to the circumstances of this case.

Argued for the respondent;—The cases which had been cited in support of the contention on the other side were all cases in which the public records were concerned,—such as dispositions ex facie absolute, with latent back-letters. In such questions relating to heritable property, the record was what ruled. It was on that principle that the case of Fleeming was decided in the Court of Session. It was held that the rights of parties as appearing on the record were not to be controlled by any latent personal obligation. But where the public records were not concerned any equity which was pleadable against the bankrupt was also pleadable against his trustee.[4] The maxim assignatus utitur jure auctoris clearly applied. The dicta of the House of Lords in the case of Fleeming were directly applicable. In the present case, the trustee was debarred from taking advantage of the neglect of the bankrupt to intimate the marriage-contract trust to Mrs Oliphant's trustee. The pursuer's right of action was therefore qualified by the terms of Mrs Giersberg's marriage-contract trust. It had been held in Challis' case[5] that a trustee was barred from taking advantage of the fraud of a bankrupt, and the principle of that case was applicable here.

---

from which neither he nor his trustee can, in my opinion, take benefit, to the prejudice of the beneficiaries whose interests it was his duty to secure."

[1] Tod's Trustees v. Wilson, July 20, 1879, 7 Macph. 1100, 41 Scot. Jur. 616; Campbell's Trustees v. Whyte, July 11, 1884, 11 R. 1078.

[2] Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 102; Bell's Comms. (7th edit.) I., 298, 301; Wylie v. Duncan, 1803, M. 10,269; Thomson v. Douglas, Heron, & Co., 1786, M. 10,299; Mansfield v. Inglis' Trustees, April 1835, 1 Shaw & Maclean's App. Cases, 203.

[3] Fleeming v. Howden, March 20, 1867, 5 Macph. 658, rev. July 16, 1868, 6 Macph. (H. L.) 113; cf. also Jeffrey v. Paul, May 15, 1835, 1 Shaw & Maclean's App. 767.

[4] Gordon v. Cheyne, Feb. 5, 1824, 2 S. 675; Redfearn v. Somervail, June 1, 1813, 1 Dow's Apps. 50, 5 Pat. Apps. 707; Scottish Widows' Fund v. Buist, July 14, 1876, 3 R. 1078.

[5] Molleson v. Challis, March 11, 1873, 11 Macph. 510, 45 Scot. Jur. 328.

No. 126.

June 1, 1888.
Graeme's Trustee v. Giersberg.

At advising,—

Lord President.—This action is raised by the pursuer as trustee on the sequestrated estates of Patrick James Frederick Graeme of Aberuthven. There is no doubt that if the debt in question is well founded the pursuer has a good title to sue. It is one of these claims for payment of debt which pass to the trustee in a sequestration. But the defender is not subject to the jurisdiction of this Court unless she has been made so by arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem. The question therefore is, whether these arrestments were well used and are effectual.

The debt sued for is for advances alleged to have been made by the bankrupt to his sister Mrs Giersberg from time to time, amounting now to £1509, 6s. 2d. The fund arrested is a legacy payable in terms of the settlement of Mrs Oliphant of Gask, to Mrs Giersberg.

By her antenuptial marriage-contract, executed long before the legacy in question fell due, Mrs Giersberg conveyed her whole estate, both present and which she might acquire, to trustees for behoof of herself in liferent, exclusive of the jus mariti of her husband, and of the diligence of her creditors, and for her children in fee. Now, it so happens that Mr Graeme was himself one of the trustees under the marriage-contract. If the marriage-contract had been intimated to Mrs Oliphant's trustee, the legacy would have been transferred by the conveyance therein contained to the trustees under the marriage-contract, and not to Mrs Giersberg. Unfortunately the marriage-contract was not intimated to Mrs Oliphant's trustee, as would have been necessary in order to make it effectual in a competition in ordinary circumstances. But then the Lord Ordinary says, and this is very important, that the bankrupt was himself to blame for the failure to intimate the marriage-contract to Mrs Oliphant's trustee. That opinion of the Lord Ordinary's cannot I think, as matter of fact, be disputed. The bankrupt was only one of several trustees, but the duty in question was incumbent upon all and each of the trustees. The view which the Lord Ordinary has taken of the arrestments in these circumstances is that they could not have been used by the bankrupt himself, as he was bound to hold the fund for the benefit of Mrs Giersberg and her children, i.e., for the purposes of the marriage-contract, and it would have been a breach of trust on his part to arrest it for a debt due to himself by Mrs Giersberg. That is also I think indisputable.

The question consequently upon which this case hinges is, whether the trustee in the sequestration, who comes in the place of the bankrupt, can do diligence though the bankrupt could not? The Lord Ordinary answers this question in the negative, and I must say that after giving every attention to the argument which has been presented for the reclaimer I think the Lord Ordinary is right. The position of the trustee in a sequestration does not seem to me to differ from that of any other assignee as regards a claim of this kind. The claim is of the nature of a nomen debiti,—an incorporeal moveable right which passes by assignation,—and therefore the trustee is in no better position than an onerous assignee. The principle laid down in the House of Lords in the case of Fleeming v. Howden goes far to support this view of the Lord Ordinary. I agree with the principle so laid down, and generally with the opinions expressed by their Lordships in the House of Lords in that case on this matter, but I should only like to say that I am not inclined to go so far as Lord Westbury does in describing the position of a trustee in a sequestration as being the same as that of "a gratuitous alienee." I should rather put it in this way—that a trustee in a sequestration is in no better position than an onerous assignee who has bought a debt. The meaning of the maxim assignatus utitur jure auctoris has been so often and so lately commented upon in opinions which I have had occasion to deliver, that it is hardly necessary for me to refer to it again. I need only refer to my opinion in the case of the Scottish Widows' Fund v. Buist, 3 R. 1078, as to the meaning of the maxim. I agree with the Lord Ordinary in the present case that, as the bankrupt could not have used the arrestments without being guilty of a breach of trust, neither can his trustee. If the bankrupt had used the arrestments he would have committed a breach of trust, and I do not think the trustee can do what would have constituted a breach of trust in the bankrupt. He would have had no right to use the arrestments or any diligence against the fund in question, which would have had the effect of defeating the purposes of the marriage-contract trust.

No. 126.
June 1, 1888.
Graeme's Trustee v. Giersberg.

LORD SHAND.—As my opinion in this case differs from that of your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary, I need not say that the question in dispute has had my best consideration. I have, however, been unable to change the opinion I formed in the course of the argument, and I think the judgment of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled, and the jurisdiction of the Court sustained, on the ground that the fund left by the late Mrs Oliphant to the defender Mrs Graeme or Giersberg has been attached by the pursuer's arrestments.

The pursuer, as trustee on the sequestrated estate of Mr Graeme, Mrs Giersberg's brother, has right to the whole of the estate, heritable and moveable, which belonged to the bankrupt on 7th April 1887. The act and warrant of confirmation of that date, in virtue of section 102 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856, transferred to the pursuer, and vested in him the whole moveable estate and effects of the bankrupt Mr Graeme. Part of this estate, as the pursuer alleges, was a debt of £1509 due by the defender Mrs Giersberg to her brother the bankrupt in respect of money lent. The defenders dispute the existence of the debt which is now sued for in this action; but in the present question as to the validity of the arrestment used to found jurisdiction against Mrs Giersberg, who lives abroad, the existence of the debt must be assumed; and at least it is enough that the claim is made for recovery of a debt alleged to be due by her.

Now, it is admitted that the pursuer has right to the debt or claim which the bankrupt had against his sister, the defender Mrs Giersberg. It is admitted that the testamentary trustee of the late Mrs Oliphant of Gask is in possession of a fund exceeding the debt now claimed, left by that lady to Mrs Giersberg as a legacy, payable in June 1887; and farther, it is not disputed that the fund in Mr Oliphant's hands was liable to be attached by arrestment used by Mrs Giersberg's creditors. It is true that by her antenuptial marriage-contract, entered into in 1874, Mrs Giersberg had assigned to the trustees therein named, of whom her brother, the bankrupt, was one, the whole estate which she might acquire during the subsistence of the marriage, but this assignation was never intimated to Mr Oliphant, Mrs Oliphant's sole trustee and executor, so as to transfer the fund as a vested right to the marriage-contract trustees, and consequently it remained subject to the diligence of arrestment at the instance of Mrs Giersberg's creditors on the principles fully explained and to which effect was given in the cases of Tod and Campbell, referred to in the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

The pursuer, as a creditor of Mrs Giersberg, has used arrestments in Mr Oliphant's hands to attach this fund, both to found jurisdiction against Mrs Giersberg, and also on the dependence of the action. But the Lord Ordinary has held that these arrestments are ineffectual. An arrestment at the instance of any other creditor of that lady would be effectual, for the fund was subject to her debts and deeds so long as the assignation contained in her marriage-contract was not intimated to the testamentary trustee. But it has been held by the Lord Ordinary that the pursuer is in this peculiar position, that although a creditor of Mrs Giersberg he cannot use an arrestment which would be effectual. In that view I find myself unable to concur.

The ground of the judgment I understand to be that because Mr Graeme, the bankrupt, could not have effectually arrested the fund, it follows that no more can the pursuer, as the trustee on his sequestrated estate, do so. It is said that Mr Graeme having been an accepting trustee—not by written acceptance but by his actings under the marriage-contract of his sister—was bound to intimate the assignation by Mrs Giersberg contained in that deed to the testamentary trustee of Mrs Oliphant, and that he could not be allowed in violation of this duty to arrest the fund for a debt due to himself; and it is further said that the same objection to use arrestment applies to the pursuer as trustee for Mr Graeme's creditors, because his rights have been derived from the bankrupt, and he cannot have greater rights than the bankrupt had.

Now, I agree in thinking that Mr Graeme could not have effectually attached the fund, but I do not agree in thinking that the same objection applies to the pursuer as trustee for his creditors, and the ground of my opinion may be shortly stated. It is this, that the reason why an arrestment by Mr Graeme would have been ineffectual is, that in his character as trustee under the marriage-contract it was his duty to intimate the assignation contained in that deed to Mrs Oliphant's trustee, and he would be barred from arresting the fund to secure a debt of his own in breach or violation of this duty or obligation as trustee. But this consideration, in my opinion, has no application to the pursuer, because there is no similar bar which can be effectually pleaded against him when he uses an arrestment. He has no trust duty arising out of the marriage-contract, and the fact that the bankrupt had and still has such a duty affecting him personally, which creates an obligation on his part to intimate the assignation, has no application to a trustee for his creditors using diligence to recover a debt, who has no such duty and no such obligation. It appears to me that, if the bankrupt has failed in a duty and obligation to the beneficiaries under the marriage-contract, this only raises a personal claim for any damage which has resulted and for which the parties injured must claim and rank in the sequestration in the ordinary way. These beneficiaries cannot, I think, on sound principles, protect the fund in Mrs Oliphant's trust from arrestment unless they can shew that the pursuer as trustee in bankruptcy had the same duty and obligation as the bankrupt, which clearly he had not. That trust was personal to Mr Graeme and the pursuer as trustee for his creditors was not even entitled in any way whatever to act in that trust.

The reasoning in favour of the judgment is rested on the supposed application of the principle assignatus utitur jure auctoris, and of the rule that a trustee in a sequestration takes the estate tantum et tale as it stood in the bankrupt. There are no rules or principles in our law in reference to the transfer of rights which I should more anxiously guard and preserve in full vigour and observance than these, because if they be violated, great injustice might often be done. But with great deference, I am humbly of opinion that these rules are here sought to be used in circumstances to which they have no just application. What did the pursuer take under his act and warrant of confirmation? Only the right to the debt due by Mrs Giersberg. That right was assigned or transferred to him by the Bankrupt Statute, and no doubt he could only take the right subject to any inherent qualification or condition affecting it in the bankrupt,—that is, subject to such conditions or qualifications as would limit its extent, or, it might be, define its character, shewing it to be a right of trust only. That is the full meaning and effect of the rules above mentioned. If the debt due by Mrs Giersberg had been due to the bankrupt as trustee for someone else, and his right had thus been qualified inherently by a trust, the trustee for his creditors could only take up the right tantum et tale, and so could not take right to the debt unaffected by the trust. This is the full result of the decisions and the dicta in the case of Fleeming v. Howden, including the dicta of Lord Westbury, in which I apprehend his Lordship was in error in saying that the right of a trustee in bankruptcy is that of a gratuitous alienee only, and also in the case of Campbell, 11 R. 1078. But here there was no inherent qualification limiting the right of the bankrupt to the debt due by his sister. His right was absolute, and that absolute right was transferred to the trustee for his creditors.

The right to raise action and do diligence for the recovery of debt is a legal incident of the right to the debt. It arises as a common law right in favour of all creditors against their debtors, and the pursuer in using the arrestment in question is availing himself of that right only. Having an unqualified right to the debt, why shall he be prevented from doing so? Because it is said the bankrupt could not have effectually used an arrestment. The answer to that argument—an answer which I humbly think sound—is this, that the objection to an arrestment by the bankrupt is personal—a personal bar, which applies to him individually, because of the duty or personal obligation which lay upon him to complete a title in the marriage-contract trustees to the fund by intimation; but although he has failed in his duty—and his failure might give rise to a claim of damages (which is by no means clear in this case, for the bankrupt has lived abroad ever since Mrs Oliphant's death)—yet (1) this obligation in no way affects or binds the trustee for his creditors, who is not bound to fulfil personal obligations by the bankrupt—least of all obligations arising out of the bankrupt's holding the office of a trustee; and (2) that the duty and obligation which affected and affect the bankrupt were not in any sense inherent qualifications of the right which the trustee in the sequestration acquired under the Bankrupt Statute. So there is nothing to deprive him of the ordinary remedy of a creditor for recovery of his debt. The right to the debt being absolute, an objection as to the remedy for recovery of it applying to the bankrupt and arising out of a trust he held, is, in my opinion, merely personal to him, and not an inherent qualification of the right transferred to the trustee. A personal obligation by a bankrupt under a contract of sale or otherwise to transfer an heritable property, though binding on him, does not affect the trustee in his sequestration, except as giving rise to a claim of damages, because it forms no inherent qualification of his right, and the same observation applies with even greater force in the case of such an obligation as attached to Mr Graeme as a trustee under the marriage-contract. Indeed it must be observed that such an obligation was independent of and altogether unconnected with the bankrupt's right to the debt

No. 126.

June 1, 1888.
Graeme's Trustee v. Giersberg.

due to him. It arose out of a relation having no connection with the relation of debtor and creditor, and could not therefore, in my opinion, affect or limit the power of an assignee for creditors acquiring right to the debt to sue and use diligence against Mrs Giersberg like any of her other creditors.

On these grounds I am of opinion that the arrestments were effectual, and that the plea of no jurisdiction should be repelled.

Lord Adam.—Mrs Giersberg is said to be indebted to Mr Graeme in the sum sued for, and his trustee has used arrestments in the hands of Mrs Oliphant's trustee for all sums due to Mr Graeme. The sum arrested is a legacy bequeathed to Mrs Giersberg by Mrs Oliphant of Gask, which is assigned under Mrs Giersberg's marriage-contract to her marriage-contract trustees. If followed out by a furthcoming that is the sum out of which payment would be recovered. It appears to me that the trustee as in right of Mr Graeme is not entitled to recover anything which Mrs Oliphant's trustee could not lawfully have paid to Mr Graeme, or which Mr Graeme could not have recovered from him. It is not disputed that Mr Graeme could not have recovered this sum, for the reason that his person was charged with a trust for the marriage-contract purposes, and it would have constituted a breach of trust in him to use arrestments in these circumstances. The trustee's title is rested solely and entirely on Mr Graeme, and can go no further. Consequently I have no difficulty in agreeing with your Lordship in the chair, and with the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Mure was absent.

The Court adhered.

Mylne & Campbell, W.S.—Murray & Falconer, W.S.—Agents.

No. 127.

June 1, 1888.
Heddle's Executrix v. Marwick & Hourston's Trustee.

Mrs J. F. B. Sinclair or Heddle (Heddle's Executrix), Appellant.—(Respondent).—Asher—Strachan.

Thomas M'Laren (Marwick & Hourston's Trustee), Respondent (Reclaimer).—Gloag—C. N. Johnston.

Partnership—Liability of assumed partner for debts incurred prior to assumption—Presumption.—When the whole estate of a going concern is taken over by a new partnership, the new partners contributing no capital, and the business being continued on the ~~same footing as before, the~~ presumption is that the liabilities are taken over with the stock, and that the new partnership undertakes liability for all the trade debts previously contracted.

The manager of a long-established business was taken, without a written contract, into a new copartnery, which continued the old business and took over the stock in trade. He contributed no capital, and the arrangement was that he was to be paid a certain salary and to have a share of the profits. On the bankruptcy of the firm, held that a creditor of the old firm was entitled to rank in the sequestration.

Observations (per the Lord President) upon the case of Nelmes v. Montgomery, June 15, 1883, 10 R. 574.

1st Division.
Lord Trayner.
M.

James Marwick, ironmonger, Kirkwall, died there in March 1873, intestate, and survived by his widow and five pupil children. He had established a large business as an ironmonger and general merchant, which it was arranged after his death that his widow should continue for the benefit of the family, Mr Peter S. Heddle, solicitor and banker, and Mr Irvine, also a banker, both in Kirkwall, undertaking to advise with her in the conduct of it, and to provide such pecuniary assistance as might be necessary for carrying it on.

In July 1878 Mrs Marwick took into partnership with her Mr William Hourston, who had been manager of the business for more than a year previously, the name of the new firm being Marwick & Hourston. No written contract of copartnery was entered into between them.

The firm carried on the business till 16th August 1886, when its estates and those of the individual partners were sequestrated, and Mr Thomas M'Laren, S.S.C., was appointed trustee.

Mr Heddle had died on 23d September 1884, and his widow as his executrix now claimed to be ranked in the sequestration of the firm (1) for £214, 5s., being advances made by her husband and herself to the firm from 1878 to 1886, and (2) for £4402, 13s. 7d., with interest, amounting in toto to £6642, 13s. 8d., being advances made by her husband to Mrs Marwick prior to 1878, under deduction of a contra account due by her to the firm of £1845, 6s. 0½d., thus leaving £5011, 12s. 7½d.

The trustee admitted the claim for £214, 5s., but rejected it quoad ultra so far as regarded the firm, admitting it, or the greater part of it, on the individual estate of Mrs Marwick only.

Mr Heddle's executrix appealed to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, her contention being that she was entitled to rank in the firm's sequestration for the second of the two sums above mentioned.

A record was afterwards made up, in which the appellant stated that from the date of Mr Marwick's death (when there was a large amount of debt due to creditors), down to the formation of the partnership in 1878, the financial part of Mrs Marwick's business was conducted by Mr Heddle; that he advanced money for her and signed trade-bills with her, the whole drawings being paid to him by the managers of the business; that the new firm when constituted in 1878 took over the whole stock in trade, assets, and goodwill of the business, and also its debts and liabilities; that neither of the partners put any money into it, the capital consisting entirely of the stock in trade and other assets; that at that date there was a large balance due to Mr Heddle on his advances, and that the existence of that debt was well known to both the partners, as appeared also from a trial balance-sheet which was prepared when the copartnery was entered into; that while these advances had been made by Mr Heddle goods and furnishings had been supplied to him by Mrs Marwick, payment for which had never been demanded, although the account was rendered in 1884, the understanding being that Mr Heddle's debt should be gradually wiped out in that way.

The trustee stated in answer that the debt in question, the existence of which was unknown either to Mrs Marwick or to Mr Hourston, was not taken over by the firm.

The appellant pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The bankrupts having taken over the assets and liabilities of the business which had been carried on by Mrs ~~Marwick,~~ including the ~~debt due to Mr~~ Heddle, the appellant is entitled to be ranked on their estates for the amount of the said debt, with interest, in terms of her claim.

The respondent pleaded;—(3) The firm of Marwick & Hourston having incurred no liability for the debt in question, and it not being a debt incurred by the said firm in the course of its business, the judgment appealed against is well founded, and ought to be sustained, with expenses.

A proof was led, the result of which sufficiently appears from the note to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and from the opinions of the Judges.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 5th November 1887, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the deliverance by the respondent appealed against:

No. 127.

June 1, 1888.
Heddle's Executrix v. Marwick & Hourston's Trustee.

Directs the respondent to rank the appellant as a creditor on the sequestrated estates of Marwick & Hourston for the debt claimed, when that debt has been constituted, or otherwise properly vouched: Finds the appellant entitled to one-half of the expenses of process, as the same may be taxed, down to the date of closing the record: Remits," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—The appellant claims to be ranked as a creditor on the sequestrated estates of Marwick & Hourston (on which the respondent is trustee) for the sums of £214, 5s. and £6642, 13s. 8d. respectively. The respondent has admitted the appellant's claim to rank for the first of these sums; but as regards the second, he has refused the appellant's claim to rank on the estates of the firm, but has admitted the claim to rank on the estates of Mrs Marwick, an individual partner thereof, subject to the condition 'that the cash accounts are properly vouched, and that the business accounts will be taxed by the auditor.' Against the latter part of this deliverance the present appeal is brought, the appellant contending that she is entitled to be ranked on the firm's estate (and not merely on Mrs Marwick's) for the full amount of the debt claimed.

"From the proof which has been led before me, it appears that, prior to 28th March 1873, the late James Marwick (who died of that date) carried on business as an ironmonger and general merchant in Kirkwall; that, from that date till July 1878, the business was continued by Mrs Marwick (who was her husband's executrix) for behoof of herself and her family; that in February 1877 Mr Hourston entered the employment of Mrs Marwick as manager of said business at a salary of £80 per annum; and that in July 1878 he became a partner in the business along with Mrs Marwick. No contract of copartnery was ever executed between Mrs Marwick and Mr Hourston, but it is stated that the latter was to get a third of the profits of the business. It is not clear on the evidence whether a proper balance-sheet shewing the condition of the business was prepared at the time when Mr Hourston joined the business as a partner; but from his acquaintance with the business as manager Mr Hourston had at least some knowledge of how the affairs of the business stood. When the partnership of Marwick & Hourston was formed, that firm continued the same business which had formerly been carried on by Mr Marwick and continued by his widow. The whole stock and assets of the old firm were handed over to, and traded with, and used by the new firm as the stock and assets of the latter. No new set of business books were opened, the old ones were continued. The only change which took place was, that a bank account was opened in the name of the new firm—the bank account for the business carried on by Mrs Marwick for some time prior to July 1878 having been kept in name of the late Mr Heddle, who was in effect the cashier and financial manager for Mrs Marwick. Farther, the whole debts due by the old firm (except the debt due to the late Mr Heddle) were paid by the new firm of Marwick & Hourston from the proceeds of their business; and the whole debts due to the old firm were collected and discharged by the new firm.

"The debt claimed by the appellant (so far as claim of debt may be established by her) was incurred to the late Mr Heddle in connection with and for behoof of the old firm. For several years he acted not only as the law-agent of Mrs Marwick, but also as financial manager and cashier of the business she was carrying on. I think there is no doubt that Mr Heddle made advances on behalf of Mrs Marwick's business, without which that business could not have been carried on.

"In this state of the facts I do not think the law is doubtful. It appears to me that the present case is not distinguishable in any essential particular from the cases of Millar (23 D. 359) and M'Keand (23 D. 846). In the latter case it was laid down by the Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglis) 'that when parties take up a going business in that way, and take the stock, they must also take the liabilities,' and that in effect was the judgment pronounced.

"The respondent sought to distinguish between this and the cited cases in three respects—(1) that Hourston paid in capital to the new firm; (2) that he did not know at the date when he became a partner that any debt was due by

No. 127.

June 1, 1888.

Heddle's Executrix v. Marwick & Hourston's Trustee.

On 7th December 1887, the Court remitted to Mr Molleson, C.A., to examine the accounts in dispute and report, and on 6th March 1888 he

---

the old firm to Mr Heddle; and (3) that whenever he became aware of the present claim he at once repudiated liability therefor. Each of these points deserves consideration. 1. Capital.—In his examination in the sequestration Mr Hourston stated that under his contract of copartnery he was to subscribe one-third of the capital. He certainly never did that. In his evidence in this case he says he paid into the capital of the business three sums, viz., on 22d February 1877, £46; on 18th February 1878, £20; and on 2d October 1882, £113. The first and second of these sums, it will be observed, were paid before the partnership commenced. Mr Hourston explains that these sums were due to him by Mrs Marwick, and that he allowed them to lie in the business as part of his capital. Assuming that statement to be true, it would only shew that Hourston had paid £66 towards purchase of one-third of the business, its stock and assets—an altogether inadequate price. The third sum (£113) is said to have been paid in on 2d October 1882. I am not satisfied that that sum was ever paid. There is no voucher for it, except an entry in the firm's books in the handwriting of Mr Hourston. The entry is written on an erasure, of which Mr Hourston can give no explanation, and the entry is not posted in the ledger. In my opinion it is not proved that Mr Hourston paid anything whatever towards the capital of the new firm. I have already stated what I think of the alleged payment of £113, and with regard to the other two small payments, I think they were, at the best, debts by Mrs Marwick to Mr Hourston, which may or may not have been imputed to capital some time after the partnership was formed. I incline to the view that the idea of imputing them towards payment of capital is quite a recent idea. But even taking them as payments towards capital, they are so trifling as to make no real difference between the present case and the cases I have referred to. 2. Ignorance of the debt.—It may be the fact that Mr Hourston did not know the amount of the debt due to Mr Heddle by the old firm, or that there was any debt due to him at all; but if Mr Hourston became a partner of the new firm under such circumstances as imposed a liability on it for the debts of the old firm, I fear his ignorance affords him no exemption from liability. He should have made sure of the extent of his liability before he became a partner. He knew quite enough, however, to put him on his inquiry—for he knew that while he was manager (from February 1877 to July 1878) Mr Heddle was financing the business; receiving all its drawings and paying all its accounts. I am bound to add that I am not satisfied that Mr Hourston was as ignorant of the debt due to Mr Heddle as he now represents himself to have been.

"3. Repudiation of the claim.—On this subject there is some conflicting evidence. It is said, on the one hand, that when the account now claimed for was rendered, Mr Hourston, along with Mrs Marwick and her son, did not dispute liability therefor, but, on the contrary, agreed that the account should be settled by the new firm continuing to supply goods to the representatives of Mr Heddle, to the extent of about £200 per annum, until the account was settled. The agreement is denied by Mr Hourston, Mrs Marwick, and her son, who say they never heard of such a proposal. If there was no evidence in the case on this branch of it, except the parole testimony, I should be placed in considerable difficulty; for not one of the witnesses on one side or the other (except the accountants, Garioch, Magnus Marwick, & Hewison), impressed me as being worthy of much confidence. There was, on the part of them all (except those I have specially named), such a want of recollection as to matters which they could not reasonably be supposed to have forgotten, and such pretended ignorance regarding things which they should have known according to all reasonable probability, that I formed the impression above stated. There is, however, a piece of real evidence which I think conclusive on the subject. In May 1886, after the account now in question had been rendered, Mr Hourston, as representing his firm, consulted Mr Thomson, solicitor, Kirkwall, with regard to the condition of his firm's affairs. What it was that immediately led to Mr Hour-

No. 127.
—
June 1, 1888.
Heddle's Executrix v. Marwick & Hourston's Trustee.

reported that the parties had agreed that the balance due to Mr Heddle was £3820, 3s. 9d.

---

ston consulting Mr Thomson, is not of much moment; the result of the consultation is of more importance. It resulted in Marwick & Hourston executing a trust-deed in favour of Mr Thomson for behoof of their creditors. Mr Thomson intimated that this had been done by a circular issued by him to the creditors of Marwick & Hourston, of which No. 69 of process is a copy. The circular, which had an 'approximate state of affairs' appended to it, stated that 'the annexed state of affairs shews the assets and liabilities of the firm, and brings out the former as shewing 10s. 4d. in the £'; that the firm solicited 'an arrangement on the basis of the state of affairs,' and added, 'if this arrangement, or a settlement of say 10s. 6d. in the £ be carried through, the firm will be enabled to continue its extensive business with benefit to all.' Turning to the state of affairs, I find that the debt now claimed by Mrs Heddle is entered among the liabilities of the firm. It is suggested now that that debt was entered in the state of affairs, not as a debt which the firm was bound to pay, but merely as an intimation to the other creditors that such a debt was claimed. I regard that suggestion as quite without foundation; it is distinctly negatived by the state of affairs. For it will be observed that it is by including the debt in question that the estate is shewn to yield only 10s. 4d. per £, and it is on the representation that that debt is the debt of the firm that a settlement is 'solicited' on a composition of 10s. 6d. per £. So far, therefore, from the debt in question being inserted in the state of affairs as an intimation merely that it was claimed (as distinguished from its being an admitted debt), the other creditors are solicited to make an arrangement on the footing that that debt has to be provided for by the firm, just as and no less than its other obligations. Indeed, on any other view, the circular and state of affairs were absurd. Exclude the debt in question, and the firm was solvent; its liabilities only amounting to £3496, 14s. 10d., and its assets to £4173. In such circumstances a trust-deed was unnecessary, and certainly, in such circumstances, the other creditors were not likely to yield to the solicitation for a settlement on a composition of 10s. 6d. per £.

"It is farther said by Mr Thomson, the local law-agent of the firm (who is the author of the suggestion I have been dealing with), that neither Mr Hourston nor Mrs Marwick ever saw or authorised the circular and state of affairs, and Mr Hourston and Mrs Marwick say the same thing. I cannot accept these statements as correct; they are contradicted by the contemporaneous entry in Mr Thomson's account, and Mr Thomson rather departs from his statement when pressed on examination (proof, p. 108).

"I come to the conclusion on this part of the case that the firm of Marwick & Hourston distinctly adopted the debt in question, and recognised their liability for payment thereof.

"The appellant has thus, in my opinion, failed in each and all of these three particulars to distinguish this case from the others above cited.

"I was referred to the case of Nelmes, 10 R. 974, in which, no doubt, an opinion was expressed opposed to some of the views expressed in M'Keand's case. But that case was decided upon grounds which leave the authority of M'Keand's case unaffected. I am of opinion that the firm of Marwick & Hourston are liable for the debt in question, not only because, being a debt of the old firm, they took it over as an obligation when they took over the old firm's business and assets, but also because they distinctly adopted it as their debt, and represented to their other creditors that it was so.

"Although I have arrived at the conclusion that the debt due to the late Mr Heddle is a debt against the firm of Marwick & Hourston, yet I am not in a position to order the respondent (as prayed for in the appeal) to rank the appellant on the firm's estate as a creditor to the extent claimed. The respondent has, I think, very prudently only admitted the ranking on the estate, even of Mrs Marwick, subject to the claim being properly vouched. That has still to be done.

"It appears from the deliverance appealed against that the respondent had

No. 127.

June 1, 1888.
Heddle's Executrix v. Marwick & Hourston's Trustee.

Marwick & Hourston's trustee reclaimed, and argued;—I. On the facts. —Hourston only came to know of the debt in question in 1886. It was Heddle's duty to have disclosed it when the new copartnery was formed in 1878, and if Hourston was then induced by Heddle to enter the business under false representations, he was relieved of liability. Further, there was no ascertainable debt in 1877,—which was another argument against its having been taken over. II. On the law.—The cases of Millar[1] and M'Keand[2] were different, because in both the existence of the debts in question was disclosed at the date of the formation of the new copartnery. Besides, here the amount and character of the debt made the case a very exceptional one. The case of Nelmes[3] was in point,—particularly Lord Young's opinion there. In the absence of express contract, it was necessary to prove facts and circumstances shewing that the new partner had agreed to take over the debt in question.

Argued for Heddle's executrix;—I. On the facts.—It was not proved that Hourston had put any capital into the new business. Upon the evidence, it was clear that the new firm had taken over the assets of the old firm, and had paid many of their trade debts, and indeed had paid a portion of Heddle's debt, because they had paid Mrs Marwick's acceptance for a debt for which Heddle was liable to the bank. Hourston's evidence was unreliable,—and having been manager of the business for some time before he became partner, he could not but have known of the existence of the liability. II. On the law.—It was admitted that when a partner was assumed who contributed no capital, and the new firm took over the assets of the existing firm, the presumption was that the new firm became responsible for the debts of the old. The principle was stated in the opinion of the Lord President (then Lord Justice-Clerk) in Millar's case.[1] It would be a most inequitable result if a partnership by assuming a clerk as partner could thereby exclude all their old trade creditors. There was, no doubt, a slight difference between the Scottish and English law on the matter,—because according to the latter the question was whether the new partner had made himself responsible to the former creditors, which he could not do without novation.[4] But here the general question did not arise, because the new firm had not only taken over the assets of the old, but had paid part of their debts,—and no distinction could be shewn between these; knowledge of the special debt and of its amount was not required.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The question in this case is whether Mrs Heddle, as executrix called on the appellant to produce evidence of the claim now made being a debt due by the firm, and that in answer to that call certain documents were produced. I cannot say that these productions were such that the respondent should at once, in respect of them, have admitted the claim; and therefore, although he has been unsuccessful on the question principally argued before me, I cannot hold him entirely accountable for the present litigation. I therefore find him liable to the appellant in one half of the expenses of this appeal down to the date of proof being allowed; and I mark my dissatisfaction with the evidence adduced on both sides by finding no expenses due to either party since that date."

---

[1] Millar v. Thorburn, Jan. 22, 1861, 23 D. 359, 33 Scot. Jur. 180.

[2] M'Keand v. Laird, March 30, 1861, 23 D. 846.

[3] Nelmes v. Montgomery, June 15, 1883, 10 R. 974; cf. also Guthrie's Bell's Principles, 371; Lindley on Partnership, 392.

[4] Rolfe and Others v. Flower, Salting, & Co., Feb. 1, 1866, L. R., 1 P. C. App. 27.

No. 127.

June 1, 1888.
Heddle's Executrix v. Marwick & Hourston's Trustee.

of her husband the late Mr Heddle, is entitled to be ranked on the sequestrated estate of Messrs Marwick & Hourston for a sum now ascertained to amount to £3820, 3s. 9d. This sum consists of a sum of £2347, 7s. 5d. of principal due by Mrs Marwick as at 17th July 1878, when the firm of Marwick & Hourston was formed, and a sum of £1472, 16s. 4d. of interest to the 16th August 1886, when that firm was sequestrated. It is not disputed that Mrs Heddle is entitled to be ranked on the individual estate of Mrs Marwick, one of the partners of the firm, for the sum in question.

The facts on which the question depends would appear to be these:

Mrs Marwick's husband, the late James Marwick, had carried on a very considerable business in Kirkwall as an ironmonger and general merchant down to the date of his death on 28th March 1873. He left a widow, Mrs Marwick, and five young children. Mrs Marwick was decerned as his executrix. Mr Marwick died, if not insolvent, at least with no means to enable his widow to carry on the business, which apparently was the only resource she had to look to for the support of herself and her children. In these circumstances, Mr Heddle, who had been her husband's law-agent, and a friend of the family, came to her assistance and undertook to find the funds necessary to enable her to carry on the business. She carried it on by means of managers, who attended to the business in the shop, until 17th July 1878, when she took Mr Hourston into partnership. It appears that during this time the whole drawings of the shop, with the exception of some small payments, were paid over daily to Mr Heddle, who, on the other hand, paid the accounts for goods purchased for the business. While thus financing the business, Mr Heddle, on 7th April 1873, opened an account with the Union Bank in name of Marwick's representatives. This account was closed on 19th May 1873, and the balance carried over to a new account, which he opened in his name as trustee for Mrs Marwick. This account ceased to be operated on in April 1875, but various payments continued to be made in reduction of the balance due to the bank, and it was closed on 2d October 1875, when the balance due was £639, 19s. For this sum Mr Heddle drew a bill on Mrs Marwick, which she accepted, and the bill was discounted with the bank. Payments to account of this bill were made from time to time down to the date of the copartnery, and bills granted for the balance. At that date the amount of the bill current was £436, 16s. 10d. This bill was retired by Mr Heddle paying £25 to account and drawing a new bill with interest added for £418, 15s. 7d., which was accepted by Mrs Marwick. Payments were made from time to time to account of this bill, and renewals granted for the balance, which was ultimately paid. It is material to observe that all these payments were made by the firm out of the drawings of the business by cheques on their bank account.

When the account with the Union Bank ceased to be operated on in April 1875, Mr Heddle did not open an account in connection with the business with any other bank. He acted as banker, and intromitted with the funds through his own account, crediting the business with the cash received from the shop, and debiting it with the payments made by him for goods purchased, with the result that there is an admitted balance due by Mrs Marwick of £4053, 16s. 3d., but from this there is deducted a contra account due by Mr Heddle of £1706, 8s. 10d., leaving a balance of principal, as before stated, of £2347, 7s. 5d. due as at the date of the copartnership.

I do not think it can be disputed that this was a proper trade debt of the business. Mr Heddle's advances were made in connection with and for behoof of the business from the beginning, and without them it could not have been carried on.

No. 127.

June 1, 1888.
Heddle's Executrix v. Marwick & Hourston's Trustee.

In February 1877 an arrangement was entered into with Mr Hourston, by which he entered Mrs Marwick's employment as manager of the business. He was to receive a salary of £80 per annum, and an interest in the business in proportion to the capital he might be inclined to put into it from time to time up to a third of the profits. He continued in this employment until July 1878, when he was taken into partnership by Mrs Marwick.

There was no written contract of partnership between them. It is difficult to discover what the terms of the arrangement were. Mr Hourston says that beside the salary which he was drawing he was to receive one-third of the profits. If this be so, the inference is that he was to pay for one-third of the assets, if any. Mrs Marwick says nothing about the terms of the copartnery. Mr Hourston further says that there was a balance-sheet prepared under the supervision of Mr Heddle with a view to the partnership which shewed the debts and liabilities which were to be taken over by the firm, and that this did not include Mr Heddle's claim. This alleged balance-sheet shews a surplus of assets of upwards of £1700. Mrs Heddle denies that any such balance-sheet was prepared prior to the formation of the partnership, and I am of opinion that it is not proved that any such balance-sheet was ever prepared and exhibited to Mr Hourston.

On the other hand, Mrs Heddle avers that a trial balance-sheet was prepared as at 16th July 1878 when the copartnery was entered into, and that in this balance-sheet the debt due to Mr Heddle was stated as amounting to £3468, 6s.; that this balance-sheet was prepared in order to shew the state of affairs at the date of copartnery, and that its contents were perfectly well known to the partners. According to this balance-sheet the liabilities of the firm, including the debt due to Mr Heddle, exceeded the assets by £1339, 6s. 2¼d.

I have no doubt that this balance-sheet was prepared as stated. But Mrs Marwick and Mr Hourston deny that they ever saw it, or were aware of its contents. However that may be, I do not think that it is proved that it was exhibited to them. But I agree with the Lord Ordinary that, looking to Mr Hourston's previous acquaintance with the business as manager, and the way in which it was worked, he could not well have been ignorant that there was an outstanding account between Mr Heddle and the business—although he might not have been aware how the balance stood, or what it was,—and that ought to have led him to inquire how matters stood. Mr Hourston says that if he had seen this balance-sheet he never would have entered into the partnership and undertaken liability for such a debt. I do not think, however, that in his circumstances, having, so far as appears, no means of his own, that was a consideration likely to weigh much with him.

Mr Hourston farther says that he put some money into the concern at the time of the partnership. The sums he refers to are a sum of £46, which he had paid in on 22d February 1877, and another sum of £20 on 18th February 1878. Undoubtedly he had these sums at his credit before the partnership was entered into and he allowed them to remain. He further says that on 2d October 1882 he made a payment to capital of £113. On the grounds stated by the Lord Ordinary, and which I need not repeat, I am clearly of opinion that it is not proved that he paid this sum.

No. 127.

June 1, 1888.
Heddle's Executrix v. Marwick & Hourston's Trustee.

In this state of matters, it is material to see how the new firm was carried on. It appears to me that the only change which was made in the business was that the firm opened a bank account in their own name, on which they operated, in place of the former system, under which the drawings were paid to Mr Heddle and the accounts paid by him. In all other respects the business just went on as before. Mr Hourston drew his salary as before. He says,—"When the partnership was entered into we did not begin a new set of books, we just continued the old. So far as I know the business was carried on just as before. There was no change made in the stock, except what would be made from time to time as the demands of the business required. Marwick & Hourston paid the debts which had been incurred by the business before the date of the copartnery. All the trade debts which had been incurred by Mrs Marwick were paid by the new firm. Marwick & Hourston also uplifted monies due to the business as carried on by Mrs Marwick. The new firm collected all the monies due to Mrs Marwick and paid all the trade debts due by her."

The firm continued to carry on business until the beginning of May 1886, when they got into pecuniary difficulties in consequence of the bank refusing to make further advances, their account being largely overdrawn. This led to the execution of a trust-deed for behoof of their creditors. Mr Thomson, the agent whom they had consulted, intimated this fact to the creditors by a circular, which had an "approximate state of affairs" appended to it, stating that "the annexed state of affairs shews the assets and liabilities of the firm, and brings out the former as shewing 10s. 4d. in the pound," and that the firm solicited an arrangement on the basis of the state of affairs, and added, "if this arrangement, or a settlement say of 10s. 4d. in the pound, be carried through, the firm will be enabled to carry on its extensive business with benefit to all."

The debt now claimed by Mrs Heddle is entered in the state of affairs as a liability of the firm. The Lord Ordinary, for the reasons stated by him, in which I entirely concur, and to which I can add nothing, regards this as distinct evidence of the liability of the firm for the debt claimed. I also concur with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the circular and state of affairs were seen and authorised by both partners.

There is only one other matter of fact to which I think it necessary to refer. It appears that the firm had an account against Mr Heddle for furnishings, extending over the whole period from 1873 till his death in 1884. The amount due by him at the date of the partnership was £682, 12s. 3d., and at his death £1706, 8s. 2d., and this sum has been deducted from the amount of Mr Heddle's claim now proposed to be ranked. It appears that notwithstanding the pecuniary difficulties of the firm, payment of this account was never asked, or the account rendered, during Mr Heddle's life. It is difficult to account for this otherwise than because the firm was aware of the large counter claim which he had against them.

These being the facts of the case, the question is whether the firm of Marwick & Hourston is in law liable for this debt.

I do not suppose that anyone will contend that when a new firm is constituted by a person becoming a partner in an existing business, whether carried on by an individual or a firm, the new firm becomes liable for the debt of the old business. Neither do I think that the mere fact of the new firm taking over the whole assets of the old business will per se render the new firm liable for the debts of the old business. I think in all cases it is a question of circumstances, and that it must be established by presumption, or by proof of facts and circumstances, that the new firm agreed to adopt the old debts and to become liable for them. The Lord Ordinary refers to the cases of Millar (23 D. 359) and M'Keand (23 D. 846) as ruling the present case, which he thinks is not distinguishable from them in any essential particular; and he quotes from your Lordship's judgment in the latter case the opinion that "when parties take up a going business in that way and take the stock, they must also take the liabilities." We must therefore see what the "that way" was to which your Lordship refers, and the facts on which your Lordship and the Court proceeded in that case are thus summarised by your Lordship (23 D. 853). "Now, what was the true nature of the transaction? That comes to be the next question. It was just this, that Mr Laird being in business as a trader, and having apparently a pretty extensive business —whether it was a profitable one or not—thought it desirable, either after consulting with the appellants, or upon their suggestion—it does not appear very clearly which,—but at all events with their knowledge as his principal creditors, he thought it desirable to give his two shopmen a small interest in the business for the purpose of stimulating their zeal and energy in the promotion of the interests of his concern—not a very uncommon arrangement certainly in businesses of this kind; I might almost say a matter of everyday occurrence in such trades. But was it ever heard before that when a transaction was entered into, the beginning and end and whole meaning and distinctive character of which amounted to this, that the two shopmen were to have each one eighth share in the business as part of their remuneration for their services, that that constitutes a new company to the effect of handing over to the new firm the whole stock of the individual trader, and depriving the prior trade creditors of that individual trader of all recourse against his stock and property?" This case was before seven Judges, four of whom concurred with your Lordship. As I read the case, however, the two dissentient Judges—Lords Colonsay and Curriehill— did not differ as to the law, but only as to facts. The former says—"If I could have, along with your Lordships, thrown aside the contract of copartnery, and have treated this as a case in which two persons were admitted into a share of a going business without any contract of copartnery, I should not have had much difficulty in concurring with your Lordships."

No. 127.

June 1, 1888.
Heddle's Executrix v. Marwick & Hourston's Trustee.

X

X

The interlocutor of the Court set forth the following findings in fact,—"1st, that the debt in dispute was originally incurred in connection with the drapery business carried on in Paisley, which was afterwards transferred to and carried on by the bankrupt under the name or firm of Robert Laird. 2d, That upon entering into the contract produced, of date 5th April 1850, the bankrupts obtained possession of the whole stock in trade which had been previously acquired for and used in the said business, then belonging to the said Robert Laird as an individual, and which greatly exceeded in value the capital of £600 mentioned in the said contract. 3d, That the bankrupts William Thomson and William Smith were neither of them possessed of any individual means and estate, and neither of them contributed anything to the stock or capital used in the said business, or to the funds comprehended under the sequestration of the bankrupts as a company trading under the foresaid firm. 4th, That the debt now in dispute was assumed, taken over, and all along dealt with by the bankrupts trading under the said name or firm as a debt of the said firm or company."

Now, in this case, as in that, the bankrupts in July 1878, on entering into

No. 127.

June 1, 1888.
Heddle's Executrix v. Marwick & Hourston's Trustee.

the copartnery, obtained possession of the whole stock in trade which then belonged to Mrs Marwick as an individual. The bankrupt Mr Hourston was not possessed of any individual means and estate, and contributed practically nothing to the stock or capital used in the business, or to the funds comprehended under the sequestration of the firm, and I think that the facts clearly shew that the debt now in dispute was assumed, taken over, and all along dealt with as a debt of the firm.

I have referred to the case of M'Keand at some length, because I think it is a most authoritative judgment, and clearly applies to this case.

That case was followed by the case of Millar, reported before but decided after that of M'Keand. In that case your Lordship said this (23 D. 362),—"As a matter of general principle it seems absurd to hold that a person in trade by taking his son into partnership can do anything to injure the rights of his trade creditors; and the way in which the law interpones in such a case to prevent injustice is by holding that where a new firm takes over the whole stock and business of a going concern it is held also to take over the whole liabilities. In short, the business being taken over and not wound up, the business and its liabilities must be held to go together. That is matter of general principle which was established by the cases of M'Keand and Ridgeway (10 S. 105), and I see nothing to take this case out of it." Lord Cowan says (23 D. 362),—"I concur in the principle given effect to in the cases of Ridgeway and M'Keand that in the general case, where the whole estate of a company is given over to and taken possession of by a new concern or partnership, the business being continued on the same footing, the estate goes to the new company suo onere—that is, the liabilities go along with the effects. To sustain any other principle might result in the greatest injustice. This is the general presumption, although there may be special circumstances in particular cases not admitting of its application. In this case there are no such specialities. Of course private debts are not in the same position as trade debts."

In the present case I am of opinion that this general presumption does apply, and that there are no special circumstances not admitting of its application. But I think farther that there are facts and circumstances proved which clearly shew that the new firm took over the whole liabilities of the old business. In the first place, they paid the whole trade debts of the creditors of the business other than Mr Heddle. In the next place, they paid the bill accepted by Mrs Marwick for the balance of the debt due to the Union Bank, and for which Mr Heddle was liable to the bank. But this bill represented a debt due by Mrs Marwick to Mr Heddle for advances in connection with the business, which was contracted in precisely similar circumstances with the debt now claimed, and as the firm admitted liability for the one by paying it I do not see how they can repudiate liability for the other.

In the next place, the firm distinctly admitted liability for the debt in question in the circular and state of affairs, issued by their authority to the creditors of the firm by Mr Thomson, when the trust-deed was granted, and lastly the manner in which the account of the firm against Mr Heddle was dealt with can only be explained on the ground that they knew that he had a contra account against them to a larger amount. On the whole matter I am of opinion that Mrs Heddle is entitled to rank for the amount of the debt now ascertained to have been due by Mrs Marwick at the date of the partnership on the ground that the new firm assumed, adopted, and dealt with the debt as a debt of the firm.

LORD SHAND.—I entirely concur in the view which has been presented by Lord Adam, and in the grounds of his Lordship's judgment. I do not think that this case raises any question of general law, such as was presented for consideration in the argument. I hold that it has been established,—and clearly established in my judgment,—that the new firm in this case expressly undertook liability for the debt in question by their actings in relation to it. The debt was incurred in consequence of Mr Heddle having acted practically as banker in financing the business for a number of years; and therefore I do not think it can be disputed that it was a trade debt. Mr Hourston, when he came to the business and became a partner, was necessarily aware of it. He saw what was going on for a year while he was in the employment of the firm, and while Mr Heddle was financing the business, and it is impossible to doubt that he must have known that the account had to be cleared off when Mr Heddle ceased to act and the business was to be put on another footing. Mr Hourston says he did not know of the existence of this debt, and it was stated for him in the argument that if he had known the precise position of the affairs of this company he would not have joined it. But as Lord Adam has pointed out, Mr Hourston was not putting any capital into the business. And although it may be that for a time the business was not paying, and there was a balance standing against it, yet, on the other hand, it was an old-established business, and all parties seemed to think that, if well managed, it would in the end produce a large amount of profit.

I think a conclusive answer to the statement of the case presented by the defenders is this, that while no doubt Mr Hourston says he did not know of this debt, I can only accept that as meaning that he did not realise quite the amount of it. Mr Heddle is not here to speak for himself, for he is dead, but this fact speaks to me with a clearness that puts the matter beyond question, that from 1878 to 1884, a period of six years, the new firm went on supplying Mr Heddle with furnishings to the extent of about £200 a-year, and never asked for payment of any of this money. They were in difficulties during this time and desirous of getting money; that appears on the proof. If Mr Heddle was owing them upwards of £1000 for furnishings, it is impossible to doubt that they would have pressed for that money, and it would have been paid. It is admitted that there never was a payment of that kind made by him. In that state of the matter, the only explanation that occurs is that they were working off the balance of the debt that was due to Mr Heddle when Mr Hourston became a partner. So I am clearly of opinion that, taking the proof as a whole, and taking into account the different matters which Lord Adam summarised at the close of his opinion, the new firm undertook responsibility for this debt, just as they undertook responsibility for the other debts of the firm.

In regard to the general question of law, which has been so fully argued, I shall only say that I concur in thinking it must always be a question of circumstances whether a new firm becomes responsible for the obligations of the old. On the one hand, if an old-established firm, consisting of one or two partners, arranges to take in a clerk and give him a future share of the profits, or if one of the partners has a son who has just come of age and is taken into the business, and they arrange to give him a share of the profits of the new firm thereby constituted, it appears to me that, if the new firm takes over the stock in trade and the book debts and whole business of the old firm and the goodwill of that business, equity requires that they shall take over its obligations. If a person

No. 127.

June 1, 1888.
Heddle's Executrix v. Marwick & Hourston's Trustee.

grants a universal disposition in favour of another party, in so far as this is gratuitous and not for value, it can only be under burden of the obligations for which that person is liable. It appears to me that in such a case as I have put, where you have practically a new copartnery, with the transfer of the whole assets of the business and goodwill of the old firm, the creditors must continue to have their hold upon these assets in the new firm. To hold otherwise would be to open a door to fraud. The assumption of a new partner it may be to-day, of another six months afterwards, and of a third six months after that, thereby cutting off the rights of creditors to share in the assets of each separate firm, would produce not only confusion but great injustice to the creditors. On the other hand, if a partner comes into a business, paying in a large sum of capital, and the other partners merely put in their shares of a going business as their shares of the capital, a different question might arise. In such a case as that, probably some special circumstance would require to be proved in order to impose liability on the new partner for transactions entered into prior to the date when he became a partner. Then, again, intermediate cases will occur between these two classes. In all of them I think it must be a question of circumstances, to be determined by the Court upon the facts, whether there has been liability undertaken, or adoption of the debt of the old firm. In this case I do not think such questions as I have pointed out arise, and I concur in the opinion of Lord Adam that Mr Hourston is clearly liable for the debt due to Mr Heddle's executrix.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of opinion with both your Lordships that the result of the evidence in this case is to shew that the new firm, and Mr Hourston as a partner of that firm, has adopted and taken over Mr Heddle's debt as part of the liabilities of the new firm. If that be the sound result of the evidence, it seems to me that this case presents no difficulty whatever in point of law.

At the same time, I cannot but express my entire concurrence in the view which Lord Adam has presented of the two cases of M'Keand and Millar. I think he has very accurately expressed what is the result of these cases. Although in the recent case of Nelmes opinions were expressed by some of their Lordships of the Second Division which the Lord Ordinary thinks are at variance with the views expressed in the two previous cases to which I have referred, I cannot help thinking that the difference is more apparent than real, and that if another case raising the same kind of question which occurred in the cases of M'Keand and Millar comes to be considered by the Court, it will be found that the law to be applied is very much the same as was enunciated by the Judges in the former cases, and was stated by two of the learned Judges in the other Division in the case of Nelmes.

LORD MURE was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against: Refuse the reclaiming note, and remit to the trustee to rank the appellant as a creditor on the sequestrated estates of Marwick & Hourston for the amount of £3820, 3s. 9d.: Find the appellant entitled to the expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor," &c.

JOHN WALLS, S.S.C.—D. MACLACHLAN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 128.

June 5, 1888.
Partick, Hillhead, and Maryhill Gas Co. Limited v. Taylor.

PARTICK, HILLHEAD, AND MARYHILL GAS COMPANY, LIMITED, First Parties.—Darling—Younger.
ROBERT TAYLOR AND ANOTHER, Second Parties.—Davidson.

Company—Preference shares—Dividend—Payment of arrears out of subsequent profits.—Preference shares in a limited company were issued under special resolution of the company, "these shares to be entitled to a preferential dividend of 5½ per cent per annum." During two years there were no profits of the company wherewith to pay the guaranteed dividend. Held (1) that the preference shareholders were entitled to payment of the arrears of dividend out of the first profits made by the company, but (2) that interest was not due on the arrears.

1ST DIVISION.
B.

THE PARTICK, HILLHEAD, AND MARYHILL GAS COMPANY, LIMITED, was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867.

Under article 6 of the company's articles of association power was given, "on the recommendation of the directors and with the sanction of at least three-fifths of the votes of the shareholders, voting in person or by proxy, at any general meeting of the company," to increase the capital of the company "by the creation of new shares, whether ordinary or preferential or special, and on such terms and conditions as the meeting determine." Accordingly, in or about the month of August 1873, the directors resolved to recommend an issue of preferential shares, and their annual report, dated 13th August 1873, contained the following passage:—"The directors now submit for the approval of the shareholders the accounts of the company brought down to the 30th of June last. It will be observed that in order to carry out the works authorised by the general meeting of shareholders on 27th August 1872 a considerable advance has been received from the bank in anticipation of the issue of additional stock, authorised to be created by the meeting of shareholders held on 29th October 1872. The amount authorised to be issued at that meeting was £50,000, and the directors are glad to say that fully the half of that sum has been subscribed; but in order to provide for the liability to the bank and other engagements, the directors are of opinion that preference stock should be created to the extent of £30,000, with a guaranteed dividend of 5½ per cent per annum, and they recommend the shareholders to agree to this." At a special general meeting of the company, held on 22d August 1873, the following special resolution (afterwards duly confirmed) was passed:—"That in terms of the recommendation of the directors, the capital of the company be, and is hereby increased by the sum of £30,000, to be issued in 6000 preference shares of £5 each, these shares to be entitled to a preferential dividend of £5, 10s. per centum per annum."

Mr Robert Taylor, Ashlea House, Partick, in answer to a circular dated 19th September 1873, applied for, and there were allotted to him, 100 of the preference shares, which were fully paid up.

Till June 1885 the dividend of 5½ per cent was duly paid. In June 1886 the accounts shewed a balance of profit of about £3000, but this balance was extinguished by being written off against losses which the company had sustained and which fell to be debited to revenue.

Accordingly, at the annual balance in June 1886 and again in 1887, the dividends on the preference shares were not paid.

In March 1888 a special case was presented to the Court to which the Gas Company were the first parties; and Mr Taylor and another, holders of preference shares, the second parties.

The above facts were stated in the case. It was further stated that it was expected that in June 1888 there would be a sufficient sum to pay the dividend for the current year on the preference shares, and possibly a portion of the arrears of dividend on those shares, assuming arrears were due. A copy of the articles of association was produced, and held to form part of the case.*

No. 128. — June 5, 1888. Partick, Hillhead, and Maryhill Gas Co. Limited v. Taylor.

The following questions were submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—"(1) Is the dividend on the preference shares cumulative, and does the dividend not paid in the years 1885-86 and 1886-87, or either of them, fall to be carried forward as a first charge on the free revenue of the year 1887-88 and future years? or Is the dividend on the preference shares for any one year chargeable only upon the free revenue of that year? (2) Is interest due on arrears of preference dividend, and if so, at what rate?"

Argued for the second parties;—The preference shareholders were entitled to be paid the arrears of their dividends from the first profits gained by the company. There was no case in point in our books, but in England the question had been answered in their favour.[1] In the Companies Clauses Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. c. 118), secs. 13-16, preference dividends were in some cases made not cumulative; that shewed that it required a special legislative Act to make such a state of matters possible. That statute in point of fact assumed the law to be as it was laid down in Henry's case. In equity their contention was right, for, if the opposite view were given effect to, it would be for the interest of the ordinary shareholders (who were here, and in most other cases, the majority in the company) to prevent the preference shareholders getting their dividend, and rather to apply the profit in wiping off bad debts, &c., if there were not enough to pay the preference dividend and a fair dividend to the ordinary holders.

Argued for the first parties;—The case was taken out of the rule of the cases cited by the second parties by the terms of the articles of association. By article VII., sec. 18, subsec. (1),* the directors were bound to pay arrears on debts, but nothing was said with regard to arrears of dividends, the only direction being to pay the preferential dividends. That meant dividends of the current year. This was an element not present in any of the cases cited. As regarded the claim for interest, interest could only run from the date at which a debt ought to have been paid. Here it could not be said the dividends should have been paid when there were no profits out of which to pay them.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The second parties here are preference shareholders in the Gas Company, who are the first parties to the case. The shares which the second parties hold were created in 1873, in respect of a report by the directors of date 30th June 1873. The creation of the shares is thus recorded,—"At a special general meeting of the company held on 22d August 1873, the following special resolution (afterwards duly confirmed) was passed:—'That in terms of the recommendation of the directors, the capital of the company be, and is hereby increased by the sum of £30,000, to be issued in 6000 preference shares of £5 each, these shares to be entitled to a preferential dividend of £5, 10s. per centum per annum.'" Down to 1886 no difficulty was experienced in paying the dividend, but then misfortune came on the company, the effect of which (the particulars are of no moment) was, that though in June of that year there was according to the natural statement of the account a balance of profit of about £3000, that was more than extinguished by the arrangement by which the company wrote it off against losses sustained by them, and which fell properly to be debited against revenue. The consequence of this was that no dividend was declared in that year or in the following year. Now, however, it is stated that the company have recovered their position, that their losses are provided for, and that there is this year a prospect of a profit to be divided.

---

* The articles of association provided, inter alia,—"VII.—Application of Earnings.—18. All the earnings of the company, including all their receipts properly carried to the account of revenue, shall every year be applied as follows:—1st, In payment of all taxes, rates, and rents, and other preferable charges payable in respect of the company's landed property or works, and all arrears, if any, thereof. 2d, In payment of all management, working, and other current expenses of the company, and all arrears, if any, thereof. 3d, In payments to the reserved fund and the depreciation fund. 4th, In payment to the preferential shareholders, if any, of their dividends, according to their respective priority."

[1] Henry v. Great Northern Railway Co., 1857, 1 De Gex & Jones, 606; Webb v. Earle, 1875, L. R., 20 Eq. 556; Corry v. Londonderry & Inniskillen Railway Co., 1860, 29 Beavan, 263.

The question for us to decide is this,—The company say that the preference shareholders not having got a dividend during two years, there being no profits to divide, the dividend for those years falls altogether. The preference shareholders, on the other hand, maintain that those dividends not having been paid for want of funds fall to be paid out of the first profits earned by the company. The question is very simple, and it seems to me to be settled by authority, and settled in a way which to my mind is both plain and just. The difference between preference and ordinary shareholders is just this, that the one is entitled to be paid preferably to the other. Given profits, the rule is that the preference shareholders shall be paid first. Neither class are creditors of the company except in the sense that all shareholders are creditors for their share of the profits of the company in which they hold shares.

I cannot see that there would be any justice in a rule which would limit the right of the preference shareholders to receive 5½ per cent to years in which profits have been made, and give them no right to their dividend if no profits have been made during the year. It seems to me that they are clearly entitled when profits are made to their dividend of 5½ per cent, whether it is a past year's dividend or the dividend of the present year. The question was very fully considered in Henry's case. That case is a very high authority, the decision having been given in the Court of Chancery by Lord Chancellor Cranworth and two Lord Justices of high repute, viz., Lord Justices Knight Bruce and Turner. I should hesitate even if I had any doubt as to the justice of that decision in going against so high an authority; it is therefore satisfactory to find that one's own impression is in accordance with it.

Mr Younger called attention to that part of the articles of association which regulate the manner in which the profits of the company are to be disposed of. They are to be expended, according to the rules there set out,—"1st. In payment of all taxes, rates, and rents, and other preferable charges payable in respect of the company's landed property or works, and all arrears, if any, thereof." That rule contemplates the payment of debts, whether contracted in the year in which the profit was made or in any previous year, and the directors would have been bound to do that whether it was so provided in the articles or not. Now, the fourth rule is this,—"In payment to the preferential shareholders, if any, of their dividends, according to their respective priority." With regard to that rule, it is said that the words "all arrears" which occur in rule 1 are omitted, and it is therefore contended that the directors are not entitled to pay arrears of these dividends. I think that it is far too strict, I may say too fanciful, a construction of the rule. If the rights of preference shareholders are such as I have stated them to be I cannot think that they can be cut off by any such construction of the articles of association.

No. 128.

June 5, 1888.
Partick, Hillhead, and Maryhill Gas Co. Limited v. Taylor.

As regards the question of interest, if there are profits earned by the company the preference shareholders are entitled to their dividends. If there are no profits no dividends can be paid, and therefore as between the company and those shareholders there is no default of payment on the part of the debtor. I cannot see how interest can be payable on a sum which ought not to have been paid at the time from which the interest is said to become due. Interest runs only from the date when the principal ought to have been paid.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I am also of the same opinion as your Lordship.

The words contained in the resolution under which these preference shares were established are these, that "the capital of the company be and is hereby increased by the sum of £30,000, to be issued in 6000 preference shares of £5 each, these shares to be entitled to a preferential dividend of £5, 10s. per centum per annum." The resolution provides that there is to be a preferential dividend for a fixed sum of £5, 10s. a-year, but, of course, if at the end of a year there are no profits the preference shareholder cannot receive his dividend. If, however, in future years profits are earned, then I think that in a question between him and the ordinary shareholder, according to the plain meaning of the language used, a person who has taken preference stock is entitled to payment of his arrears. It has been stipulated that he shall receive payment of his preferential dividend for each year, of course out of profits. It would not, I think, be a reasonable construction of the words of this resolution to hold that because there are no profits in any particular year not only shall there be no payment that year, but that the claim, as for that year, is entirely extinguished. There are no terms in the resolution limiting the preference shareholders' right to that effect. If the right were to be made conditional the resolution would require to be qualified by such words as these,—"If there be profits for the year which will yield that sum." But there are no such qualifying words, and accordingly I am of opinion—and supposing we had no authority on the subject I should have had no difficulty in holding—that that is not the true meaning of the words used. But, as your Lordship has pointed out, there is much authority in the law and practice of England in favour of the view which your Lordship has expressed, and in which I concur.

The only other question is, whether anything can be made of the specialty to which Mr Younger drew attention, contained in the articles of association of the company, under the head "application of earnings." Now, the provision in regard to preference shareholders is this, that in the fourth place the earnings shall be applied "in payment to the preferential shareholders, if any, of their dividends according to their respective priority." These words simply express the rule of law that has been long settled. But it is said that in two previous clauses, referring to the payment of taxes and expenses of management, arrears are mentioned and directed to be paid, while in this fourth clause arrears are not mentioned, and that therefore we should apply a different rule from that usually followed in regard to arrears of preferential dividend, and so are to infer the loss of a valuable right usually possessed by preference shareholders from the terms in which these previous clauses are expressed. I think it would be an extremely strong thing to limit the rights of preference shareholders by a mere inference to be drawn from the mention of arrears occurring in a previous article dealing with another matter. It would require clear language to justify the Court in holding that these preference dividends shall be payable out of profits in the event only of there being profits for the year so as to exclude any claim for arrears. To do so we should require such language as was prescribed by the Legislature in the Companies Clauses Act of 1863, sec. 14, to which Mr Davidson referred us, where there is a direct provision that "if there are not profits available for the payment of the full amount of preferential dividend or interest for the year no part of the deficiency shall be made good out of the profits of any subsequent year, or out of any other funds of the company." In short, I think that in order to restrict the preference shareholders' right you must have something express, and not something drawn by doubtful implication from such words as are here founded on, which, at the best, seem to be merely an expression of what the common law requires, viz., that a company out of its first receipts, and before paying dividends, shall pay its debts and expenses of management, and all arrears of these.

No. 128.

June 5, 1888.
Partick, Hillhead, and Maryhill Gas Co. Limited v. Taylor.

With regard to the claim for interest on the arrears of preference dividends, it appears to me that it is an extravagant claim. If you have no profits you can have no dividend, and if you have no dividend declared you can have no interest running. The claim of the preferential shareholder has priority to that of the ordinary shareholder. But, of course, he is to be paid only out of profits earned and declared, and if he get his dividend as soon as there are such profits, he obtains the full measure of his rights. I am of opinion with your Lordship that the claim of interest must be refused.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT answered the first alternative of the first question in the affirmative, and the second alternative in the negative. They also answered the second question in the negative.

MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—BRUCE & KERR, W.S.—Agents.

No. 129.

June 9, 1888.*
Bennett v. Wilson.

JAMES BENNETT, Pursuer (Respondent).—H. Johnston.
GEORGE WILSON, Defender (Appellant).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Watt.

Process—Appeal—Sheriff—Power of Sheriff to remit to Sheriff-substitute to pronounce decree—Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act, 1867, secs. 9-12.—It is incompetent for a Sheriff in an action raised under the Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act, 1867, to remit to the Sheriff-substitute to pronounce decree.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff-shires.
M.

JAMES BENNETT, Elgin, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Elgin, under the Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act, 1867, against George Wilson, farmer, Marypark, concluding for payment of £26, 11s. 3d.

On 1st February 1888 the Sheriff-substitute (Grierson) sustained the defences to the extent of £26, and decerned against the defender for the balance of 11s. 3d.

---

* Decided June 23, 1888.

No. 129.
—
June 9, 1888.
Bennett v.
Wilson.

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith), who, on 9th May 1888, recalled the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute. In his interlocutor he found that the sum sued for was due and resting owing to the pursuer; "therefore repels the defences, and remits to the Sheriff-substitute to decern in terms of the summons, with expenses, and decerns."

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

The pursuer objected to the competency of the appeal, on the ground that no judgment had been pronounced by the Sheriff finally disposing of the cause, and that the cause was therefore not appealable in terms of the Debts Recovery Act, 1867, secs. 9-12.

The defender maintained that the interlocutor practically disposed of the cause, as all that remained was for the Sheriff-substitute to give effect to the Sheriff's judgment.[1] If the objection were sustained his right of appeal was altogether cut off, as it was incompetent under sec. 11 of the Act to appeal to the Court of Session direct from the Sheriff-substitute.

The Court intimated that they desired to hear parties on the merits. The cause was then heard on the merits.

LORD PRESIDENT.—(After stating his opinion that the Sheriff's interlocutor ought to be recalled on the merits)—I think it right to add that there is another ground upon which the Sheriff's interlocutor might be recalled. I do not think that that interlocutor was competently pronounced in terms of the statute. I do not think that the Sheriff had any power to remit to the Sheriff-substitute to pronounce decree; he must do so himself. On that ground also, I should have been prepared to recall the interlocutor appealed against.

LORD SHAND and LORD ADAM concurred upon both points.

LORD MURE was absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of 9th May 1888, and remitted to the Sheriff to affirm the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

HENDERSON & CLARK, W.S.—ALEX. MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 130.
—
June 9, 1888.
Simpson v.
Brown.

GEORGE SIMPSON, Complainer (Respondent).—Lyell.
WILLIAM BROWN, Respondent (Reclaimer).—C. S. Dickson.

Bill—Diligence—Suspension of Charge—Caution—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 61).—In a suspension brought by the acceptor of a bill of a charge given by the drawer, the complainer averred that the bill had been delivered by him as a blank bill to the drawer to be used for a different purpose from that for which it was used, but it appeared from letters signed by the complainer that he had admitted liability for the bill. Held that the complainer was not entitled to have the charge suspended without finding caution.

Observed that the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, made no alteration on the law in regard to caution.

Bill-Chamber.
1ST DIVISION.
Lord Lee.
Bill-Chamber
Clerk.

ON 16th March 1888 George Simpson, residing at Trinity, near Edinburgh, was charged at the instance of William Brown, solicitor, Hamilton and Glasgow, to make payment, as acceptor, of a bill for £282 drawn by Messrs W. V. & J. R. Orr, of which Brown was the holder.

---

[1] Malcolm v. M'Intyre, Oct. 19, 1877, 5 R. 22; Cathcart v. Sloss, Feb. 11, 1865, 3 Macph. 521, see Lord Deas' opinion, 525, 37 Scot. Jur. 261.

Simpson presented a note of suspension in which he averred that in the end of 1886 he had occasion to go to America, and that before leaving he executed a power of attorney in favour of Brown (his brother-in-law), to whom also he gave a number of bill stamps accepted in blank to be used for his (complainer's) business if required; that none of these stamps were required in the complainer's absence, and on his return the respondent obtained a discharge from him; that in the autumn of 1887 Mr Dundas Simpson, the complainer's father, had a claim of £282 made upon him by a bondholder over his properties in Airdrie, and that the respondent, who was son-in-law to Mr Dundas Simpson, pressed the complainer to relieve his father by paying the amount, but that the complainer refused to do so; that to stop a sale of the property the respondent had without the complainer's authority filled up one of the blank bills and delivered it to Messrs Orr the bondholder's agents, and Mr Brown at the same time gave them his own cheque as security for payment of the bill.

The respondent stated in answer that he had been employed by the complainer in November 1887 to obtain a loan to pay off a bond of £1700 over a property belonging to the complainer's father, with arrears of interest thereon amounting to £282—and that it was upon an arrangement with Messrs Orr—the agents for the bondholder—and after the circumstances had been explained to the complainer, that the latter had authorised the respondent to settle the payment of interest by the bill in question, in order to avoid a sale of the property. On 10th November 1887 (the date of the bill), the respondent had written to the complainer, who was then in Paris, intimating that he had given the bill "in payment of the interest." Between that time and the date when the bill became due a correspondence (which was produced) took place between the respondent and the complainer, in the course of which the complainer admitted that he was due the sum in the bill, although he was unable to meet it. Inter alia, on 9th January 1888 he wrote to the respondent,—"I have been trying for the last few days to realise, so as to cover the bill due to Orr, but it is almost impossible to do so"; and on the same day the respondent wrote to the complainer,—"It is more than ever necessary that you arrange with Mr Orr on the 13th at latest." On 10th January 1888 the complainer wrote to the respondent,—"I am disappointed again, and must therefore fall back on you to realise to clear off Orr's matter."

The complainer pleaded;—(1) The prayer of the note ought to be granted in respect the charger gave no value for the bill. (2) The said bill having been fraudulently and unwarrantably written as stated on the blank bill stamp, it forms no warrant for diligence against the complainer.

On 31st March 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Lee) passed the note without caution.*

The respondent reclaimed, and argued;—The note ought not to be passed without caution. The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 61), had not made any change upon the existing law and practice in that respect. Sec. 100 of that Act prevented such a result. The Lord Ordinary was wrong in his view that value must be instructed. Value was always presumed.[1] If the case was to be put on the ground of bad faith, this was a case specially for caution.

---

* "NOTE.—In the circumstances, so far as admitted by the respondent, and appearing from the correspondence produced by him, it appears to me that, as between the suspender and the respondent, the bill in question cannot be held to instruct value to have been received by the suspender from the respondent."

[1] Law v. Humphrey, July 20, 1876, 3 R. 1192.

No. 130.

June 9, 1888.
Simpson v.
Brown.

Argued for the complainer;—What he desired to prove was that the bill had been granted without authority. The cases in which notes had been passed without caution were no doubt very few,[1] but, under the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the proof which was allowed was now very much wider. Hence the Court would not be so ready to impose caution.

Lord President.—I think the Lord Ordinary has very properly passed the note, because there is a little complication as to the transactions between the parties, and the result may be to shew that the bill ought to be debited to the complainer in an accounting with the respondent, but it may be the opposite way.

But the question of caution is another matter. The correspondence makes a different impression on my mind from what it seems to have made upon that of the Lord Ordinary. When the blank stamp was filled up in a bill on which Simpson stood as acceptor, intimation that that had been done was made to Simpson by letter. Whether the letter was received or not by Simpson cannot affect the matter, as there was undoubtedly immediate intimation made by the respondent. There was no answer from Simpson upon the subject until the 9th January, two months later, but the letter shews very distinctly that Simpson considered that he was liable not only as acceptor, but that it was a bill for which he was liable as in a question between Brown and him. He writes in his letter of 9th January,—"I have been trying for the past few days to realise, so as to cover the bills due to Orr, but it is almost impossible to do so. It is most aggravating to be forced to sacrifice when there is ample security in the property to cover. . . ." If he were of opinion that Brown was bound to provide for the bill, and to take it out of the circle, he would have written in a different way. That is not the attitude which he takes up. I cannot therefore say that the complainer is entitled to have this inquiry without finding caution. His name stands upon the bill as acceptor, and the question of caution remaining just as it was before the passing of the recent Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, it is for the Court in the whole circumstances of the case to say whether there ought to be caution or not. I am therefore sorry that I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary in his view that the note should be passed without caution.

Lord Shand.—I am of the same opinion. There is no doubt that section 100 of the Bills of Exchange Act has introduced a very important and valuable change in the law, for where formerly the mode of proof was restricted to the writ or oath of parties in cases where the parties, although truly acceptors, had granted bills for accommodation purposes, a proof at large is now competent. But the practice of the Court in regard to caution is saved. It is always a matter of discretion for the Court whether caution is to be made a condition of the note being passed or not.

I agree that this is a case in which the note ought not to be passed without caution. It is clear that the bill stamp accepted in blank was not originally given by Simpson to Brown to be used for the purpose to which he put it. But the writings strongly indicate that the suspender subsequently gave this authority. When Brown so used it, he at once intimated that he had done so to Simpson. Simpson says that the letter did not reach him for some time, but when it did reach him, although we have three letters produced from him to

---

[1] Mackay's Practice, ii. 192; Ross v. Miller, Dec. 2, 1831, 10 S. 95.

No. 130.

June 9, 1888.
Simpson v. Brown.

Brown, he never says that the bill was used without authority. On the contrary, his view was that he must realise his securities to meet the liability. That is quite inconsistent with the position which he takes up in this suspension, and I think that as matter of equity he must find caution as a condition of having the note passed.

LORD ADAM.—Prima facie it appears to me that the complainer adopted this bill. I have no hesitation in saying that the note ought not to be passed without caution.

LORD MURE was absent.

THE COURT accordingly recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and remitted to his Lordship to pass the note on caution or consignation.

RICHARDSON & JOHNSTON, W.S.—ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 131.

June 9, 1888.
Thomson v. Davidson's Trustees.

JANE THOMSON AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—Kennedy.
WILLIAM ANDERSON AND OTHERS (Davidson's Trustees), Respondents.—W. Campbell.

Trust—Charitable trust—Administration of trust—Discretion of trustees.—A truster directed his trustees to hold his estates, which were heritable, and apply the free yearly revenue thereof "for preserving the aged and infirm among the descendants of my father from want, or from the necessity of applying for public relief, and for obtaining for the young among the said descendants, both boys and girls, such a good, sound, plain, and useful education as will enable them to earn a livelihood for themselves, . . . with power . . . to maintain the young among the said descendants either in family with their parents or otherwise while at their education, . . . "; declaring that the trustees should not be entitled to spend more than £20 annually for the relief of any one beneficiary, "and that only while, in the judgment of my said trustees, he or she stands in need of it in supplement of his or her own exertions."

The truster directed the surplus revenue to be divided among certain of his relatives and their representatives per stirpes.

At a time when the trustees, assumed and acting in the trust, were among the persons interested in the surplus revenue being as large as possible, a descendant of the truster's father, who was a widow with six children under seventeen, applied for assistance from the trust. The revenue of the trust exceeded £500, less than £50 of which was expended on descendants of the truster's father, the remainder having been applied as surplus revenue. The trustees offered the applicant 12s. 6d. per week, with school fees and boots for the four youngest children, and to pay a debt she had incurred for rent, amounting to £6. The Court held that this allowance was in the circumstances inadequate, and directed the trustees to make an allowance of £10 per annum for each of the six children, reserving to the parties to apply to the Court to alter the allowance in the event of any change of circumstances.

2D DIVISION.
M.

WILLIAM DAVIDSON of Newhall died in December 1860 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement whereby he conveyed to trustees his estates of Newhall, in Orkney, and Bogbain, in Ross-shire. The purposes of the trust-disposition and settlement, after providing certain small legacies and annuities, were, in the fifth place, that the trustees should "hold the said estates and apply the free yearly revenue arising from the same, or such portion thereof as may be necessary, as after mentioned, for the benefit of the lawful descendants of my father, Alexander Davidson." He directed the trustees "to apply the said revenue for preserving the aged and infirm among the descendants of my said father from want, or from

No. 131.

June 9, 1888.
Thomson v. Davidson's Trustees.

the necessity of applying for public relief, and for obtaining for the young among my said descendants, both boys and girls, such a good, sound, plain, and useful education as will enable them to earn a livelihood for themselves,—it being my desire that their religious education shall be carefully attended to, and that they shall be brought up in the principles of the Free Church of Scotland,—with power also to my said trustees to maintain the young among the said descendants, either in family with their parents or otherwise, while at their education, and also during such time as they or any of them may be apprenticed by my said trustees to business, which my said trustees are hereby empowered to do; and I hereby declare that my said trustees shall not be entitled to apply any sum beyond £20 sterling per annum for the benefit or relief of any one, either young or old, of said descendants, and that only while, in the judgment of my said trustees, he or she stands in need of it, in supplement of his or her own exertions." In the sixth place, in the event, which happened, of the free yearly revenue being more than sufficient for the foregoing purposes, the trustees were directed to accumulate the yearly surplus, investing the same until an opportunity should arise of purchasing land, which they were directed to do as soon as possible. In the seventh place, they were directed, after the expiry of the legal period during which the revenue could be accumulated, to divide the free yearly surplus into four equal shares or parts to be paid per stirpes to the testator's brother and three sisters and their families, declaring that in the event of their families dying out the trustees should divide the yearly revenue, or surplus revenue, among charitable and religious societies in such proportions as they might determine.

In the year 1887 the capital value of the trust-estate stood in the accounts of the trust at £15,380. With the exception of an annuity of £20, the income was available for the fifth and seventh purposes of the settlement.

The trustees were among the persons favoured under the seventh purpose, and had therefore an interest in the surplus revenue available under that purpose being as large as possible.

On 10th March 1888 a petition was presented by Jane Davidson or Thomson (a grand-daughter of the truster's father), widow of James Thomson, and her six children after named, setting forth that the petitioner Mrs Thomson was in weak health, and had six children—Jane, aged sixteen; Sarah, aged fourteen; James, aged eleven; Elizabeth, aged nine; Barbara, aged seven; and Martha, aged three; that she was unable to maintain, still less to educate, them, had been rendered destitute by her husband's death, and had been obliged to obtain relief from the parochial board; that Jane and Sarah had passed the 5th Standard, but were now withdrawn from school as she was unable to keep them there; that an application to the trustees of Mr Davidson for aid under the fifth purpose of his settlement to keep them there had been refused; that they were desirous to obtain a "good, sound, plain, and useful education," to enable them to earn their livelihood by fitting them to become teachers or to fill situations in the post-office or in commercial houses; that Jane was not in employment, but was assisting her mother at home, while Sarah was earning 6s. a-week in a confection-making factory.

The petitioners stated that the trustees, in answer to an application made to them, had, while refusing to make any allowance for Jane and Sarah, offered a sum of 7s. 6d. per week for the whole petitioners, and to pay the school fees of the younger children and allow them shoes; and that after certain correspondence they had increased this offer to 12s. 6d. per week, besides paying a sum of £6, being the petitioner's past due rent; that "the trustees have not exercised a sound and reasonable judgment in fixing the said allowance, but are administering the revenue so as to divert it from the fifth to the sixth and seventh purposes, in which they are personally interested, and have acted contrary to the spirit and directions of the truster in the said fifth purpose both in refusing reasonable and sufficient allowances and in excluding the two eldest children from the benefit of the said purpose. The free revenue, of which . . . more than £500 is surplus free and available under the fifth purpose, is amply sufficient to allow of £15 for each of the two eldest children, £12 for each of the next three younger children, and £5 for the youngest child. These allowances are reasonably necessary for the respective maintenance and education of the said children, and, if granted, the petitioner, their mother, does not ask any allowance to herself." The petitioners prayed the Court to fix the allowances to be made by the trustees to the petitioners at these sums, or to fix such other allowances as the Court might think reasonable, beginning the first term's payment of each allowance as at 1st December 1887, and so forth monthly thereafter until further orders of the Court.

The trustees denied the averment that they had applied as small an amount as possible to the objects of the fifth purpose, and stated that, on the contrary, they had endeavoured, to the best of their ability, to carry out the truster's intentions. They admitted the facts to be as stated by the petitioners, and maintained that the eldest two children, Jane and Sarah, had already had a good education, and did not require assistance, more especially as Sarah was earning 6s. a-week.

They stated that the allowance they had agreed to give—viz., 12s. 6d. per week, with school fees of the children attending school, and boots for them, together with payment of the petitioner's past due rent, was in their judgment reasonable and sufficient; that they were under the trust sole judges of the question whether an individual claiming assistance from the trust really needed it, and if so, what amount should be allowed in supplement of his own earnings; and that nothing had been stated to justify interference with their discretion. They submitted that the application was incompetent and irrelevant, and that if it were competent for the Court to review their decision, the allowance they offered was reasonable and sufficient.

On 19th May 1888, counsel were heard on the petition and answers, when the Court, without pronouncing any order, continued the cause that the respondents might put in a statement of the revenue and the application thereof.

A statement lodged by them shewed that for the year ending 30th June 1887, the total revenue divided was £557, 1s. 6d., of which sum £48, 9s. had been applied to the fifth purpose and £488, 12s. 6d. to the seventh purpose. For the preceding year the total revenue divided was £598, 17s. 7d., of which £43 was expended on the fifth purpose, and £535, 17s. 7d. on the seventh purpose.

Counsel were then heard on the petition and answers with the accounts.

Argued for the petitioners;—The Court could competently interfere with the discretion of the trustees, because, admittedly, they had a personal interest in there being as small a part as possible of the revenue applied to the fifth purpose. Further, even in an ordinary family trust, and where the trustees had no personal interest, the Court would interfere where the trustees were not exercising a sound discretion in the application of the revenue of the trust.[1] This was a perpetual trust, which, also,

---

[1] Baird v. Baird's Trustees, Feb. 24, 1872, 10 Macph. 482, 44 Scot. Jur. 299.

No. 131.

June 9, 1888.
Thomson v. Davidson's Trustees.

was a reason for the Court interfering with the discretion of the trustees which did not exist in the case of Baird. On the merits, the allowance offered was entirely inadequate.

Argued for the respondents;—The question was one for the discretion of the trustees, with which the Court would not interfere, or, at least, would be slow to interfere.[1] Some very exceptional ground must be stated for such interference, and the fact that the trustees had a personal interest was not such a ground unless they were shewn to be acting corruptly. Baird's case turned on the circumstance that the truster while directing an expensive establishment to be kept up for his heir had not fixed the allowance for it or provided any means of doing so. On the merits, the offer of the trustees was sufficient. The two eldest children had been already educated without the aid of the trust, and no allowance should be made for them.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—These questions in regard to the administration of trust-funds are of some delicacy, because they involve to a certain extent a supervision of the operations of the trustees. I am not of opinion that it is desirable in the ordinary case to interfere with the discretion of trustees acting reasonably in the discharge of their discretion. That is, I say, a delicate matter, and, generally speaking, the trustees may be said to be the better judges of such questions.

But in this case I am satisfied that the trustees are not acting reasonably in the discharge of the powers committed to them. I do not say that they are actuated by their personal feelings, though they have an interest in the estate, but I do say that they have misjudged the case hardly and harshly, and I am prepared to give the remedy which is suggested in the application. There are six children still at a stage of life when education is required, and I think that an allowance of £60 per annum until further orders of the Court will be a reasonable sum to award. I think that less would be insufficient.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

LORD YOUNG and LORD CRAIGHILL were absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords having considered the petition along with answers for the respondents, . . . and heard counsel for the parties, fix the rate of allowance to be made by the said trustees at £10 sterling per annum for each of the six children of the petitioner mentioned in the petition, to be paid to their said mother, and that monthly from and after the first day of December 1887, and decern: Reserving to the parties, or either of them, to apply to the Court at any future time to alter said allowances: Find the petitioners entitled to expenses, and remit the account thereof to the Auditor to tax and report."

J. D. MACAULAY, S.S.C.—SKENE, EDWARDS, & BILTON, W.S.—Agents.

---

[1] Douglas v. Douglas' Trustees, July 6, 1872, 10 Macph. 943, 44 Scot. Jur. 522.

No. 132.

June 12, 1888.
Burnett v. St Andrew's Episcopal Church, Brechin.

JOHN BURNETT (Judicial Factor on the Trust created for behoof of the Licensed Episcopal Church in Brechin), Petitioner.—Kennedy.
REV. JAMES CRABB AND OTHERS (the Vestry of St Andrew's Episcopal Church, Brechin), Respondents.—Fleming.
REV. ROBERT WORKMAN ORR AND OTHERS (the Minister and Managers of the High Street United Presbyterian Church in Brechin), Respondents.—Strachan.

Trust—Administration—Nobile Officium—Cy près—Church—Episcopal Church.—In 1743 an Episcopalian church was erected in Brechin on ground the disposition to which was taken in name of trustees for behoof of the congregation, and bore that the price had "been truly paid out of the money belonging to the Episcopal Congregation of Brechin, and that the lands were purchased for making a convenient meeting-house or house of worship for the said congregation."

In 1746 and 1748 the Penal Statutes against the Scottish Episcopal Church were passed, which prohibited the exercise of that form of worship in Scotland, except in licensed churches and by clergymen of English or Irish orders. Few Episcopalian congregations complied with these conditions, but among the number so complying was the congregation at Brechin, which, in consequence (like the others in the same condition), became known as the "Licensed Episcopal Congregation" in Brechin.

In 1792 the penal laws against the Scottish Episcopal Church were relaxed by the Act of Relief, and the public ministrations and church government of that communion were resumed. About 1800 a congregation of the Scottish Episcopal Church was formed in Brechin, originally of Episcopalians who during the existence of the Penal Statutes had held aloof from the "Licensed Episcopal Congregation," but in course of time drawing to it many members of the latter congregation, which, in consequence, in 1820 ceased to have a permanent clergyman, and in 1830 ceased to have religious services at all. By that time the congregation had incurred a debt of £145.

In 1830 David Burnett and others, the trustees of the Licensed Episcopal congregation (the original trust constituted by the disposition of 1743 having been continued by successive assumptions), borrowed a sum of £145 from the congregation in Brechin of the Relief Synod in Scotland—a Presbyterian communion—and in consideration thereof wadsetted and disponed the chapel to the Relief congregation for the use and behoof of the said congregation, but redeemable by the granters, their successors in office, assignees, or other successors, on payment of £145 at Whitsunday 1887. The wadset further provided "that the said chapel shall be used solely as a chapel or place of worship for the said Relief congregation, and for no other purpose whatever, and if the said Relief congregation should at any time cease to be connected with the said Relief Synod of Scotland, or should cease to maintain religious worship regularly in said chapel by a preacher in communion with the said Relief Synod, then the said wadset right shall ipso facto cease and determine, and the said subjects revert to the said disponers and their foresaids, they being bound to pay the said principal sum of £145." The money thus obtained was employed in paying off the debts of the "Licensed Episcopal Congregation."

Thereafter the Licensed Episcopal congregation ceased to exist; some of its members continued to worship in the chapel and became members or adherents of the Relief congregation; others joined the Scottish Episcopal congregation.

In 1847 the Relief Synod became incorporated in the United Presbyterian Church, but the Relief congregation of Brechin, as a congregation of the United Presbyterian Church, continued to worship in the chapel until 1876, when they erected a new church.

In 1878 a judicial factor was appointed on the trust-estate of the Licensed Episcopal congregation on the petition of David Burnett, the sole surviving manager of the congregation and reverser under the wadset.

In 1879 the judicial factor obtained a reconveyance to the chapel from the

No. 132.

June 12, 1888.
Burnett v. St Andrew's Episcopal Church, Brechin.

United Presbyterian congregation, he having advanced the redemption money. He thereafter, under the authority of the Court, sold the building, and having repaid himself out of the price, in December 1887 presented a petition to the Court for an order settling the destination or administration of the balance of the price. He stated that David Burnett, on whose petition he had been appointed, was dead, that there were no other members of the Licensed Episcopal congregation, as it existed at the date of the wadset, alive, and that it was practically certain that that congregation would not be revived, nor a new Licensed Episcopal congregation formed in Brechin.

The Scottish Episcopal congregation in Brechin and the United Presbyterian congregation in Brechin each claimed the whole fund, the former on the ground that they were the only Episcopalians in Brechin, and truly represented the congregation which had erected the church; the latter on the ground that a majority of the Licensed Episcopal congregation had (as these respondents averred) joined the Relief congregation in 1830, when the wadset was granted, and had thus practically amalgamated the two congregations.

The Court, without allowing the United Presbyterian congregation a proof of their averments, held that the Scottish Episcopalian congregation were entitled to the funds in the hands of the factor, being of opinion that as the chapel was in 1743 built by and for the use of the Episcopalians in Brechin, the money arising from its sale in consequence of the failure of the trust ought in equity to be given to the only persons who represented the Episcopalians of Brechin.

1st Division.
B.

This was a petition by John Burnett, baker in Coupar-Angus, judicial factor on the trust created for behoof of the Licensed Episcopal congregation in Brechin, praying the Court for an order settling the destination or administration of the funds in his hands belonging to the trust, being the surplus of the price arising from the sale of the chapel, in the circumstances to be mentioned.

Answers were lodged by the Vestry of St Andrew's Episcopal Church, Brechin, and by the Minister and Managers of the High Street United Presbyterian Church, Brechin, each of whom claimed the entire fund.

The circumstances out of which the competition arose, as appearing from the statements in the petition and the admissions of the parties, were as follows:—

For some time after the Revolution of 1688, the Episcopalian incumbent of Brechin continued to officiate in the parish church. But early in the eighteenth century an Episcopalian congregation was formed, by whom the chapel in question was erected about 1743. The earliest deed relating to the chapel was a disposition dated 3d October 1749, and recorded 21st April 1755, by which Patrick Dickson, on the narrative that Nicolas Cowie and another had by disposition, dated 3d May 1739, sold and disponed to him, his heirs and assignees, heritably and irredeemably, All and haill that fore tenement of land called of old the Chaplainrie of St Ninian's Altar, situate within the Cathedral Church of Brechine, lying on the east side of the High Street of the said city, opposite to the Bishop's Close-head, acknowledged and declared that the price had been "truly paid out of the money belonging to the Episcopal congregation of Brechin, and that the lands were purchased for making a convenient meeting-house or house of worship for the said congregation"; and that the said disposition had been taken in his name as trustee for and to the use and behoof of the said congregation, and at the desire of the managers of its affairs, and that he had resold certain parts and portions of the said subjects in 1740 and 1742, and had applied the prices of the said portions towards payment of the charges of building and finishing the house of worship for the said congregation; and that he, Colin Alison, and Alexander Jack, and others after named, had advanced respectively certain sums therein specified; therefore the said Patrick Dickson disponed in favour of himself and the said Colin Alison, Alexander Jack, and others, the creditors aforesaid, and the longest liver of them, their heirs and assignees, not only as trustees for and to the use of the said congregation, but also for security to them for their said advances, the subjects above described (except the parts sold in 1740 and 1742): Provided that the said disponees should be managers of the affairs of the said congregation until reduced to less than five, in which case it should be lawful for the heads of families of the said congregation to appoint as many of their number as would make seven in all; that interest should run on the said advances from the date of a minister being called and first officiating as minister of the said congregation until payment; and that as soon as all the said creditors or their heirs or executors should have received payment of their said advances and interest, the disponees therein should be obliged, when desired, to denude and to convey the said subjects to such persons as might be appointed by a meeting of the heads of families, and to the longest liver of such persons, their heirs and assignees, as trustees for and to the use of the said congregation, with and under such provisions, conditions, and declarations as should be agreed on by the said heads of families as aforesaid.

The chapel was erected in pursuance of the Toleration Act, 10 Anne, cap. 7, by which persons of the Episcopal persuasion in Scotland were permitted to assemble for divine worship, provided, inter alia, that none should officiate or exercise the functions of a pastor unless he possessed and had registered a letter of orders from some Protestant bishop. But shortly after the erection of the chapel the Penal Acts of 1746 and 1748 (19 Geo. II. cap. 38, and 22 Geo. II. cap. 34), were passed, which required such pastors to qualify by taking the oaths to his Majesty, on pain of their meeting-house being shut up, inflicted certain penalties of fine, imprisonment, and loss of civil practice on all persons resorting to an unregistered meeting-house, and enacted that the letter of orders above required must be by some bishop of the Church of England or of Ireland. In consequence of these enactments the public ministration and rule of the Scottish Episcopal clergy almost entirely ceased, their services were conducted privately, and their former congregations dispersed. In some towns the local congregation, or the majority of its members, procured the services of an English or Irish Episcopal clergyman qualified under the Act, and continued to meet for divine worship publicly in their chapels as before the Acts. The same religious articles and doctrines were taught, and the same forms of worship and ritual were observed as in the Scottish Episcopal churches prior to 1746, but the service included prayer for the reigning sovereign. These were usually called "Licensed Episcopal" but sometimes "Qualified English" chapels. The chapel at Brechin was one of this number, and its congregation was thereafter known as the "Licensed Episcopal Congregation in Brechin."

By disposition dated 9th August 1790, and recorded 15th June 1804, the above-mentioned Alexander Jack, on the narrative of the disposition by Patrick Dickson of 1749, and that he was then the only surviving and acting trustee of the "Licensed Episcopal Congregation in Brechin" under that deed, that all the said advances had been repaid, and that the said congregation, on 18th March 1790, had chosen John Smith of the navy, George Stewart, and twelve other persons as managers or trustees for the said congregation, five to be a quorum, and required him to denude in their favour, conveyed the said subjects to the said managers and their successors in office, named by the said congregation for ever, to be held in trust under the control and direction for and upon account of the said

No. 132.

—

June 12, 1888.
Burnett v. St Andrew's Episcopal Church, Brechin.

congregation, whose orders and directions the trustees and their successors should be bound to obey.

In 1792 the penal laws against the Episcopalians in Scotland were relaxed by the Act of Relief (32 Geo. III. cap. 63), which permitted their ministers to qualify by taking the oaths of allegiance and subscribing a certain declaration. In consequence congregations were formed, reconstituted, and public ministrations and church government resumed, but in many cases, as in the case of the congregation in question, the "licensed" or "qualified" English congregations continued to maintain their independent existence. Between 1792 and 1800 a Scottish Episcopal congregation was formed in Brechin, consisting originally of such members of the Episcopal persuasion as had held aloof from pastors and chapels licensed under the Penal Acts. This congregation built a chapel in St Andrew Street, which became the Church of St Andrew in Brechin, in the Scottish Episcopal Church. Its vestry was one of the two respondents to this petition.

The licensed or English congregation thereafter suffered a gradual diminution of the number of its members, many of whom became members of the congregation of St Andrew's Church. But they continued to be considerable in number, and raised sufficient funds for minister's stipend and other congregational purposes until the death of their pastor in 1820. After that they were unable to raise a sufficient stipend to secure a permanent English pastor, though religious services were maintained until about June 1830. By that date they had incurred debts to the amount of about £145. Negotiations consequently took place between them and the Relief congregation in Brechin, which resulted in the following deeds.

By disposition dated 12th November 1829, John Smith, George Stewart, and three others, being the only surviving trustees and disponees under the disposition of 1790, on the narrative of that deed, and that other managers had been named by the Licensed Episcopal congregation, and that they, the said John Smith and others, had been called on to divest themselves of the said subjects, disponed the said subjects to John Burnett, David Burnett, and ten other persons, the then managers of the said congregation, and to the survivor of them or their assignees and to their successors in the management of the said congregation who might be assumed as trustees, and to the assignees of any persons so to be assumed, five to be a quorum, but in trust for the use and behoof of the said congregation, and under the conditions specified in the said disposition of 1790. John Burnett, David Burnett, and the other persons named were infeft in the subjects as trustees foresaid, conform to instrument of sasine dated 16th and recorded in the Register of Sasines for the city of Brechin 17th November 1829.

By contract of wadset and disposition in security, dated 17th and registered in the Burgh Court Books of Brechin 19th of June 1830, the said trustees, David Burnett and others, specially authorised by said Episcopal congregation, in consideration of the sum of £145 sterling instantly advanced to them as managers foresaid out of the money belonging to the congregation in Brechin of the Relief Synod of Scotland (a Presbyterian communion) by James Ramsay, treasurer of the latter congregation, wadsetted and disponed to William Ferrier, the said James Ramsay, and others, the then managers of the said Relief congregation, and to their successors in office, the said chapel, in trust for the use and behoof of the said Relief congregation, but redeemable by the said granters or their successors in office, assignees or other successors, in right of the premises from the said wadsetters, by payment of £145 at Whitsunday 1887; but providing that "the said chapel shall be used solely as a chapel or place of worship for the said Relief congregation, and for no other purpose whatever, and that if the said Relief congregation shall at any time cease to be connected with the said Relief Synod of Scotland, or shall cease to maintain religious worship regularly in said chapel by a preacher in connection with the said Relief Synod, then the said wadset right shall ipso facto cease and determine, and the said subjects revert to the disponers and their foresaids, they being bound to pay the said principal sum of £145."

No. 132.

June 12, 1888.
Burnett v. St Andrew's Episcopal Church, Brechin.

The wadset price was applied by the managers, John Burnett, David Burnett, and others, in payment of the debts of the Licensed Episcopal congregation. The Relief congregation entered into possession of the chapel. Thereafter the Licensed Episcopal congregation ceased to meet for religious services or other purposes as a separate body. Some of its members (the large majority as at June 1830, including the managers, according to the averment of the petitioner, which was not admitted by the respondents the vestry of St Andrew's Episcopal Church) continued to attend the chapel, and joined in the worship and services of the Relief congregation, and became ordinary members or adherents of that congregation.

The Relief congregation possessed the subjects as a chapel until the Relief Synod in May 1847 became incorporated in the United Presbyterian Church. After the incorporation, the congregation was known as the High Street United Presbyterian congregation, and continued to possess the subjects as before, until 1876, when they erected a new church, and ceased to maintain religious worship in the chapel. They were the other respondents to the petition.

The petitioner was appointed judicial factor on 9th January 1878, on the application of David Burnett, the sole surviving manager of the Licensed Episcopal congregation and reverser under the wadset.

The petition, which was dated December 1887, stated that the petitioner on his appointment had applied to the managers of the United Presbyterian congregation for a reconveyance of the chapel, on the ground that the wadset right had terminated through failure to comply with the condition; that on his advancing the redemption price they had reconveyed the subjects to him as judicial factor; that he had made up a title, and under the authority of the Court sold the subjects; and that after reimbursing himself of his advance and expenses there remained a sum of £176, 14s. 2d., which was the fund in question.

He further stated that David Burnett, on whose petition he had been appointed, was dead, that he believed there was no surviving member of the Licensed Episcopal congregation as it existed in 1830, and that it was practically certain that that congregation would not be revived, or a new Licensed Episcopal congregation formed. "The Licensed Episcopal congregation having ceased to exist, the means by which the objects of the trust were formerly carried out have failed, and there is in the meantime no trust beneficiary entitled to the said sum or the income thereof. The object of the trust appears to be the promotion and maintenance of religious services according to the Episcopalian form of worship, for the benefit of Episcopalians in Brechin and its vicinity. It is believed to be impracticable to trace the individual sources of the funds invested in the purchase of the said subjects, referred to in the disposition of 1749 by Patrick Dickson and others. No continuous or complete record of the membership of the Licensed Episcopal congregation exists, so far as known to your petitioner. In consequence of the dissolution of the congregation, it has become impossible to carry out the trust in the manner and by the means originally contemplated. In these circumstances the petitioner is desirous to obtain the authority of the Court to apply the said funds to some useful and beneficial purpose, or to be directed how the said funds should be administered, or to have the said funds divided, in order that he may be relieved of his office.

No. 132.

June 12, 1888.
Burnett v. St Andrew's Episcopal Church, Brechin.

"The Episcopal Congregation of St Andrew's, Brechin, appear to answer most nearly to the congregation for whose benefit the said trust was originally intended," and the petitioner suggested that the funds should be paid over to them, but added,—"It has also occurred to the petitioner that the High Street United Presbyterian congregation, as representing the Relief congregation, which after 1830 comprised the majority of the members who had till then constituted the said Licensed Episcopal congregation, may be held to have an equitable right to share in the benefits of the said funds."

The petitioner therefore prayed the Court "to settle a scheme for the application of the said funds, and to grant warrant to the petitioner to pay over the said funds, under deduction of expenses, to such person or persons as your Lordships may appoint, to hold and administer the same under such scheme; or to make such provisions for the management and application of the said funds, or to give such directions to the petitioner with regard to the future administration of the funds, as your Lordships may judge and determine to be suitable; or to appoint the said funds to be paid over to or among such persons as may be found entitled thereto; and in the event of your Lordships granting warrant to pay over the said balance of the funds to persons appointed to hold the same as aforesaid, then to recall the appointment of the petitioner as judicial factor on the said trust," and to discharge him.

The United Presbyterian congregation maintained that the fund should be paid over to them on the following grounds, as stated in their answers: —"It is stated by the petitioner that the Episcopal Congregation of St Andrew's in Brechin appears to answer most nearly to the congregation for whose benefit the trust was originally intended, but the respondents venture to doubt the soundness of this view. The congregation for whose benefit the trust was originally constituted was the Licensed Episcopal congregation in Brechin, and in 1830 that congregation became united with the then Relief congregation in Brechin, and thereafter ceased to meet for religious services, or other purposes, as a separate body. The chapel belonging to the congregation was conveyed in wadset to the Relief congregation, and a large majority of the members, including the managers, became members of the latter congregation, which became incorporated in the United Presbyterian Church in 1847, and is now represented by the respondents. The descendants of those members of the Licensed Episcopal congregation who joined the Relief Church, as aforesaid, in 1830 still belong, to a large extent, to the United Presbyterian congregation. So far, therefore, from the St Andrew's Episcopal congregation appearing most nearly to represent the Licensed Episcopal congregation, that congregation is not only represented by, but forms a constituent part of, the congregation now represented by the respondents.

"It is also stated in the petition that the Episcopal Congregation of St Andrew's was formed between 1792 and 1800, and that the Licensed Episcopal congregation continued to maintain an independent existence down to 1830. Not only was there no attempt or proposal made during this period to unite the two churches, but, on the Licensed Episcopal congregation becoming unable to raise a stipend for their pastor, they deliberately proposed to amalgamate with the Relief Church, rather than unite with the St Andrew's congregation. The latter is a Scottish Episcopal congregation, while the Licensed congregation was connected with the English Episcopal Church. There never was apparently any sympathy between the two congregations, and the opinion now expressed by the petitioner with reference to their identity was certainly not shared in by the Licensed Episcopal congregation when it united with the Relief congregation, and cannot certainly be reconciled with that proceeding.

"Another ground on which it humbly appears to the respondents that they have an equitable claim to the fund in question is, that it is the balance of the price of the church which was wadsetted to their predecessors in 1830. It continued in their possession until 1879, when it was reconveyed to the petitioner, by whom it was sold under the authority of the Court. During the time the subjects were held by the respondents or their predecessors a considerable amount was expended in extending or enlarging and improving them, and their value was thereby considerably enhanced, and the price ultimately realised by the petitioner proportionately increased. The balance now held by the petitioner is thus, to a large extent at least, the residue of the expenditure made by the respondents and their predecessors." *

The St Andrew's Scottish Episcopal Congregation put their case in their answers as follows:—"In 1739, when the first disposition was taken, the only Episcopal congregation in Brechin was the Scottish Episcopal congregation, and consequently the acknowledgment of trust by Patrick Dickson bears that the price had been paid out of moneys belonging to the Episcopal congregation of Brechin, and that the disposition had been taken in his name as trustee for that congregation. By that Scottish Episcopal congregation a chapel on the land thus bought was built and completed about 1743, and in that chapel they worshipped until the Nonjuring Acts of 1746 and 1748 were passed. Thereafter, and until the passing of the Relief Act in 1792, the congregation could not worship publicly; but certain of its members who submitted to Government, and procured the services of an English or Irish pastor, continued to use the chapel as a licensed or English Episcopal congregation. After 1792, however, the Scottish Episcopal congregation was free to meet as a congregation, and those members who had held themselves aloof from licensed chapels or pastors, along with many of the other members who in the meantime had been worshipping with the licensed congregation, built a new chapel, which was known as the church of St Andrew, and again worshipped publicly as a congregation of the Scottish Episcopal Church.

"The Licensed Episcopal congregation suffered from the gradual withdrawal of its members to the Scottish Episcopal congregation, until they finally got into debt, as stated in the petition, when the Licensed Episcopal congregation thus ceased to exist, and those of its members who adhered to the Episcopal faith joined the Scottish Episcopal Church. It is believed that some of the members may have joined the Relief Church, but it is not admitted that these formed a majority even of the few members who worshipped in the Licensed Episcopal chapel to the end.

"The respondents would therefore humbly submit that the original congregation who bought the land in 1739, and built the chapel thereon in 1743, still exist in the congregation of St Andrew's Church, and that to them should be paid over the fund held by the petitioner."

---

* At the hearing these respondents stated that the sums thus expended by the Relief congregation amounted to £209 in 1830 and 1832, and that they themselves had also spent £74 for the same purpose in 1847.

No. 132.
—
June 12, 1888.
Burnett v. St Andrew's Episcopal Church, Brechin.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the statements of the respondents.[1]

At advising on 9th March 1888,—

Lord President.—This case was heard by Lord Mure, Lord Adam, and myself, and we have thought it right to put it out for judgment, notwithstanding Lord Mure's continued indisposition, but his Lordship has read the opinion I am about to deliver, and expresses his entire concurrence in it.

The fund in the hands of the judicial factor consists of the net proceeds of the sale of a building in Brechin, erected about the year 1743 as a chapel for the use of an Episcopal congregation, which apparently had been formed some years previously.

By disposition, dated 3d May 1739, Nicolas Cowie and another conveyed the ground afterwards occupied in part by the chapel to Patrick Dickson. On 3d October 1749 Patrick Dickson executed a deed in which he declared that the price which he had paid to Cowie and another for the subject in 1739 was truly paid out of money "belonging to the Episcopal congregation of Brechin for making a convenient meeting-house or house of worship for the said congregation"; that he was trustee for the congregation, and that at the request of the managers he had sold parts of the subjects in 1740 and 1742, and had applied the prices of said subjects, along with other moneys advanced by himself and others, in building the meeting-house.

The chapel was so erected in pursuance of the Toleration Act of the 10th of Queen Anne and subject to its conditions, that the minister to officiate in the chapel should be ordained by some Protestant bishop, should not be the established minister of any church or parish, should take and subscribe the oaths of allegiance and abjuration, and should, during divine service, pray for the Queen and the Royal Family.

Such was the position of the Brechin Episcopal congregation and its minister at the time of the erection of the chapel. But a very serious change soon occurred. For in the Rebellion of 1745 the Scottish Episcopal clergy had so generally manifested their sympathy with the cause of the exiled royal family, both by words and deeds, that in the years 1746 and 1748 two Acts were passed well known as the Penal Acts against Episcopalians in Scotland. These Acts not only required every chapel to be registered by a certain date, and that the ministers should qualify themselves by taking the oaths of allegiance and abjuration, and pray for the King or Queen by name, but also prohibited any minister from officiating who had not been ordained by some bishop of the church of England or of Ireland. In short, as Professor Grub states in his careful and accurate historical work,—"The obvious intention of the Legislature was to suppress the Scottish Episcopal Church and the native clergy altogether, and to grant toleration to those clergymen only who derived their orders from the English and Irish churches." The same author adds that "so far as appears no more than five Scottish clergymen attempted to avail themselves of the provisions of the statute by qualifying in terms of law."

It may therefore very safely be inferred that from the date of these Penal Statutes till their repeal in 1792 the minister of the Episcopal chapel in Brechin must have held his letters of orders, not from any bishop of the Scottish Episcopal communion, but from an English or Irish bishop. It was their position under the Penal Statutes that gave the Brechin congregation and all other lawful Episcopal congregations in Scotland during the period now referred to the distinctive description of "licensed."

---

[1] Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Clephane, Feb. 15, 1864, 2 Macph. (H. L.) 7, 36 Scot. Jur. 325, 4 Macq. 603; Attorney-General v. Bunce, April 22, 1868, L. R., 6 Eq. 563.

The trust created by the disposition of 3d May 1739 and 3d October 1749 was kept up by the assumption of new trustees in 1790 and 1829, and was in 1830 vested in David Burnett and ten other persons, managers of the congregation. These trustees borrowed a sum of £145 from the managers of the Relief congregation of Brechin, and granted a wadset therefor on 17th June 1830, in which, however, it is provided "that the said chapel shall be used solely as a chapel or place of worship for the said Relief congregation, and for no other purpose whatever, and if the said Relief congregation shall at any time cease to be connected with the said Relief Synod of Scotland, or shall cease to maintain religious worship regularly in said chapel by a preacher in communion with the said Relief Synod, then the said wadset right shall ipso facto cease and determine, and the said subjects revert to the said disponers and their foresaids, they being bound to pay the said principal sum of £145." The money thus obtained was employed in paying off the debts of the Licensed Episcopal congregation.

The immediate effect of this wadset was that the Licensed Episcopal congregation as a united body ceased to exist. Some of them joined the Relief congregation, who in virtue of the wadset were in possession of the chapel, and others joined another congregation of Episcopalians in Brechin, which had been formed soon after the passing of the Act of 1792, which is, as I understand, at the present day in connection with the Scottish Episcopal Church, and is the only existing Episcopal congregation in Brechin.

The chapel remained in the possession and use of the Relief congregation from 1830 till 1847, when the Relief Synod formed a union with the Associate Synod, and the united body became what is now known as the United Presbyterian Church. This event put an end to all right on the part of the wadsetters of 1830 to continue their occupation of the chapel, in terms of the provision above cited from the contract of wadset. Nevertheless, the congregation formerly Relief, but now United Presbyterian, continued to occupy the chapel as a place of worship till the year 1876, when they built a new chapel for themselves, and ceased to occupy this chapel.

In 1875 the now deceased David Burnett, who was then the sole survivor of trustees of the chapel, and also sole survivor of the reversers under the wadset of 1830, applied to the Court for the appointment of a judicial factor on the trust-estate, when the present petitioner was appointed. The factor now informs the Court that in 1879 he advanced the redemption money, £145, out of his own funds, redeemed the subjects, and, as reverser under the wadset, obtained a conveyance of the chapel in his favour. Thereafter, under authority of the Court, he sold the chapel for £500, and the surplus, after deducting the redemption money and the expenses of the factory, amounting to £176, 14s. 2d., falls to be disposed of under the present application.

Two parties claim the fund, not as matter of legal right, but because they each consider that they have the best claim in equity to the remaining balance of the property of this lapsed trust.

The first party are the present minister and congregation of St Andrew's

No. 132.
June 12, 1888.
Burnett v. St Andrew's Episcopal Church, Brechin.

Episcopal Church, being, as I understand, the only Episcopal congregation in that burgh. The second party are the High Street United Presbyterian Congregation of Brechin, from whom, as in right of the wadset of 1830, the chapel was redeemed by the factor. After full consideration, I am of opinion that the former is entitled to prevail.

It has been contended that the chapel, having been licensed under the Statutes of 1746 and 1748, had no connection with the Scottish Episcopal communion, to which the St Andrew's congregation belongs, because the minister of the licensed chapel must have been ordained by an English or Irish bishop. But the chapel was erected and in occupation as a place of worship before the passing of these statutes, and there is no reason to suppose that while it existed under the authority of the Toleration Act of Queen Anne its minister was not a Scottish Episcopalian under the superintendence of a bishop of that denomination. While the Penal Statutes remained in force, the congregation were of course reduced to the necessity of either employing a minister in English or Irish orders, or of abandoning the right and privilege of public worship altogether. But it has not been alleged that after the Penal Acts were repealed in 1792, and down to the year 1830, the minister of the chapel was not a Scottish Episcopalian, or in connection with the Scottish Episcopal Church. It is only between 1746 and 1792 that the building is, so far as we see, spoken of as a "licensed chapel or house of worship."

When the congregation was broken up under the provisions of the contract of wadset of 1830, we are told that some of the members continued to worship in the chapel with the Relief congregation, who thereafter occupied it, while others joined the Episcopal congregation of St Andrew's. We have no means of judging of the proportions of those who adopted the one course and the other. Nor is this of much consequence, as the total number must have been trifling, and there is great probability in the suggestion that the falling-off of the congregation between 1792 and 1830 must have been owing to the building of another and more commodious Episcopal Chapel in Brechin in connection with the Scottish Episcopal Church.

The United Presbyterian congregation base their claim on the allegation that a large number of the Episcopal congregation in 1830 joined the Relief Church, and their descendants are now members of the United Presbyterian congregation. This averment is obviously incapable of proof, and would not be very material even if proved. For the wadset, which is the only title of possession which the United Presbyterian congregation ever had to the chapel, made their possession for the twenty-nine years between 1847 and 1876 illegal, as constituting a breach of contract, the provision of that contract already quoted plainly importing that while the wadset endured the chapel might be used for a congregation of the Relief Synod, but for no other class of religionists, and on the redemption of the wadset, or its forfeiture for failure to comply with this condition, the chapel should return to the trustees for the Episcopal congregation, a body always thereafter kept up, and in the end represented in 1875 by the gentleman on whose application the present factor was appointed.

The United Presbyterian congregation further allege that while in possession of the chapel the Relief congregation spent £209 on maintenance of the chapel in 1830 and 1832, and the United Presbyterian congregation £74 for the same purpose in 1847. It is very doubtful, to say the least, whether such a claim could be maintained by a wadsetter in possession for a long period of years as a condition of giving effect to the reverser's power of redemption. But it is at all events too late to maintain such a claim after possession has been given up and the redemption money paid and received, and the whole right of the wadsetter extinguished.

No. 132.

June 12, 1888.
Burnett v. St Andrew's Episcopal Church, Brechin.

The short ground of judgment seems to be that the chapel was built in the year 1743 by and for the use of the Episcopalians in Brechin, and that the moneys arising from the sale of the chapel in consequence of its disuse and the failure of the trust on which it was held ought to be given to the only parties who now represent the Episcopalians of Brechin.

LORD ADAM.—Having, as well as Lord Mure, had an opportunity of considering your Lordship's judgment, I entirely concur.

LORD KINNEAR, not having been present at the hearing, gave no opinion.

THE COURT remitted the judicial factor's accounts to Mr Cotton, C.A., for audit and report, and thereafter, on 12th June, on considering Mr Cotton's report, pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . Find the petitioner entitled to the expenses of the present proceedings and incident thereto out of the trust-funds, as the same shall be taxed by the Auditor, to whom remit for that purpose, and authorise the petitioner to take credit therefor: Farther, after taxation and adjustment of the law-agents' accounts above mentioned, and deduction of the last-mentioned expenses, authorise the petitioner to make payment of the free balance of the trust-funds that shall then remain in his hands to the respondents the Rev. James Crabb and others, the Vestry of St Andrew's Episcopal Church, Brechin: Quoad ultra continue the petition."

GORDON, PRINGLE, DALLAS, & Co., W.S.—WM. OFFICER, S.S.C.—Agents.

THE REV. JOHN MAXIMILIAN DOLPHIN AND OTHERS (Mr and Mrs Dolphin's Marriage-Contract Trustees), First Parties.—
Cheyne—G. R. Gillespie.
THE RIGHT HONOURABLE WILLIAM EDWARD BAXTER, Second Party.—
H. Johnston—Macfarlane.

No. 133.

June 12, 1888.
Dolphin's Trustees v. Baxter.

Marriage-contract—Construction—Implication.—In an antenuptial marriage-contract the father of the wife bound himself to pay an annuity to the trustees under the contract, to be paid by them to the spouses jointly during the subsistence of the marriage, and to the wife during her life in the event of her surviving her husband. In case of her predecease leaving children of the marriage, the trustees were directed to apply the annuity in such a manner as they should think fit for behoof of the husband and children of the marriage during the survivance of the children, the annuity being restricted to half its amount in the event of the husband surviving the children. There was no obligation to pay any annuity to the children in the event (which happened) of the wife surviving her husband and dying leaving children of the marriage. The deed farther bore,—"And in regard to the foresaid interest, annuity, capital sums of the provisions . . . in favour of . . . and interest, dividends, and annual produce thereof, it is hereby provided that if there shall be more than one child of the said intended marriage it shall be lawful" to the husband, "at any time of his life . . . to divide and apportion . . . among the children or their issue, as after mentioned, the provisions respectively above written in their favour; . . . and in case of his death without making such division or settlement of the said respective provisions the said" wife, "if she shall survive him, shall, previous to the respective terms before mentioned, have the same power while she continues a widow, and failing any such division or settlement, the said respective provisions shall belong to and be divided among the children and the survivors" equally. The only "annuity" mentioned in the deed was the annuity provided by the father of the wife.

No. 133. — June 12, 1888. Dolphin's Trustees v. Baxter.

In a special case presented, on the death of the widow, in which her father maintained that his obligation to pay the annuity had ceased on that event, and the marriage-contract trustees, that it was to be inferred, from the clause above quoted, that the obligation still continued, held that to extend such an obligation by implication from other clauses in the deed, the inference must be very clear, and that as the terms of the clause founded on by the trustees were not sufficient to warrant the inference they contended for, the obligation to pay the annuity had ceased.

2D DIVISION. I.

CAPTAIN HERBERT DOLPHIN, of the Royal Navy, and Miss Jessie Scott Baxter, daughter of Mr W. E. Baxter, of Kincaldrum, were married on 11th June 1879. They had previously entered into an antenuptial marriage-contract, to which the Rev. John Dolphin, Captain Dolphin's father, and Mr Baxter were also parties. By this contract Captain Dolphin and his father on their part made certain provisions in favour of the spouses and the children of the marriage. Miss Baxter then conveyed her whole estates to trustees for certain purposes set forth, and then followed this obligation by Mr Baxter:—"And farther, the said William Edward Baxter hereby binds and obliges himself, his heirs and successors whomsoever, without the necessity of discussing them in their order, to pay to the said" trustees "an annuity of £300 sterling, and that at Martinmas and Whitsunday yearly, by equal portions, beginning the first term's payment thereof at the first of these terms which shall happen after the solemnisation of the said intended marriage, for the half year succeeding, and the next term's payment thereof at the first of these terms thereafter for the half year succeeding, and so forth half-yearly, termly and continually thereafter: With a fifth part more of each of the said termly payments of liquidate penalty in case of failure, and the interest of each of the said termly payments at the rate of £5 per centum per annum, from and after the term of payment thereof during not payment: And farther, to make payment to the said trustees at the rate of £300 per annum for the time that shall have to run from the date of the solemnisation of the said intended marriage to the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas that shall happen thereafter, which annuity of £300 the said trustees shall periodically, as it is received from the said William Edward Baxter, pay to the said Herbert Dolphin and Jessie Scott Baxter jointly during the subsistence of the said intended marriage, and to the said Jessie Scott Baxter during her life, in case of her surviving her said intended husband, and in case of her predecease, leaving a child or children of the said intended marriage, or issue of such of said child or children who may die, the said trustees shall pay or apply the said annuity during the survivance of such child or children, or issue foresaid, for behoof of the said Herbert Dolphin and the said child or children or issue foresaid: With power to the said trustees either to pay the same to the said Herbert Dolphin, or otherwise to pay and apply the same for his and their behoof in such way and manner as the said trustees in their absolute discretion shall think proper: But on the failure of a child or children of the said intended marriage, or issue of such child or children, whether before or after the death of the said Jessie Scott Baxter, the said William Edward Baxter shall only be bound to pay to the said trustees for behoof of the said Herbert Dolphin, if then alive, a restricted annuity of £150."

The marriage was dissolved by the death of Captain Dolphin on 17th October 1883. Mrs Dolphin died on 12th December 1886, survived by one child of the marriage, Violet Mary Dolphin.

After the death of Mrs Dolphin, the question arose whether Mr Baxter was bound to continue the payment of the annuity in the event which had happened, of Mrs Dolphin's survivance of her husband and her death leaving issue of the marriage. Mr Baxter stated that he was willing to make what he considered a suitable provision for his granddaughter, but he contended that his obligation to pay the annuity under the marriage-contract had ceased on his daughter's death.

A special case was accordingly presented, to which the trustees were the first parties and Mr Baxter was the second party.

The question put was,—"Is the party of the second part bound to continue payment of the said annuity during the survivance of the said Violet Mary Dolphin?"

The first parties admitted that the terms of the clause above quoted did not expressly impose an obligation on the second party to continue payment of the annuity in the event which had happened, but they contended that from other parts of the marriage-contract such an extension of the obligation on the second party was to be implied; and in particular they founded on the following clause:—"And in regard to the foresaid interest, annuity, capital sums of the provisions hereinbefore made payable by the said Herbert Dolphin, the Reverend John Dolphin, and Jessie Scott Baxter respectively, in favour of the children of the said intended marriage, and interest, dividends, and annual produce thereof, it is hereby provided and declared that if there shall be more than one child of the said intended marriage it shall be lawful to and in the power of the said Herbert Dolphin, at any time of his life, and even on deathbed, to divide and apportion, as he shall think proper, among the said children or their issue, as after mentioned, the provisions respectively above written in their favour, or any of them, or to settle the same upon them by way of liferent, or upon such conditions or trusts as he shall think proper; and in case of his death without making such division or settlement of the said respective provisions, the said Jessie Scott Baxter, if she shall survive him, shall, previous to the respective terms before mentioned, have the same power while she continues his widow, and failing any such division or settlement, the said respective provisions shall belong to and be divided among the said children and the survivors and survivor of them, equally, share and share alike."

The second party admitted that the only "annuity" mentioned in the marriage-contract was the annuity in question which he had undertaken to pay; and the first parties contended, therefore, that the clause last above quoted necessarily contemplated that this annuity should continue to be payable after Mrs Dolphin's death whether she survived her husband or predeceased him.

The second party, on the other hand, maintained that the insertion of the word "annuity" in the clause founded on by the first parties was a blunder on the part of the draftsman of the deed, and in support of this contention he founded on the fact that the enumeration "foresaid interest, annuity, and capital sums" occurred frequently in other parts of the deed, but, as regarded the word "annuity," always in a context that was intelligible with reference to the express terms of the obligation undertaken by him, whereas the clause in question, if it referred to his annuity, was contradictory of the clause of obligation, as it gave a power of apportionment to Captain Dolphin, while the clause of obligation gave the power of apportionment to the trustees. Apart from that specialty the second party maintained further that an obligation, which

No. 133. his undertaking was, was to be construed according to its terms, and was not to be extended by implication from other parts of the marriage-contract not expressly dealing with it.

June 12, 1888. Dolphin's Trustees v. Baxter.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is rather a perplexing question which your Lordships have here to decide. It arises on the construction of a marriage-contract, the parties to which were Captain Dolphin and Miss Baxter (the intended spouses), the father of the bridegroom, and the father of the bride being also parties to the contract. The question relates entirely to an obligation undertaken by Mr Baxter, Miss Baxter's father, who was the fourth party to the contract.

The first part of the deed relates to the settlements made by Captain Dolphin, the husband, and his father upon the spouses and the children of the marriage. Then comes a provision on the part of Miss Baxter by which she in general and very usual terms, by means of a conveyance to trustees, settles on herself and her intended husband and their issue all that she then had or should succeed to. Lastly, Mr Baxter, her father, provides in the terms mentioned in the marriage-contract an annuity of £300 first to the spouses as long as the marriage continues, in the second place to his daughter if she survived her husband, and thirdly, to the husband and the children of the marriage, under certain conditions in the event of the wife predeceasing the husband and leaving issue. Now, the event which has happened, and to which alone this question refers, is that the husband predeceased the wife after, I think, the marriage had endured for four years. The wife died a few years after, leaving one child. The question which arises is whether the annuity of £300 a-year terminated by the death of the wife, or whether the child has a continuing interest in it.

Of course the words of obligation are necessarily what your Lordships have to consider, and I now address myself to these words. Mr Baxter binds himself to make payment to the trustees, who are mentioned and appointed in the marriage-contract, of an annuity of £300 sterling, and that at Martinmas and Whitsunday yearly, by equal portions, and so on; and this annuity, as it is received, is to be paid over periodically by the trustees to the said Herbert Dolphin and Jessie Scott Baxter jointly during the subsistence of the said intended marriage, and to the said Jessie Scott Baxter during her life in the case of her surviving her said intended husband. Now this is the event which has occurred. She survived her intended husband, and Mr Baxter's annuity was paid to her during her life, but I can find nothing of an obligatory character in regard to the farther contingency which has happened, viz., the death of the wife after having survived her husband, leaving issue of the marriage surviving her. There are no words that I can find in any part of the deed professing to be words of obligation in regard to this annuity other than those I have read. If that be so, then I think that the obligation on Mr Baxter has been implemented by the payment of the annuity to the surviving wife during her life, for where you have recourse to inference from other clauses of the deed to control or enlarge the provisions of such an obligation that inference must be very clear.

The husband's survivance is not followed by the same result as the survivance of the wife, but I do not think that the provision in regard to the husband has any bearing on the present question.

It has, however, to be observed that throughout the deed this annuity is mentioned as being by way of a provision for the children. There are clauses in the deed in which the word occurs in rather a perplexing manner. But I do not think any of these clauses affect the real question, and without going into the long details of the deed I shall just mention one provision which throws some light on the question. There is a power of apportionment of the provisions in the marriage-contract, which runs thus,—"In regard to the foresaid interest, annuity, capital sums of the provisions hereinbefore made payable by the said Herbert Dolphin, the Reverend John Dolphin, and Jessie Scott Baxter respectively, in favour of the children of the said intended marriage." There you have the interest, annuity, and capital sums, but there is no mention of Mr Baxter in that clause, and his name is omitted just where you would have expected to find it had the annuity provided by him been really one of the things intended to be dealt with by the clause.

If I may venture a conjecture, it is that the whole difficulty of interpreting this deed arises from the fact, which I think I detect, that alterations have been made on revisal, which have somewhat disarranged the scheme which was in the mind of the first framer of it.

I therefore simply take the words in the obligation as they stand, and am of opinion that the annuity ceased on the death of the wife, and that therefore the child has no interest in it.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT answered the question in the negative.

MACKENZIE & KERMACK, W.S.—HENDERSON & CLARK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 134.

June 12, 1888.*
Murray v. County of Middle Ward of Lanark Road Trustees.

THOMAS MURRAY, Pursuer.—Rhind—A. S. D. Thomson.
COUNTY OF MIDDLE WARD OF LANARK ROAD TRUSTEES, Defenders.—Darling—Dykes.

Process—Jury trial—New trial—Surprise.—In an action against road trustees for damages for the death of a child about three years of age, which had crept under a fence on the public road and had been drowned in a burn, through the alleged fault of road trustees in not duly fencing the road, the only defence on record was that the road was sufficiently fenced, and that the child had been negligently allowed by the pursuer, her father, to wander about unattended at the place in question. The pursuer's evidence shewed that there had been other accidents to children at that place, and that he had felt apprehension with regard to it, but he did not prove that he had given any notice of the danger to the defenders. The jury found for the defenders "on the ground of contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer, who, while living in fear of the burn, made no complaint to any authority as to the danger." The pursuer moved for a rule for a new trial on the ground that the contributory negligence which the jury had found proved had not been averred, and that he had therefore been taken by surprise. The Court refused a rule.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Kinnear.
I.

THOMAS MURRAY, miner, Airdrie, raised an action against the County of the Middle Ward of Lanark Road Trustees to recover damages for the death of his daughter, a child of two and a-half years of age, who was drowned through the fault, as he alleged, of the defenders.

The child was drowned in a burn which ran parallel to the public road, near the pursuer's house.

The pursuer averred that the paling by which the road was fenced from the burn was about 3 feet 9 inches high, that the lowest spar was

---

* Decided June 9, 1888.

No. 134.
—
June 12, 1888.
Murray v.
County of Middle Ward of Lanark Road Trustees.

17 inches above the level of the road, and that the child, when playing, fell into the burn through the space between the road and the lowest rail of the fence; further, that the fence was insufficient in respect that the lowest spar was so high as to permit a child such as his to pass easily under the same, and the road was therefore dangerous for children; that the place was a populous one, where it was specially necessary to have an adequate and sufficient fence. He further stated that within a very recent period seven or eight children had fallen through the fence into the burn, and that this was well known to the defenders.

The defenders denied fault. They averred "that on the said day the pursuer's child was negligently allowed by its parents to wander on to the said road without being under the charge of any person, and that the said child crept through beneath the lowest bar of the fence, ... and so fell into the burn. The space between the lowest bar and the road is nine inches."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—The parents of the said child being guilty of gross negligence as libelled, the defenders should be assoilzied.

The action was tried before Lord Kinnear and a jury under this issue, viz.,—"Whether the said Annie Murray was drowned through the fault of the defenders in failing sufficiently to fence the said road, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?"

At the trial the pursuer proved that other children had fallen into the burn, and that he and his neighbours had been apprehensive of danger.

The jury found for the defenders. Their verdict was in these terms: —"The jury find for the defenders on the plea of contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer, who, while living in fear of the burn, made no complaint to any authority as to the danger. The jury recommend that the part of the road in question should be made safe for very young children."

The pursuer moved for a rule on the defenders to shew cause why there should not be a new trial.

Argued for the pursuer;—The jury had been of opinion that the defenders were in fault, but had decided in their favour on the ground of contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer in not complaining to the road trustees of the danger. That was not within the record, and the jury were not entitled to consider it.[1] The pursuer had been taken by surprise, and was entitled to a new trial on that ground.[2] There was really no contributory negligence. The pursuer had no duty to give the defenders warning. The recent case of Greer[3] was applicable to the circumstances, and was decisive in the pursuer's favour.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think we ought not to grant the rule for which the pursuer moves. The question for the jury was whether the event complained of was caused by the defenders' fault,—their fault, that is, in not putting a sufficient fence at the place in question.

I think the pursuer was bound to know all the circumstances connected with this accident, and it is not for him to complain of surprise if, he having proved the facts he did prove, the defenders' counsel founded on these facts in addressing the jury. It was not necessary to set forth these facts in detail, if they were sufficiently set forth to raise the issue, as I think they were. What the jury have added to their verdict is not a new issue.

---

[1] Findlay v. Limerigg Coal Co., May 17, 1861, 23 D. 874, 33 Scot. Jur. 444.
[2] Crawford v. Lusk's Trustees, Oct. 28, 1884, 12 R. 25.
[3] Greer v. Stirlingshire Road Trustees, July 7, 1882, 9 R. 1069.

I think then there is no ground for the complaint that the pursuer suffered in his case from surprise. If not, then there was nothing else but the facts, of which the jury were the best judges, and their verdict on them for the defenders is decisive of the action.

No. 134.
June 12, 1888.
Murray v. County of Middle Ward of Lanark Road Trustees.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I concur. The issue for the jury was whether the child of the pursuer was drowned through the defenders' fault—that is, their exclusive fault. The jury have negatived that issue. Therefore they thought either that the defenders were not in fault, or that they were not exclusively in fault. They were entitled to take either view according as the evidence should be. Now, the evidence stood thus. The burn had been fenced by the defenders. The pursuer thought it was not sufficiently fenced. But for a considerable time it had to his knowledge been fenced as it was at the time of the accident. The jury considered that if the pursuer thought the fence not sufficient it was his duty, not to wait till an accident happened, but to give notice to the defenders that in his opinion their fence was insufficient, in order that the defect might be remedied.

Taking that view of the evidence, they were entitled to say that the fault was not the exclusive fault of the defenders, and their verdict should therefore stand.

Lord Kinnear.—I am of the same opinion. I think this was a good verdict, supported by the evidence. It was proved that the fence was sufficient for all the ordinary purposes for which the road ought to be fenced. But the lowest rail was of such a height that a child of two years of age, if left unattended on the road, might creep below it, and having done so might go across the grass and fall into the burn. This had happened occasionally, though this child was the first that had been drowned in that way. The pursuer led proof that the parents of children and those living near the spot apprehended danger, and had done so for some time, and he proved that other children had fallen into the burn. That being so, he was not taken by surprise by the evidence on which the jury went in returning their verdict, for the defenders' counsel pressed upon the jury that this being all proved, the duty of the pursuer, if he wished the fence to be made so that a young child, if left unattended, could not creep below the rail and then fall into the burn, was to give the defenders some notice that in his opinion the fence should be altered in a particular way so as to make it impossible for a child of two to creep through. It was fair to put that to the jury. They took that view. I concur in one observation of Mr Thomson. I think it was not a case of contributory negligence. I should have been prepared to agree if it had been found that the fault all lay with the pursuer himself. But that was not what the jury found. I do not think the verdict ought to be too narrowly criticised. The jury have found against the pursuer, because he should have given notice to the defenders of his objection to the fence. I think that was a good ground for finding for the defenders.

Lord Trayner.—After what has just been said by Lord Kinnear, who presided at the trial, I think there can be no doubt of the propriety of the verdict. There seemed, during the speech of Mr Thomson, to be a serious question which might arise, and upon which we might technically be obliged to find that he was entitled to a new trial,—that was, that the jury had returned a verdict on the ground of contributory negligence, which was not averred. If that were clear, I am disposed at present to think that a new trial would require to be granted. But I do not so read the record. The issue was whether the defenders were in fault, such fault as led to the death of the child of the pursuer. The defenders' answer was a denial that they were, and an averment of contributory negligence by the pursuer himself. I think the statement made in answer to condescendence 3 is a relevant averment of contributory negligence. It is,—"The defenders aver that on the said day the pursuer's child was negligently allowed by its parents to wander on to the said road without being under the charge of any person, and that the said child crept through beneath the lowest bar of the fence after described, which is situated between the road and the burn, and so fell into the burn." At the trial the jury "found for the defenders on the plea of contributory negligence." There, I think, the verdict proper ceases. What follows in the rest of the verdict is an observation by the jury as regards the duty of the pursuer and of the defenders respectively. They say,—"We choose to add a recommendation to our verdict; we think the defenders should be in future more careful." But the verdict itself is a pure verdict for the defenders on the ground of the pursuer's contributory negligence.

No. 134.

June 12, 1888.
Murray v. County of Middle Ward of Lanark Road Trustees.

THE COURT refused a rule.

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—BRUCE & KERR, W.S.—Agents.

No. 135.

June 12, 1888.*
Raeburn's Trustees.

JAMES SHEPHERD AND OTHERS (Raeburn's Trustees), Petitioners.—H. Johnston.
THE ACCOUNTANT IN BANKRUPTCY, Compearer.—Blair.

Bankruptcy—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), sec. 166—Private trust.—Question, whether private trusts can be brought under the superintendence of the Accountant in Bankruptcy, in terms of the 166th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Trayner.
M.

ROBERT REID RAEBURN died on 7th February 1888, leaving a deed of settlement providing for the management and disposal of his means and estate, and appointing Mr James Shepherd and two others trustees for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the settlement.

On 7th March following the trustees presented a petition to the Junior Lord Ordinary (Trayner), founding upon the 164th, 165th, and 166th sections † of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, and praying that an

---

* Decided March 20, 1888.

† Section 164,—"It shall be competent to one or more creditors of parties deceased to the amount of £100, or to persons having an interest in the succession of such parties, in the event of the deceased having left no settlement appointing trustees or other parties having power to manage his estate or part thereof, or in the event of such parties not accepting or acting, to apply by summary petition to either Division of the Court for the appointment of a judicial factor, and, after such intimation of the petition to the creditors of the deceased, and other persons interested, as may be considered necessary, and after hearing parties, the Court may appoint such factor, subject to such conditions as to caution, and such other conditions as the Court may provide by Act of Sederunt; and such factor shall manage the estate, recover debts due to it, realise the effects by public or private sale, as may be most expedient, dispose of the heritable estate by public sale or private bargain, according to such directions as the Court, on report of the Accountant, may give, and shall apply the free proceeds, after defraying all expenses in payment of the claims of creditors according to their several rights and preferences, conformably to a state of funds and scheme of division to be prepared by him, and considered and approved of

No. 135.

—

June 12, 1888.
Raeburn's Trustees.

order should be granted "on the Accountant in Bankruptcy to superintend the administration of the estate of the said Robert Reid Raeburn, in order that the estate may be managed, the debts due to it recovered, the moveable effects realised by public or private sale, as may be most expedient, the heritable estate disposed of by public sale or private bargain according to such directions as the Court on the report of the Accountant may give; and that the free proceeds, after defraying all expenses, may be applied in payment of the claims of creditors, according to their several rights and preferences, conformably to a state of funds and scheme of division to be prepared by the said trustees, and considered and approved of by the Court on a report by the Accountant, and that the trustees may thereafter account for the residue, if any, after payment of debts and expenses to the said Rebecca Scott Raeburn, her heirs, executors, and assignees, all in terms of the provisions contained in said recited sections of the said Act," &c.

It was stated that the amount of the debts due by the deceased exceeded the estimated value of the assets, which consisted chiefly of house property. The parties interested in the estate were all of full age.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner) reported the case, in view principally of the opinions which had been expressed by the Court in the case of Tweedie, Jan. 22, 1858, 20 D. 438, and of the fact that in practice the provisions of the 166th section had not been brought into operation.

The Court directed intimation to be made to the Accountant in Bankruptcy.

When the case was called on 20th March following, appearance was made for the Accountant in Bankruptcy, and a letter was read in which he stated that he had been informed by the Lord Advocate that his Lordship did not consider he should oppose the granting of the petition, provided the Court were satisfied that the statute applied, and that the trust was one which should be brought under its provisions.

The petitioner accordingly moved the Court for an order in terms of the prayer of the petition upon the Accountant in Bankruptcy, to supervise the administration of the trust.

The LORD PRESIDENT asked whether there was any machinery or regulations regarding the procedure which would necessarily have to be taken.

---

by the Court, on a report by the Accountant; and thereafter the factor shall account for the residue, if any, after payment of debts and expenses, to the parties having a right to the deceased succession: Provided that the Accountant shall annually examine and audit the proceedings, intromissions, and accounts of such factor, which shall be duly transmitted for that purpose, and report to the Court thereon, from time to time, as he may deem expedient, and shall generally exercise the like powers and discharge the same duties with regard to him as he is empowered and required to exercise and discharge with regard to a trustee under a sequestration, but subject always to the control of the Lord Ordinary or the Court."

Section 165 provided,—"The Court shall have full power to regulate by Act of Sederunt the caution to be found by such factor, the mode in which he shall proceed in realising and dividing the funds, and otherwise in the discharge of his duties, and any other matter which they may deem necessary."

Section 166,—"If a party deceased has left a settlement, appointing trustees, or other parties having power to manage his estate as aforesaid, it shall nevertheless be competent for the trustees under the settlement, with or without concurrence of the creditors of the deceased and of the persons interested in his succession, to apply in like manner to the Court, and obtain from them an order on the Accountant to superintend the administration of the estate, in which case he shall exercise the like powers and discharge the like duties, under the control of the Lord Ordinary or the Court, which have been provided for in the preceding sections."

No. 135.

June 12, 1888.
Raeburn's Trustees.

It was submitted for the petitioners that the 166th section provided that the Accountant should exercise under that section like powers and discharge like duties as he did under the 164th and 165th sections, and so the Act of Sederunt, which was passed in virtue of the powers conferred upon the Court by the 165th section, would apply. Therefore, until a special Act of Sederunt was passed applicable to the case of trusts, the Accountant would simply regulate procedure by that Act of Sederunt, so far as applicable to the case of trustees. On examining the Act of Sederunt it would be seen that its provisions, other than those for judicial factors finding caution, were all applicable to the case of trustees, provided the words "judicial factor" were read as "the trustees," and "the date of the judicial factor's appointment" were read as "the date of the order of the Court placing the trust under the supervision of the Accountant."

LORD PRESIDENT.—I cannot help thinking that whoever framed the 166th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, hardly foresaw, what nevertheless was the obvious result of it, that if it was to be carried into operation anything like generally, the administration of private trusts would be all carried out at the public expense. I do not think that was the intention of Parliament, and after what occurred in the case of Tweedie (20 D. 438) so far back as the year 1858, since which time no attempt has ever been made to bring this section into operation, it would be very rash on our part to grant the prayer of the petition. If we are to entertain the matter at all, I think we must appoint the cause to be heard before the whole Court.

LORD ADAM.—If there is a distinct provision in an Act of Parliament that trustees should have the benefit of a certain course of procedure, and that private trusts should be managed at the public expense, I do not see that considerations of administration, machinery, and expense can prevent the Court from giving effect to the statutory provisions. But after the case of Tweedie, I think we have no course open to us but to consult the whole Court.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

The case was accordingly continued till the Summer session, in order that, if the trustees desired to press it, it might be sent to the whole Court, but no further procedure took place.

MILL & BONAR, W.S.—THE CROWN AGENT—Agents.

No. 136.

June 14, 1888.
Lockhart v. Brown.

N. & N. LOCKHART, Pursuers (Respondents).—Jameson—G. W. Burnet.
JOHN BROWN, Defender (Reclaimer).—H. Johnston—G. R. Gillespie.

Partnership—Joint adventure—Sale.—W B, a retail dealer in nets and other fishing apparatus, wrote to a manufacturer giving him an order for a quantity of nets, and stating,—"This order is only for one of our six boats, but I wish to get this lot and let our men see them, and then I can order for the rest."

On W B's bankruptcy it appeared that he and his brother J B were joint owners of several fishing-boats, and the manufacturer raised an action against J B for the price of the nets, alleging that before the date of the order he and W B had entered into a joint adventure for the purchase and fitting out of fishing-boats, and that the order had been given by W B on behalf of the joint adventure, and that the goods had been sold and delivered for its behoof. J B denied this. It was proved that the pursuer had supplied to W B unrigged nets, with suitable rigging for them, and that W B had supplied to the joint adventure at retail prices rigged nets (which were much more valuable than unrigged nets), but it was not proved that the unrigged nets furnished by the pursuer were among those supplied by W B as rigged nets to the joint adventure. Held (rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren) (1) that the joint adventurers were not parties to the contract with the pursuer; and (2) that the goods furnished by the pursuer were not in rem versum of the joint adventure, and defender assoilzied.

No. 136.
—
June 14, 1888.
Lockhart v. Brown.

MESSRS N. & N. LOCKHART, flax-spinners and net-manufacturers in Kirkcaldy, sued John Brown, Freefield Ironworks, Lerwick, for payment of £162, 10s. 3d., with interest, being the price of certain nets and ropes supplied by them in the course of the year 1883 on the order of William Brown, the defender's brother,* on behalf, as the pursuers alleged, of a joint adventure in certain fishing-boats. William Brown had since become bankrupt.

1st Division.
Lord M'Laren.
M.

The pursuers stated that both joint adventurers were bound to contribute to the stock in trade of the adventure, the defender having to provide the boats, and William the nets, gearing, and stores. They admitted that the order for the goods came from William, but alleged that when they received it they were aware that he was acting in partnership with some one else, whom they ascertained after William's bankruptcy to be the defender.

The defender stated that his business was that of blacksmith and iron-merchant, and that his brother was a grocer and general merchant, and also carried on in separate premises a retail business as ship-chandler in nets, ropes, buoys, &c., in which he (the defender) had no interest; that he and his brother each supplied half the funds for their joint adventure in five or six fishing-boats, partly in fittings and supplies from their respective businesses, and partly in cash; and that each of them charged against the joint adventure the retail prices of his business; that the nets in question were supplied to William after orders had been solicited from him by the pursuers, and in connection with his retail business, and on his order, and for his account only; that they were not in point of fact supplied to the boats belonging to the joint adventure, and that if any of them were they were rigged and prepared for sea when so supplied, and their value thus increased nearly 50 per cent beyond what it was when they were in the raw state; that at the time in question William was getting nets from four other well-known makers, who were named.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The said goods having been ordered and sold and delivered on account of the said partnership or joint adventure, the defender is liable in payment of their price.

The defender pleaded;—The pursuers' statements being unfounded in fact, the defender is entitled to be assoilzied.

It appeared from the proof that each of the two brothers had an equal share in the profits of the joint adventure, and that it was part of the agreement that each should supply goods at retail prices for it. It was proved that the nets furnished by the pursuers were unrigged nets, with the

---

* The first order from William Brown to Messrs Lockhart was as follows:—"Gentlemen,—Some time ago you sent me your price-list of nets, and requesting an order, which I can now send you, and which I hope you will send on as soon as possible. This order is only for one of our six boats, but I wish to get this lot and let our men see them, and then I can order for the rest. As I have had nets which has not pleased our men from other places, and which came to be a serious loss to both our men and ourselves, but as I come to learn you have sent some to our town already, which have given satisfaction, so I trust it may be a mutual benefit, so will you please send as undernoted as soon as possible, and oblige.—Yours, &c., WILLIAM BROWN."

No. 136.

June 14, 1888.
Lockhart v.
Brown.

materials for rigging them, and that these were disposed of after being rigged up along with the other goods in William Brown's shop. The nets furnished by him to the joint adventure were rigged nets. William Brown deponed,—"The price of unrigged nets varies, but I should say 30s. would be a very fair price. Rigged nets range about 63s. or 64s.—that is, for a cotton net." The nets furnished by William Brown to the joint adventure were charged at retail prices, and each brother kept a pass-book with a note of everything he put into the adventure charged at the retail price. It was not proved that all of the pursuers' nets were supplied to the joint adventure, and it appeared that he bought nets from several other makers besides the pursuers.

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren), on 10th January 1888, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the sum sued for is the price of goods supplied to account of a joint trade in which the defender was a partner, and that the price is resting owing and unpaid: Therefore decerns against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the action," &c.*

---

* "Opinion.—This is an action at the instance of a firm of net manufacturers carrying on business in Kirkcaldy, against one of the joint owners of certain fishing-boats trading at Lerwick, for the price of nets supplied to the joint adventure.

"The defender John Brown and his brother William Brown were the chief owners of the fishing-boats, the only other owners being the fishermen who worked the boats and who according to custom received each a small share in the boat which he assisted in working, in order that he might have an interest in the safety of the boat and an inducement to maintain it in good repair.

"It is in evidence that the defender kept the accounts of the joint trade, but that his brother William Brown took the chief part in the ordering of nets and fishing gear for the boats and provisions for the men. William Brown kept a shop at Lerwick from which he supplied the boats with provisions, and the defence is that the nets were supplied by William Brown in his capacity of tradesman; that he ordered nets from makers on his credit as a tradesman, passed them into his stock, and from that stock supplied such quantities of nets and other gear as might be necessary for the purposes of the joint trade. Hence, it is argued, there is no contract relation between John Brown and the manufacturers who supplied the material which eventually went into the fishing concern.

"I am of opinion that this defence is more ingenious than sound.

"It does not appear to me that the case raises any substantial question depending on the differences between joint trade and partnership. The chief difference of course is that in a proper partnership the acting partner has a universal power to bind his co-traders for goods ordered on account of the firm, and therefore it is not necessary that a manufacturer or wholesale merchant suing for the price of his goods should prove that the goods were in fact applied to the purposes of the partnership trade. In an action against a defender who is not sued as a partner, but as a joint trader, it is, if not in every case strictly necessary, yet in all cases very material to the cause of action, to inquire whether the goods supplied were of the description covered by the agreement for joint trade, and whether the goods were in fact applied to the purposes of the joint trade. In the present case the evidence satisfies me that both questions must be answered in the affirmative, and it does not satisfy me that there is any substance or reality in the defence that the nets were purchased by William Brown in his capacity of private trader, and supplied to the joint adventure upon a separate and independent contract of sale.

"The chief witnesses to facts were the defender and his brother. Their evidence, which is perhaps more copious than necessary for the purposes of the case, deals largely with the history of the joint trade, and the manner in which it was carried on. A considerable part of this evidence relates to matters which are not in dispute, and which do not call for observation from me.

"But when these witnesses come to speak of the particular transaction, their

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—On the facts it was proved (1) that William had no authority to order goods for the joint adventure; (2) that the nets came to him in a raw state, and were afterwards prepared by him for sea; and (3) that the adventure was charged a full retail price over and above what was charged by the pursuers. Further, the pursuers had never inquired whether William had any partners associated with him, and did not in fact know that he had any until after William's sequestration. The case turned upon the question, what was the true contract between the parties? and it was clear from the facts that there were two separate transactions—(1) the purchase from the pursuers by William, and (2) the purchase from William by the joint adventure. The facts were very different from those in the previous case of Moodie.[1]

Argued for the pursuers;—On the facts the reality of the case was that the goods were ordered by William for the joint adventure in which he evidence is evidently coloured by the argumentative view of it, which they have perhaps persuaded themselves is well founded; and it is my distinct impression that their statements on this subject cannot be accepted without large reserves.

"1. It is evident that William Brown had authority to order nets and fishing gear for the joint trade.

"2. In his first letter to the pursuers William Brown stated that he was in want of nets for 'our six boats,' and gave what he professed to be a trial order. I understand that there were then only five boats belonging to the joint adventure, but there had been another which was disposed of. No other meaning has been suggested as applicable to the expression 'our six boats,' and I read this as an order for nets on account of the joint trade.

"3. Other orders were given at short intervals extending over a period of six months, and in the absence of any distinguishing direction I consider that the pursuers were entitled to treat these as orders for the account of the owners of the six boats.

"4. The defender has failed to prove that the nets supplied by the pursuers were in fact applied to other purposes than that of the joint fishing trade.

"5. The defender has shewn that his brother did to some extent supply nets in the course of his business as a general dealer, but it is not likely that William Brown would order nets of the value sued for on the chance of disposing of them, and without reference to a specific order.

"6. The defender kept the accounts of the joint trade, and I think that there was a certain duty cast on him to see that the obligations of the fishing adventure were duly met. In a question with creditors of the adventure, he was not justified in shutting his eyes to their claims, and treating the obligations of himself and the other owners as matters which only affected the accounting between himself and his brother.

"7. The nets of the fishing adventure were stored in a store belonging to the defender, and were insured in the joint names of himself and his brother. When the store and its contents were destroyed by fire the defender recovered £1200 from the insurance company for the value of goods stored (chiefly nets), and divided this money among the joint adventures, apparently without making any inquiry as to whether the makers of the stored property had been paid.

"This action on the part of the defender may no doubt be represented as being consistent with his view that the nets were supplied by his brother, and that he had no individual responsibility to the makers. But it is also consistent with the supposition that the two joint traders, one of whom was a man of means and the other impecunious, had arranged to divide the money, which ought to have been applied in meeting their trade obligations, and to relegate the payment of the debts of the undertaking to the chapter of accidents.

"There are other points in the evidence on which comment might be made; but I think I have said enough to indicate the grounds of my opinion, which is, that the defender is responsible in law and in equity for the debt sued on."

[1] Lockharts v. Moodie & Co., June 8, 1877, 4 R. 859.

No. 136.

June 14, 1888.
Lockhart v. Brown.

was engaged along with the defender. There were two joint adventures—the first between the brothers, who between them created the subject of the second—in which they took part along with the fishermen. Admitting that the joint concern was not avowed,—which was indeed the ordinary case,—there was, in the language of Mr Bell,[1] "a credit raised on the combined responsibility" of the two partners. Further, and in any view, the nets were in rem versum of the adventure, and that was a sufficient ground of liability.

Lord President.—In this case there was undoubtedly a joint adventure between the two brothers, John Brown and William Brown, for fitting out and using fishing-boats on the fishing-grounds near Lerwick. William Brown, one of the joint adventurers, who is now bankrupt, was a general merchant, and among other things dealt to a considerable extent in nets and other fishing-apparatus. The other partner, John Brown, the present defender, was an ironmonger, and it was very naturally arranged between them that they should supply for the use of the joint adventure the goods in which they respectively dealt. That is the import of the evidence of the two brothers, and I do not see any reason to doubt its accuracy. There is no imputation against their honesty upon any general grounds, and there is nothing at all improbable in the account which they give of the conditions upon which the joint adventure was entered upon.

Now, William Brown, in pursuance of his undertaking and arrangement to furnish nets, ropes, and other things that were required for the boats, put himself in communication with the Messrs Lockhart, the pursuers. Having received from them in November 1882 a letter containing their price-list, he wrote a letter, ordering a certain quantity of nets, in which he thus expresses himself,—"Some time ago you sent me your price-list of nets, and requesting an order, which I can now send you, and which I hope you will send on as soon as possible. This order is only for one of our six boats, but I wish to get this lot and let our men see them, and then I can order for the rest. As I have had nets which has not pleased our men from other places, and which came to be a serious loss to both our men and ourselves," he expresses the hope that these gentlemen will do better. There are some other letters following very much in the same style in which William Brown speaks of requiring nets for "our boats." It was not disclosed in any of these letters to the pursuers what the joint adventure between the two brothers was, nor, indeed, that there was any joint adventure whatever. All that was disclosed, so far as I can see, in these letters, was that someone else was interested in the particular set of boats besides William Brown. That, I think, is the utmost that can be made out of them. The goods in question were furnished between 28th March and 9th August 1883. The account which was rendered by the pursuers to William Brown, in terms of the order they had received from him, amounted to £187, 5s. 3d., with a certain discount off, and that is substantially and in fact the account for which the defender is now sued.

The ground of action, as I understand it, is that William Brown having ordered these nets, they were supplied to him not for his own use, but for the use of the joint adventure, and that the joint adventure got the benefit of the transaction. I think it is upon that question that the whole case depends—viz., whether the joint adventure got the benefit of the contract between the pursuers and William Brown. I think that the pursuers have not only failed to prove that, but that the contrary has been established. It appears to me that upon the evidence, both parole and documentary, it is quite clearly made out that William Brown purchased from the pursuers the nets mentioned in the order, at certain wholesale prices. He received delivery of the nets, and before he sold them again he performed certain operations upon them and added certain materials to them which converted them really into different goods from those that he had himself bought from the pursuers. They were simply nets as they came from the pursuers, but they were afterwards furnished and made up ready for use as sold to other persons; and therefore supposing that all the nets that were bought by William Brown from the pursuers were really put into the joint adventure, they were put into the joint adventure, not in the same specific form in which they were bought from the pursuers, but there were certain alterations made on them which converted them really into other goods from those that formed the subject of the contract between William Brown and the pursuers.

---

[1] Bell's Comms. (6th edn.) ii. 539.

Then, again, the price which was charged for the nets as between William and the joint adventure was totally different,—being a very much higher price than that which was stipulated for in the contract between William Brown and the pursuers.

Now, in these circumstances, it appears to me to be perfectly impossible to say that the joint adventure got the benefit of the contract which was entered into between William Brown and the pursuers. They neither got the goods that formed the subject of the contract, nor did they get them at the contract price, but at a totally different and retail price instead of at the wholesale price. The question whether the whole of the nets that were bought from the pursuers by William Brown really came into the custody of the joint adventurers and their fishermen is perhaps not of very much consequence, but it has certainly not been established, and is not very probable, that the whole of the nets represented in the account sued for reached the hands of the joint adventurers. William Brown was a man dealing in nets to a considerable extent, and not merely in nets, but in all sorts of apparatus of that kind. He was buying from several wholesale dealers besides the pursuers, and he was selling these to various parties besides the joint adventurers. But the ground of judgment which appears to me unassailable is that this contract never was taken up by the joint adventurers at all. The joint adventurers never got the benefit of it, nor did they get delivery of the goods that were the subject of the contract, nor at the price stipulated for in the contract.

It appears to me, therefore, that the legal view of this case is that the only contract that the pursuers had was with William Brown as an individual. They were not aware of the joint adventure, and they must have trusted to William Brown alone in their contract. If it could be shewn that the goods were in rem versum of the joint adventure in the proper sense of that term, the mere circumstance that they had originally trusted to the credit of William Brown alone would not disentitle them to recover in this action. But unfortunately, in my view, they have entirely failed to establish that the joint adventure got any benefit from this contract in any sense or form whatever.

It appears to me that the case which is nearest to this, and indeed quite parallel to it, is the case of Whyte v. M'Intyre, 3 D. 334. In that case two persons acquired a piece of urban building ground as a joint adventure. One of them was a builder, and he undertook at a certain price to erect certain buildings upon the ground at a lump contract price. In executing his contract he employed other tradesmen under special contracts, and among others a bricklayer, who was to build certain portions of the tenements which he was erecting, in so far as they were to be made of brick. The builder became bankrupt, and the bricklayer who had performed his contract to the builder sued the other solvent joint adventurer, Whyte, just as the Lockharts are suing John Brown here, and the answer made was that he, the bricklayer, had contracted with the builder only, and that although he was one of the two joint adventurers it was not in that capacity he contracted, but alone. No doubt in one sense of the word the joint adventure got the benefit of the bricklayer's materials and work, because the brick building was erected upon the ground, but then the Court held that the labour and materials of the bricklayer were not in rem versum of the joint adventurers, but were really in rem versum of the builder. Lord Mackenzie expressed his view of the matter thus,—"The furnishings by the pursuer were not in rem versum of the copartnery, but in rem versum of Reid, enabling him to fulfil his contract with Whyte, or with the joint adventure, and giving him right to the stipulated price for it. If a company contract with a builder to erect a house for them, on their lands, the workmen or tradesmen employed by the builder cannot demand payment from the company on the ground of in rem versum. The works or furnishings are in rem of the contractor, not the company, who are bound to receive them from him and to pay him for them." And Lord Fullerton says,—"The pursuer's claim, if it has any foundation at all, must rest on the other ground; that where a joint adventure exists, although not known to the public, a third party dealing with an individual partner, and on the credit of that individual alone, may have the benefit of a joint liability against the socii, if the dealing, though nominally with the individual partner, is truly and substantially one with the joint adventure itself, out of which the joint adventure is to take the benefit through the medium of the act of the partners."

Now, in like manner here, the contract between the pursuers and William Brown is a distinct contract for enabling the latter to perform his undertaking to the joint adventure. He proposed to furnish the joint adventure with the nets that they required, and to enable him to do so he ordered these nets from the pursuers. The cases are, I think, exactly parallel, and they both stand upon the same footing in point of law, that where an original contract is made upon the credit of an individual partner who gives an order to a tradesman who has no knowledge of the existence of a joint adventure, and the goods are supplied, he, the tradesman, cannot recover from the joint adventure unless he can shew that the joint adventure has received the benefit of the contract which he has made, and the goods which he has delivered under the contract. I am sorry to say, therefore, that I am driven to differ from the Lord Ordinary and to hold that the defender is entitled to be assoilzied.

LORD MURE.—It appears to me that the evidence of the two brothers in this case is very distinct as to the nature of the joint adventure which they had entered into, and as to what the position of each of them was to be. William Brown was fixed upon to be the manager of the concern; and they were each to furnish a part of what was necessary to carry on the adventure. The defender John Brown was to contribute the boats, and other things which were necessary for the fitting up of the boats. William Brown was to contribute the nets that were necessary for carrying on the fishing.

Now, I see no reason to doubt the truth of this statement of the two brothers, and I am unable from the letter that was so strongly founded upon by Mr Burnet, or from any other documentary evidence, to draw the inference that the statement of the brothers is not to be relied upon. In that letter William no doubt orders nets for "our boats," but the rest of the letter is otherwise worded, for he says "some time ago you sent me your price-list and requesting an order which I can now send you, and which I hope you will send on as soon as possible. This order is only for one of our six boats, but I wish to get this lot, and let our men see them, and then I can order for the rest." Then he states certain reasons for ordering nets from the pursuers, as those he had had from other manufacturers were not good.

Now, the nets were furnished upon that request, and sent to William Brown as an individual. When he gets them they are not fit for use, and he puts them into order by fitting them up with gearing for the use of the boats, and upon that being done he in terms of his contract furnishes them to the joint adventure, and to the fishermen whom they employed, for the use of the boats. William Brown was also a dealer in nets, and he therefore retailed these nets with their fittings to the joint adventure, at a profit just as he did to others. It appears from the evidence that he purchased nets from other people as well as from the Messrs Lockhart, and supplied them to the joint adventure as well as to other people. That is all perfectly consistent with what the two brothers say, and that being so, the case falls distinctly within the rule referred to by your Lordship as given effect to in the case of Whyte v. M'Intyre, where it was thus laid down by Lord Fullerton in dealing with the large class of cases of this description,—"But there is another class of cases to which that principle will clearly not apply. Such are the cases referred to by some of your Lordships in which a party to a joint adventure has agreed to put into the common stock a certain quantity of goods, or a certain sum of money, and in order to fulfil this agreement to his partners has a separate dealing with a third party in his own name and on his own credit, from whom he gets the goods or money. In such cases the individual partner is neither ostensibly nor really acting for the joint concern, as may be at once seen by considering that the joint adventure has no interest whatever in the terms of that dealing. In such cases I think there is no principle for holding the socii jointly liable, as the dealing of the individual is not joint in point of law." And upon these grounds I concur with your Lordship in holding that we must give effect to that decision.

Lord Shand.—I think the first matter to be ascertained in cases of this class is, what was the contract between the parties who entered into the joint adventure, because when the Court is in possession of the facts as to the nature of the contract it will not be difficult, generally speaking, to answer the question whether there is liability or not,—assuming always that the parties have acted in terms of the contract. The actings of parties will, of course, shew whether they have varied the terms of the contract or acted in accordance with it.

And so, I think, the first question to be ascertained here is, what was the contract between the two brothers, William and John Brown, in regard to the joint adventure which they had in five, and it may be six, of these fishing-boats. Now, the evidence is all one way on this subject. There is no written agreement about it, and it was according to the exigency of the pursuers' case necessary that there should be proof of the terms of the contract by the evidence of the two brothers themselves. Accordingly the pursuers put these two persons, John Brown and William Brown, into the witness-box. William, in a single passage of his evidence, puts the contract in this way,—"The understanding my brother and I had as to supplies for the boats was that I should provide whatever I had in my shops. I was to charge the current prices I was charging other people. In addition to that I was to have the supplying of the men with provisions, charging in that case also the current rates." Then his brother is examined on the same subject, and says,—"The understanding was that he (William) should provide whatever he had in his stores or shops, as a general merchant, that the boats required, and that I should provide whatever blacksmith work and other things I might have requisite for the boats out of my business; and we were each to charge the regular trade prices of the place, the retail prices. I thought my brother would be able to do something in the way of paying for the hulls of the boats, but after the first one I had to pay for all the rest." It appears to me, as the result of that evidence, that the arrangement and agreement between these two brothers was that each of them was to put material into the joint adventure, and thus to contribute part of the subject of the joint adventure. John apparently had hopes that his brother William would aid him in putting in part of the original cost of the hulls of the boats. William failed to do this, and John was obliged to put in the hulls of the boats himself—all except the first—and he also put in such ironmongery and other things as he could supply at retail prices. William, on the other hand, supplied a great many other things to the boats, such as nets, ropes, and other things that the boats required, also at retail prices. It appears to me, as the result of that agreement, that whatever each gave out of his own shop was to form part of the subject of the joint adventure, that these furnishings were to be the joint adventurers' respective contributions, and in the accounting between the two in the joint adventure each became a creditor of the joint adventure for their respective furnishings. It appears that this arrangement excluded the idea that one brother was entitled to pledge the credit of the other for anything that he purchased. Each was to give his contribution. If the one brother thought fit to make a purchase he was entitled to do so, and place the article in his own store, and then to supply it to the joint adventure. He himself, and not the person from whom he bought it, was to supply the article to the joint adventure, so unless there is something in the actings of the parties that runs counter to that agreement it does not appear to me that there can be any liability upon the defender. So far from there being anything of this kind in the actings of the parties, I think everything squares with it. We find that the accounts of the brothers were settled upon that footing. Each kept pass-books containing a note of everything that he put into the concern, and for these each became a creditor of the joint adventure. William became a creditor of John, and John a creditor of William for these things, and it may be also of the fishermen for goods supplied to them by each from his shop or store. When the accounts came to be settled, the amount of the account of each creditor was carried into the general account, and the balance due to each was settled year after year on the footing of the agreement as I have explained it. Further, we find that the nets which were supplied by William to the concern were not necessarily or exclusively the nets the price of which is here sued for, but were just nets taken out of his general store. It is, I think, proved that a large number of the nets that came from the Messrs Lockhart were so supplied to the joint adventure; but I am not by any means satisfied that all of them were. There is evidence to shew that a considerable profit was made upon those nets that were fitted or rigged up, and indeed after they came into William's hands they practically became different goods. As has been pointed out, there was a great deal of work done by William, and indeed so much was this the case that the nets really became new goods before they left his hands and went either into the stock of the joint adventure or into the hands of other purchasers. I do not think it would have made any difference if the whole of the nets had gone into the boats belonging to the joint adventure and had been even charged for at the wholesale prices, because the agreement was that anything William contributed in this way was to be put in as his contribution, for which he was to become a creditor of the adventure. Upon the whole, and having in view the matters to which I have referred, I think the case is clear.

Mr Burnet made a point upon the terms of the letter or order of 16th February 1883, in which William Brown uses the expression "one of our six boats," and speaks of ordering for the rest afterwards. I do not doubt that a merchant getting that order might perhaps not unnaturally think that he was to have other people answerable to him for the joint adventure over and above the writer. But I am not satisfied that William Brown meant this when he wrote of "one of our six boats" and of ordering for the rest afterwards. The language is very loose. But, surely, if there was any doubt, and the risk being with the manufacturers, it was for them to inquire on whose credit the goods were ordered. They knew nothing of the joint adventure, or that the goods were ordered or intended for a joint adventure, beyond the expression "our boats" used in the letter, and so they could not have had the liability of any particular person except him who gave the order in their minds. If they were not satisfied with the credit of William Brown by himself, they should have declined to supply the goods on his credit alone. But, even supposing that William Brown had ordered the goods not for himself but as for his copartner, I still think he could not have fixed liability upon the joint adventure, for he had no power to do so, and it was not consistent with the agreement of the brothers that he should do so. This letter forms a piece of evidence on the question of liability, but it is nothing more.

That being so, I am unable to agree with the Lord Ordinary in what I rather think is the fundamental finding of his judgment, that William Brown had authority to order nets and fishing-gear for the joint trade. If that means that William Brown had authority to order nets, and to pledge the credit of the joint adventure, then I think the proof does not shew that. On the contrary, I think the proof shews he had no such authority. He had authority to supply nets out of his own stock in trade for the purposes of the business of the joint adventure, but I do not think his authority went beyond that.

In the case of Lockhart v. Moodie & Co., 4 R. 859, I put the question in my opinion in this way,—"The question is whether Mackenzie was acting for himself alone, with the view of afterwards selling the yarn as his own property to the joint adventure, or was really acting for the joint concern in making the purchase." And upon the evidence I came to the conclusion that in making the purchase he acted for the concern. It was the first and single transaction for the joint account, and the two persons who were acting together got the benefit of it, and gave a joint acceptance for the price. And I put the same question here, whether William Brown was acting for himself with the view of afterwards selling to the joint adventure, or was really acting for the joint adventure in making the purchase. I answer that clearly to the effect that he was not acting for the joint adventure, but for himself, and that the nets so purchased went into his own stock; and he having bought the nets and made them part of his own stock sold them to the joint adventure, of which he thereafter became a creditor for the amount of their value. So I am of opinion that the liability alleged against John Brown has not been established.

No. 136.
June 14, 1888.
Lockhart v. Brown.

Lord Adam.—I do not think it was doubtful on the evidence in this case that the terms of the joint adventure were that the one brother John should supply the boats and iron work necessary for the boats, and that the other brother William should supply the nets and gearing necessary for the crew, the one being a dealer in iron and the other a general dealer, supplying nets, and such like goods. One of the terms of the joint adventure was that the one brother should supply commodities in which he dealt at retail prices, and that the other brother should do the same, just as he did to other people. The evidence of the two brothers is clear upon that subject, and it is the only parole evidence in the case; and it appears to me that the account books of the joint adventure and of the two brothers which have been produced are in entire conformity with the parole evidence, and prove to my mind beyond doubt that these were the terms of the joint adventure as between the two brothers.

Now that being so, it appears to me that the books and accounts prove beyond question that such of these nets as were purchased or supplied by the pursuers—not all of them—but so many of them as passed into the possession of the joint adventurers—passed into their possession under a contract of sale between William and the concern, in terms of the contract of joint adventure, and on no other terms. I think the books shew that clearly, because the nets are charged not at the price at which they would have been charged if they had been bought by William, not for himself, but for the joint adventure, in which case they would have been charged at the wholesale price. They are charged just at the retail price, in other words, they are just sold by William to the joint adventure. And that being so, it humbly appears to me that upon the facts of the case, so far as we have got them, the pursuers can have no claim whatever for the price of the nets which they sold to William, and which William in his turn sold to the joint adventure.

The only other part of the case which remains relates to the terms of William's letter ordering the nets, and which is said to imply that he, William, was acting on behalf of other people besides himself. That may possibly be maintained on one reading of the letter, but the answer is this, that the terms of the joint adventure being what I think they were, William had no power whatever to bind his brother in any such terms. It would make no difference in my mind although the letter had borne that it was written on behalf of the joint adventure, because William had no power to bind his brother for any nets which he had bought for himself.

The Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and assoilzied the defender from the conclusions of the summons.

Watt & Anderson, S.S.C.—Mackenzie & Kermack, W.S.—Agents.

No. 137.

June 14, 1888.
Lawson v. Grangemouth Dockyard Co.

JOSEPH LAWSON, Pursuer (Respondent).—C. S. Dickson—Wilson.
GRANGEMOUTH DOCKYARD COMPANY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—
Balfour—Ure.

Ship—Salvage or towage services—Measure of award.—In approaching a port which had a very narrow entrance, a steam-vessel ran for about one-sixth of her length upon a bank composed of loose stones and mud, at that time under water, it being high tide. In answer to signals of distress a tug which was passing outside with a sailing-vessel in tow cast the vessel off, and at some risk, and with the loss of her hawser and other damage, requiring her detention for two days in port, drew the steam-ship off the bank.

In an action by the tug-owners against the owners of the steam-ship for payment of £500 as salvage, the Lord Ordinary (Fraser), although of opinion that the steam-ship had not been in a position of serious danger, awarded £50. On a reclaiming note by the defenders the Court adhered, holding that whether the services rendered were proper salvage services or not, they were at least towage services of an extraordinary kind, and that the award was not excessive.

Shipping Law—Salvage—Expenses of action—Merchant Shipping Acts, 1854 (Act 17 and 18 Vict. cap. 104), sec. 460, and 1862 (Act 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 63), sec. 49.—By the 460th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, it is provided that in disputes with reference to salvage claims, "if the claimants in such dispute do not recover . . . . a greater sum than two hundred pounds, they shall not, unless the Court certifies that the case is a fit one to be tried in a superior Court, recover any . . . expenses incurred by them in the prosecution of their claim."

In a salvage case, in which the Lord Ordinary gave decree for £50 and certified that the case was one fit to be tried in a superior Court, the Court held that the certificate had been properly given.

Observed that the Inner-House will be slow to interfere with the exercise by the Lord Ordinary of his discretion in regard to the granting of such a certificate, and that the circumstances of the case were such as justified the Lord Ordinary in granting it.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Fraser.
M.

ON 20th October 1887 the s.s. "Tabasqueno" was returning to Grangemouth from her trial trip, when she ran upon the bank or breakwater on the west side of the entrance to the river Carron, and remained fast. The steam-tug "Tweed," which was passing, was hailed to assist her, but failed to tow her off, and signals were then made to another tug steamer, which turned out to be the "Cruiser," and was engaged in towing a vessel past the entrance of the harbour down the Forth. The "Cruiser" cast off the sailing vessel, and after about half-an-hour's work in concert with the "Tweed" managed to draw the "Tabasqueno" off the bank.

This was an action for payment of £500 of salvage brought by Joseph Lawson, the owner of the "Cruiser," against the Grangemouth Dockyard Company, the owners of the "Tabasqueno."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defenders' vessel having been stranded and in imminent danger of being wrecked, and the pursuer's tug having saved her, the pursuer is entitled to salvage. (2) The sum sued for in name of salvage and compensation being reasonable and moderate, the pursuer is entitled to decree therefor, with interest and expenses, as concluded for.

The defenders made a tender of £20, and pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer is not entitled to compensation as for salvage, the services rendered by the said steam-tug "Cruiser" being towage and not salvage services.

It appeared from the proof that the bank or breakwater on which the "Tabasqueno" ran was composed of loose stones resting on a bank of mud; that the depth of the stones was from six to eight feet; that the bank was covered with water, it being full tide, and about 5 P.M., when the accident took place; that the "Tabasqueno" was going at a high

No. 137.
June 14, 1888.
Lawson v. Grangemouth Dockyard Co.

rate of speed, and ran at least one-sixth of her whole length of 160 feet on to the bank; that the breach in the bank was about nine feet wide, and its depth about six feet; that the tug "Tweed" was first hailed to the assistance of the stranded steamer, but failed to draw her off; that signals were thereafter made from the "Tweed," but apparently at the instigation of those on board of the "Tabasqueno," to another tug steamer, the "Cruiser," which was seen going down the Forth with a brig in tow, and that upon her noticing the signals she cast off the brig and came to the help of the steamer; that the "Cruiser" was a powerful tug with double engines, which eminently fitted her for the work in question,—and after putting her hawser on board the "Tabasqueno" and getting up extra steam so as to produce a heavy strain, and through the combined efforts of both tugs the steamer was, after about half-an-hour's work, dragged off the bank; that the "Cruiser's" hawser subsequently got entangled in her paddle-wheel and was rendered useless,—it having been previously worth about £25,—and that she thereafter took the ground on the other side of the channel, and was in consequence obliged to go into port for examination,—thus losing two days' work besides the £3 which she would have earned from towing the brig which she had been obliged to throw off; that the "Tabasqueno," which was valued at about £8000, did not suffer beyond having the paint scraped off where she had run along the bank; that vessels frequently got upon the breakwater on going in and out of the port, and sometimes remained fast over a tide,—and that a customary charge for assisting them off was from £2, 10s. to £3; and that the claim made by the "Tweed" for her services on this occasion had been settled by arbitration for £15.

There was a conflict of evidence, as appears from the Lord Ordinary's note and from the opinions of the Court, as to whether the "Tabasqueno" was in danger or not when lying on the bank.

The Lord Ordinary (Fraser), on 1st February 1888, gave decree for £50.*

---

* "OPINION.—The question in this case is, what amount of compensation shall be awarded to the pursuer for services rendered to the defenders? It is, perhaps, unnecessary to determine whether the service that was rendered comes under the head of towage or of salvage service. The practical point is, what compensation shall be awarded, for it is admitted that some compensation is due, and £20 has been tendered by the defenders.

"The defenders' vessel, called the 'Tabasqueno,' was upon her trial trip, and had 390 tons of coals on board at the time when she approached the port of Grangemouth, which has a very narrow entrance between two breakwaters. The 'Tabasqueno,' almost immediately after entering into the channel between the two breakwaters, ran into the north breakwater and there stuck. The cause of her doing so is not very clearly brought out by the evidence, but it is surmised that she took a sudden sheer by touching the ground and thereby deviated from the proper channel and went into the breakwater. The case for the pursuer is, that she was going at her full power of ten knots an hour, while the defenders aver that she was only going at half speed. The evidence upon this point is conflicting, and the Lord Ordinary adopts the latter view, because no person having any knowledge of the port or of seamanship would have gone into the channel at the rate of ten knots an hour. The point is only of importance with reference to the position of the 'Tabasqueno' when she struck upon the bank. This bank is 20 feet high, composed of loose stones and mud, but at the time of this occurrence it was all covered with water and no part of it was visible. The pursuer endeavoured to prove that the 'Tabasqueno' mounted over this bank, and passed over the top of it to the extent of 40 to 50 feet; while the evidence for the defenders is to the effect that the vessel struck the bank diagonally and stuck in the mud, and did not mount over it. When the

No. 137.

June 14, 1888.
Lawson v. Grangemouth Dockyard Co.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The Lord Ordinary had erred in not applying his mind to the question whether the services rendered by the "Cruiser" were towage or salvage. If they were the latter the £50 award was not too large, if the former, it was clearly excessive. To constitute salvage services the vessel salved must be in probable danger of shipwreck or serious injury. If the assisting vessel merely performs a service which she holds herself out to do, then the service is a towage service. That was the case here. Further, even upon the Lord Ordinary's view of the evidence the service was a towage service. (2) The policy of the law had been to discourage the bringing of salvage tide had receded, the place where the vessel had struck was examined by a number of witnesses, and the exact position where she lay was ascertained by the hollow in the mud which her impact had made. This shewed that she had not mounted on the top of the embankment or breakwater. The point is material, because the claim for salvage services here is made high because of the alleged danger in which it is said the 'Tabasqueno' stood. If she had mounted over the breakwater, then upon the retiral of the tide the stem of the vessel would have sunk down, it is said, and the vessel itself would have capsized. On the other hand, if it be held that she had remained fixed in the mud and had not gone over the embankment, she would have floated next day with the tide. Upon considering the conflicting evidence that we have got, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the latter is the proper conclusion to be drawn from the proof. The wind was light, and there was no danger to be apprehended from rough weather. The scene of the occurrence was in the channel of an inland river, and there are here therefore wanting several of the elements which induce Courts to give large compensation for such services.

---

"But, at the same time, the Lord Ordinary thinks that the tender which has been here made is not sufficient for the service rendered. The pursuer's vessel, the 'Cruiser,' was at the time of the occurrence in the middle of the Forth towing a brig away to Leith. Signals of distress were made to the 'Cruiser' from Grangemouth harbour, and that vessel, though under contract to tow the brig, at once responded to the signal, threw off the hawser from the brig, and proceeded to Grangemouth harbour. There it was found that a small tug called the 'Tweed' was vainly endeavouring to set free the 'Tabasqueno.' The 'Cruiser' at once proceeded to work, and by skilful operation got the 'Tabasqueno' out of her position. This was not done without some risk to the 'Cruiser,' for the hawser of the 'Cruiser,' after the 'Tabasqueno' was freed, got entangled in one of her wheels, and it was with some difficulty and some risk that the hawser was removed from that entanglement. The 'Cruiser' herself took the ground on the opposite bank before this was done.

"Now, looking to the ready response which the 'Cruiser' made to the signal of distress; to the prompt and efficient assistance which she rendered; to the fact that by throwing off the brig which she was towing a claim of damage might have been stated against the 'Cruiser' by the owner of the brig had anything happened to her; to the loss of the towage wages which the 'Cruiser' would have earned had she conveyed the brig to Leith; and to the injury that is proved to have happened to the 'Cruiser's' hawser, the Lord Ordinary thinks that the pursuer is entitled to a sum of £50 as compensation for the services that the 'Cruiser' rendered. It is no answer to the claim to say that tugs at Grangemouth remove vessels from the embankments that have got embedded there for a fee of £2 or £3. There was no such tug available at the time of this occurrence, and the rate at which tugs will work whose business it is to relieve embedded vessels in this channel is no criterion for the reward that ought to be given to vessels such as the 'Cruiser'—a stranger in the water, and who did the service so efficiently and promptly.

"In regard to expenses, and with reference to the 460th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 104), the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that this is a case fit to be tried in the Supreme Court, and has certified accordingly."

No. 137.
June 14, 1888.
Lawson v. Grangemouth Dockyard Co.

claims of small amount into the Supreme Court.[1] By the 460th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, it was provided that two Justices might try such claims, and by the 49th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862, power was given to the Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute to exercise that jurisdiction. There was also a provision that where the damages awarded were under £200 to entitle the pursuer to expenses the Court must certify that the case was one fit to be tried in a superior Court. This case was of so simple a nature that the Lord Ordinary ought not to have certified it as he had done, and accordingly the pursuer ought not to have any expenses. It was not even a question of taxing them down to the Sheriff Court scale. In the case of the "Minnehaha"[2] there were a number of legal questions involved, and it was not in point.

The pursuer's argument upon the merits sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Judges.[3] He asked that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to. On the question of expenses he argued;—This was a case which was properly brought in the Court of Session.[2] It was certainly not a case to bring before two Justices, the tribunal proposed in the Act of 1854, and the only alteration made by the Act of 1862 was to substitute the Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute for the Justices. The kind of case suited for trial before each tribunal was left unchanged.

LORD PRESIDENT.—As this case was presented to us by the counsel who opened it for the reclaimer, I was very much disposed to think that the Lord Ordinary had made a mistake in awarding so large a sum as £50. But after a consideration of the evidence, I am of opinion that the award is not excessive, and in the circumstances I think the owners of the tug are well entitled to the sum which has been found due to them.

A question has been raised whether the services rendered are to be considered salvage or towage services. Of course the answer to that question must depend upon whether the vessel which received the assistance was in danger, and was rescued from it by the services which were performed. There is a great deal of conflicting evidence upon this point—and I think the point is a very narrow one—but, upon the whole, I think it is not satisfactorily proved that the vessel was in danger. Those who first came to her assistance seem to have thought she was in danger, because they invoked the services of the tug. They put up signals of danger or distress, and upon that invitation the tug went to her assistance. But assuming that she was not in danger, although she was thought to be so, what was the nature of the services rendered? The benefit which the vessel derived was that she was dragged off the breakwater or mud bank on which she had stuck, and was brought back into the channel of the Carron. I think that was a service of very considerable difficulty, and involving risk to the tug, to her crew, and to all her appliances.

This is very clearly brought out in the evidence of the master and engineer of the tug. The master says,—"When we got to the steamer they called to us to put a hawser on her port bow, as she had not a hawser on board. We put our hawser on her port bow, and they pulled it on board. We then towed for about ten minutes, trying to get her off. The 'Tweed' was towing on the steamer's starboard quarter, and we on the port bow. The result was that the ebb tide carried us down on the 'Tweed.' I slacked the hawser, and ordered those on board the 'Tabasqueno' to give me a small warp over the stern, so as to get my boat into position again. They did so, and I took the warp to our starboard sponson. I then stopped our starboard engine and went easy ahead with our port one, the effect of which was to bring my boat up the river again against the tide and into position, the large hawser still being slack. I got to the south-eastwards of the 'Tabasqueno,' further up the river, and then I ordered the engineer to cut the small warp and set both our engines going. I told everybody to stand clear in case of accident, and then I put the engines full speed ahead. The result of that was to give a tremendous jerk, and with the jerk the steamer listed a little to port, and then came off into deep water. That was a very risky thing to do, because the sudden bringing off of the boat might have sent the hawser in and injured some of the men, or broken the steamer's shaft. It involved a very severe strain on the boat and engines." The engineer again, after repeating what the master had said about the preparatory proceedings, depones,—"When we got into position again, a little further up the river than the 'Tabasqueno,' our captain ordered all hands to stand clear of the hawser, and I cut the small tow-line. We then put both engines full speed ahead, and with a sudden jerk upon the hawser—which very nearly threw me overboard—the steamer came off. After she came off, the captain ordered them to let go the hawser, which they did. We tried to get our boat into position to go up mid-channel, but the tow-rope got into the starboard wheel, and spragged the starboard engine. We had only the port engine to work with, and the tide drove us down to the mud on the south breakwater. We lay there for a little while, got the tow-rope clear of the wheel, and had to back the tug over the mud into mid-channel. I think she must have holed herself, because I noticed she made a little water every night after that when we were lying. We got a diver at Aberdeen about a fortnight afterwards, and a small hole was found in her bottom about 4 inches from the keel. The jerk in taking off the steamer was dangerous to both the tug and her crew, because if the hawser had given way, it might have come in, and perhaps have killed someone on board. We had also more steam upon the boilers at the time, and the sudden jerk might have caused an explosion. The strain was tremendous." This kind of jerk is not a thing that tugs are in the habit of resorting to in ordinary cases. We have the evidence of Liston, a Firth of Forth pilot, on this matter,—"It is very seldom that tugs give a jerk. The jerk in this case was a source of danger, because of the risk of carrying anything away."

---

[1] Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 460; Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862, sec. 49.

[2] The "Minnehaha," 1861, 1 Lushington's Reps. 335.

[3] Authority cited.—S.s. "Vulcan" v. s.s. "Berlin," July 6, 1882, 9 R. 1057.

The rest of the evidence supports what is said by the master and the engineer, and that being so it appears to me to be proved that the services of the tug were of a very different kind from ordinary towage services. If they were towage services, they were of a very special kind—and as I have said they are proved to have been attended with very considerable risk to the tug, and to her crew, and appliances. For such services it appears to me that ordinary towage service rates are quite inadequate. I do not think that the Lord Ordinary has awarded too much, or that the rate allowed by him is more than proper remuneration.

As to the expenses of the action, that is a point on which I attach great importance to the view of the Lord Ordinary. I do not say that he is final in the matter of granting a certificate, but still I think a great deal of deference is due to his opinion. In this case I see no reason for differing from his Lordship. No doubt there are no questions of law involved in the case, but there are very difficult questions of fact. For instance, there is the question whether the services are salvage or towage services. Although this is a case which might have been tried before the Sheriff, it is certainly not a case which could have been tried before two Justices under the Act of 1854. The Act of 1862 does not alter the kind of case in which the Court may be called upon to issue a certificate, and I see no reason for interfering with the Lord Ordinary's discretion in the matter.

No. 137.

June 14, 1888.
Lawson v. Grangemouth Dockyard Co.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—If it were necessary in order to sustain the Lord Ordinary's judgment as to the amount to be awarded to the pursuer to deal with the question of the nature of the services rendered, I am not prepared to say that I should not have held the services in this case to be salvage services. There is a great deal which would incline me to that result. In the first place, those who asked the assistance thought the services were salvage services. In the second place, the tug was asked to give her assistance by parties who thought there was risk and danger, and I do not think she would have left the vessel she was towing unless she had been so called. In the third place, the vessel was fast in the bank for one-sixth of her length,—no doubt it was a bank of mud,—but there were also tons of stones forming the embankment, and there was, I am disposed to think, a risk of the vessel heeling over and of the stones going through her side; and these considerations all rather tend to the inference that the case was one of salvage,—though the payment to be made might not in the circumstances be large.

But taking the case as one of special service short of salvage, I think the sum which the Lord Ordinary has awarded is moderate and reasonable.

The tug was herself in some danger from having to take the vessel off by jerks. Her hawser, which was valued at £24, was rendered useless. She lost her hire. She lost two days' work in the harbour. These were, I think, material incidents in the giving of the service she did which cannot, I think, be taken to be mere ordinary towage service. I think an award of £50 is therefore quite a moderate amount.

The question of expenses is one of a delicate and difficult nature. A case has been cited to us where the Privy Council was of opinion that a certificate that the case was fit to be tried in a superior Court had been rightly given, and having regard to the specialties of this case and the legal considerations involved I am not prepared to say that it was not a fit case for a superior Court. Upon the whole matter I agree with the Lord Ordinary.

LORD ADAM.—If it were necessary to express an opinion whether the services rendered were salvage services or not, I think I should be inclined to say that they were not. The "Tabasqueno" was not in danger; it might have been different if there had been a change of weather. But, at the same time, I think it is not a case of ordinary towage services. The risk which the tug ran is material, for she went on shore or touched the ground and was disabled for work for two days. In that view, I think the sum which has been awarded is not too large.

With reference to the question of expenses, I might possibly have come to a different conclusion from the Lord Ordinary. But I might have been wrong.

THE COURT adhered.

BEVERIDGE, SUTHERLAND, & SMITH, S.S.C.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 138.

June 16, 1888.
Farquharson v. Sutherlands.

WILLIAM FARQUHARSON AND ANOTHER, Appellants.—Low.
ALEXANDER SUTHERLAND AND ANOTHER, Respondents.—
Sir Charles Pearson.

Bankruptcy—Election of Trustee—Appeal—Competency—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), sec. 71.—At a meeting of creditors for the election of a trustee in a sequestration, creditors to the value of £15,000 voted for A and creditors to the value of £1600 voted for B. Objections were taken by creditors to certain votes for A.

The Sheriff-substitute sustained an objection to the vote of X, a creditor for £16, who had proposed A, and, on the ground that A had been proposed by a creditor who was not entitled to vote, declared B to have been duly elected.

An appeal by A to the Court of Session was objected to on the ground that by sec. 71 of the Bankruptcy Act the Sheriff's judgment was final.

Held that the appeal was competent, and that the interlocutor must be recalled, on the ground that the Sheriff had exceeded his jurisdiction—the Lord President holding that the Sheriff had exceeded his jurisdiction in failing to ascertain the number of valid votes for each candidate—Lord Shand holding that the Sheriff's jurisdiction was limited to disposing of objections stated to him—Lord Adam concurring on both grounds.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Caithness, Orkney, and Shetland.
M.

ON 24th March 1888 the estates of Eric Sinclair Mackay, fishcurer, Wick, were sequestrated by the Sheriff-substitute of Caithness (Harper), and a meeting appointed to take place at Wick on 6th April following for the election of a trustee and commissioners.

The minute of meeting of creditors held upon 6th April bore, inter alia, that John Campbell, a creditor, proposed William Farquharson, whom failing, George Sinclair, to be trustee, and that Alexander Sutherland, whom failing, Symon Flett Sutherland, was proposed by another of the creditors; that there voted for Farquharson three creditors whose claims amounted in value to £15,856, 18s. 9½d., and for Alexander Sutherland a number of creditors with claims amounting to £1641, 0s. 5d.

Among objections to the votes tendered in support of Farquharson was this objection to the vote of John Campbell, a creditor for £16, 8s. 2½d.,—"The oath does not bear to have been taken in presence of a Magistrate or Justice of the Peace, as the name of the Justice of the Peace is omitted, and his vote is therefore null."

On 16th April following the Sheriff-substitute (Harper), pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Sheriff-substitute . . . for the reasons stated in the subjoined note, hereby declares the said Alexander Sutherland and the said Symon Flett Sutherland to have been duly elected trustee and trustee in succession on the sequestrated estates of the said Eric Sinclair Mackay, in terms of the Bankruptcy Statutes. . . ."*

---

* "NOTE.—The Sheriff-substitute sustains the objection to the oath of John Campbell, viz., that it does not bear to have been taken before a Magistrate or Justice of the Peace.† The words of the Act of 1856 are very explicit (section 22), that the oath must be taken before a Judge Ordinary, Magistrate, or Justice of the Peace; but in the present case, although the oath bears to be signed by a Justice of the Peace, it is not said, and it does not appear, that it was taken before him.

"This seems to be enough for the case without dealing with any of the other

---

† The affidavit bore,—"At Wick, the 6th day of April 1888 years,—In presence of one of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the county of Caithness,—Compeared John Campbell, merchant, 74 Kinnaird Street, Pulteneytown, who being solemnly sworn and interrogated, depones,— . . . . All which is truth, as the deponent shall answer to God.

"JOHN CAMPBELL.
"CHARLES BRUCE, J.P."

No. 138.

June 16, 1888.
Farquharson v. Sutherlands.

Farquharson appealed to the First Division of the Court of Session.

The Sutherlands objected to the appeal as incompetent, and argued;—The appeal was wholly incompetent, and was excluded under the 71st section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856.[1] The sections in the Small-Debt Act, 1837, excluding review (secs. 30 and 31), were in point. [The LORD PRESIDENT referred to the case of Graham v. Mackay, Feb. 25, 1845, 7 D. 515, 6 Bell's Apps. 214.] On the merits, it was admitted that under section 70 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, the Court were entitled to look at the Sheriff-substitute's grounds of judgment as stated in his note—and that it could not be excluded. The Sheriff-substitute was right in sustaining the objection to Campbell's affidavit. The Court would always very narrowly scrutinise such a document, because it inferred the pains of perjury.[2]

Argued for Farquharson;—In pronouncing the interlocutor appealed against the Sheriff had exceeded his jurisdiction in giving effect to an objection which he had himself been the first to state, and which was in itself bad,[3] viz., that no one could be elected a trustee who had not been formally nominated by a creditor. If he had not committed this error he would have proceeded under the 101st section to elect the person who had "the majority in value of those present and entitled to vote." It was also to be observed that he had not considered the other objections which were lodged on both sides; that made his deliverance only the worse. It was not review of the interlocutor which was sought,[4] for in what he had done the Sheriff had not been acting in the exercise of his statutory jurisdiction. The case of Foulis was a very narrow one; it was review that was sought there, and the Lord President had in his opinion in that case specially saved a case like the present.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In considering the question of the competency of this appeal, I think we are entitled to look at the whole proceedings in the case; but at the same time it appears to me that there is enough in the face of the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor to lead me to the conclusion that it cannot stand. It declares certain persons to have been duly elected trustee and trustee in succession, "for the reasons stated in the subjoined note." These reasons are so stated in conformity with the provision of the statute, and accordingly we are entitled to look at the note to see what the grounds of judgment were. We find that the Sheriff-substitute having expressed an opinion that Mr John Campbell's affidavit was bad, goes on as follows:—"This seems to be enough for the case without dealing with any of the other objections, because the appointment of Mr Farquharson, whom failing, George Sinclair, as trustee, was proposed by the said John Campbell, who, if he was not entitled to vote, was not entitled to propose."

---

objections, because the appointment of Mr Farquharson, whom failing, George Sinclair, as trustee, was proposed by the said John Campbell, who, if he was not entitled to vote, was not entitled to propose. It follows, therefore, that the other persons proposed for the trusteeship, viz., Alexander Sutherland, S.S.C., whom failing, Symon Flett Sutherland, there being no objections to the votes of their supporters, and the meeting having declared itself satisfied with the sufficiency of the cautioners offered, fall to be declared elected."

[1] Foulis v. Downie, Oct. 27, 1871, 10 Macph. 20, 44 Scot. Jur. 22; Buchan v. Bowes, June 13, 1863, 1 Macph. 922; Rankine v. Douglas, July 19, 1871, 9 Macph. 1053.

[2] Hall v. Colquhoun, June 22, 1870, 8 Macph. 891.

[3] Bowes v. Buchan, 1 Macph. 922 (Lord Kinloch's opinion, p. 923).

[4] Dick v. North of Scotland Railway Co., Oct. 8, 1860, 33 Scot. Jur. 2, 3 Irvine, 616.

No. 138.

June 16, 1888.
Farquharson v. Sutherlands.

The Sheriff-substitute's opinion obviously is that no one can be elected trustee who has not been formally nominated by a creditor, and in that opinion I think he is entirely wrong. No one has attempted to maintain that he is right. It is for him to decide who has the majority in value of the votes of the creditors, and thereupon to declare him elected; but instead of ascertaining that, he has declined to do so, and has said that because this person, against whom he has decided, was not nominated, therefore he cannot be declared elected. In doing so, he has gone outside of the statute. It was the Sheriff's duty simply to examine the votes and objections, and to determine, after a scrutiny, who had the majority of votes. He has declined to exercise that function, and he has thereby exceeded his jurisdiction, because that is just as much an excess of jurisdiction as if he had gone beyond his territorial limits. He has refused to exercise the statutory jurisdiction which is imposed upon him.

I think we must recall the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and remit to him to proceed.

LORD SHAND.—I reach the same conclusion as your Lordship, but upon a separate ground. I think the Sheriff-substitute in the course he took has gone out of the statute. If the Sheriff in dealing with a question of this kind keeps within the provisions of the statute, this Court has no jurisdiction to review his judgment, which is final. But in the present case it is different.

The 69th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, carefully provides that,—"If there be competition, or objections to the candidate or candidates, such objections to the votes or candidates shall be stated at the meeting, and the Sheriff may either forthwith decide thereon, or make avizandum, and he shall, if necessary, make a short note of the objections and of the answers, on which he shall . . . hear parties viva voce, and declare the person or persons trustee or trustees in succession whom he shall find to have been duly elected." There is thus a statutory provision for a note of objections, and prescribing the course which the Sheriff is to take in regard to the objections stated. If we proceed to section 70, which provides for the case when the Sheriff is not present at the meeting of creditors, we find that "if there be competition or objection the parties shall . . . lodge in the hands of the Sheriff-clerk short notes of objections, and the Sheriff shall forthwith hear parties thereon viva voce, and give his decision, and state the grounds thereof in a note, which note, as well as such short notes, shall form part of the process." These provisions in the two sections of the statute prescribing that objections shall be given in and noted in writing, and thereafter dealt with by the Sheriff, seem to have been made with the view of fixing the parties down to the objections stated only, and of preserving a record which will shew how these objections were disposed of. If the Sheriff has dealt only with objections stated by the parties, then he is within the statute, if not, then he is without it.

In this case the Sheriff-substitute, in the first place, sustained an objection made by the Messrs Sutherland to one of the votes in favour of William Farquharson, viz., that of John Campbell who proposed him, but he has not gone on to consider the objections which were stated to the validity of the other votes given on behalf of Farquharson—votes which, if good, would secure his election to the office of trustee. The objection which has been sustained was confined to one particular debt. The Sheriff-substitute, in place of taking up the objections stated to the votes of the other creditors, has sustained an objection not stated to any of them, and has held their votes to be bad. If an objection had been stated by the Messrs Sutherland to the effect that all these votes were bad and ineffectual because they were tendered on behalf of a person who had not been duly proposed by a person entitled to vote, that would have been very different. His decision would have been bad in law, but would have been final. But there was no such objection stated—and none of that class. The Sheriff-substitute has gone beyond the objections. He has sustained an objection which was not stated.

No. 138.

June 16, 1888.
Farquharson v. Sutherlands.

It appears to me that the statute authorises the Sheriff to deal only with objections which are stated, and that, in taking up and sustaining an objection not stated in this case, he has gone beyond the statute. I am not prepared to say that he has refused to exercise his jurisdiction, although he has decided most erroneously that he was not called upon to inquire into the objections which were stated, and thereupon to sustain or disallow the votes. I do not think he has gone outside of the statute, except in so far as he has dealt with and given effect to an objection which was not put forward by the parties themselves.

LORD ADAM.—I also think the Sheriff-substitute has gone outwith the statute. I agree that we may look at all the proceedings in the case. The only objection which was laid before us to the votes which were given in support of the appellant was an objection to Campbell's. That was the only objection which was sustained, and we are entitled to assume in these proceedings that all the other votes were unexceptionable and good in themselves. If the Sheriff-substitute had done his duty, and had examined the other votes which were objected to as invalid, of course we cannot say what the result would have been. After considering these votes he should have proceeded under the 101st section to ascertain who had the majority in value of the good votes, and to have declared him trustee, this being a mere matter of arithmetic. But he went outside of the statute and declared that a person who had not a majority of the good votes was elected trustee. It is said that there is another ground upon which we may proceed, viz., that the Sheriff-substitute started an objection at his own instance and has given effect to it. I agree upon this point also, as the objection could only be dealt with if stated by the parties.

LORD MURE was absent.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, recalled the deliverance of the Sheriff-substitute, and remitted to him to proceed.

ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—JAMES PURVES, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 139.

June 19, 1888.
Marshall's Trustee v. Macneill & Co.

JOHN GOURLAY (Marshall's Trustee), Pursuer (Reclaimer).—
Sir Charles Pearson—Younger.
DUNCAN MACNEILL & COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—
D.-F. Mackintosh—Murray.

Personal or real—Ground-annual—Obligation to build within a certain period—Liability of singular successor.—A, a vassal under a feu-contract, conveyed part of his feu by contract of ground-annual to B, with and under the burdens and conditions contained in the feu-contract, and further under an obligation to erect certain buildings on the ground within one year from the term of entry, in order to secure payment of the ground-annual and of the share of the feu-duty, &c. which had been allocated upon the ground disponed, and to maintain the buildings in good order and repair in all time. B bound himself and "his heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever, and his assignees," to perform these conditions, and they were declared to be real burdens upon the subjects disponed, and appointed to be recorded in the Register of Sasines. B subsequently disponed the subjects to C, and six years after the date of the contract of ground-annual C disponed them to D, the disposition being in each case "with and under the real liens and burdens, conditions, provisions, and others specified and contained in said contract of ground-annual."

No. 139.

June 19, 1888.
Marshall's Trustee v. Macneill & Co.

The trustee upon A's sequestrated estate having raised an action against D, to have it found that he was bound to implement the obligations in the feu-contract, and the obligation in the contract of ground-annual, as to the erection and subsequent maintenance of buildings, held (1) that as the pursuer was not a party to the feu-contract he had no title to sue upon it; and (2) that in so far as the contract of ground-annual was concerned it imposed no personal obligation to erect buildings which was enforceable against a singular successor in the lands, and defender therefore assoilzied.

Question, whether the obligation to erect buildings contained in the contract of ground-annual could be made effectual as a real burden.

Right in security—Ex facie absolute disposition—Back-bond—Reconveyance.—After an action had been raised against a person infeft in certain subjects on an ex facie absolute disposition, concluding for implement of certain obligations alleged to be contained in his title, he recorded a back-bond and executed a reconveyance of the subjects to his debtor and obtained decree in absence ordaining him to register it.

Question, whether the recording of the back-bond and the registration of the reconveyance operated a divestiture of the feudal title as in a question with the pursuer.

Opinion (per Lord Kinnear), that it did. On a reclaiming note opinions reserved.

1st Division.
Lord Kinnear.
B.

JAMES and THOMAS MARSHALL of the Ibrox Flour Mills, Glasgow, were in right (1) of certain subjects, being a portion of ground consisting of 3927 square yards or thereby, originally feued by Hinshelwood's trustees to William Simm, under feu-contract, dated in 1876; and (2) of certain other subjects, being a portion of ground consisting of 887 square yards or thereby, feued to them by the Commissioners of Police of Govan under feu-contract, dated in 1879. The feu-contracts contained no obligation on the vassals to erect buildings.

By contract of ground-annual, dated 5th and 13th May, and recorded 21st June 1879, entered into between the Marshalls, of the first part, and John Inglis Bruce and James Walker Bruce, drysalters in Glasgow, trading under the firm of Bruce Brothers & Company, of the second part, the first party sold and disponed to the second party the two sets of subjects above mentioned. The deed contained the following provisions:—"But the subjects first above disponed are so disponed always with and under, in so far as applicable and still subsisting, the real liens and burdens, servitudes, reservations, conditions, restrictions, prohibitions, declarations, obligations, and others specified and contained in the foresaid feu-contract between the said . . . trustees of the said deceased John Hinshelwood, and the said William Simm, dated and recorded as aforesaid: Declaring that the proportion of the original feu-duty of £305, 18s. 3d. effeiring to the subjects first hereby disponed is £147, 5s. 10d., which with the sum of £14, 14s. 7d. of augmentation, in terms of the said feu-contract, amounting together to the sum of £162, 0s. 5d., is the amount hereby allocated on the said subjects first hereby disponed of said original feu-duty; which proportion of feu-duty, &c., . . . the second party and their foresaids shall be bound, as they hereby bind themselves and their foresaids, to pay, and so free and relieve the first party and the remaining subjects belonging to them in all time coming, from and after the term of entry after mentioned; and the subjects second above disponed are so disponed always with and under the burden of the

No. 139.
—
June 19, 1888.
Marshall's Trustee v. Macneill & Co.

feu-duty, and whole other burdens, conditions, provisions, declarations, and others specified and contained in a feu-contract entered into between" the Clerk to the Police Commissioners of Govan "and the first party, dated . . . all in the year 1879; and further, the subjects above disponed are so disponed always with and under the further real liens and burdens, conditions, provisions, and others after specified, viz.:—(First) With and under the real lien and burden of the payment by the second party and their successors to the said James Marshall and Thomas Alexander Marshall, and their heirs and assignees whomsoever, of a yearly ground-rent or ground-annual of £106, 5s. 6d. sterling . . . to be paid to and uplifted and taken by them and their foresaids furth of and from the portions of ground above disponed, and houses and buildings erected and to be erected thereon, or furth of any part or portion thereof, and readiest rents, maills, and duties of the same . . . (Second) Over and above the obligations already existing as to the erection of buildings on said ground hereby disponed, the second party and their foresaids shall be bound and obliged, as they hereby bind and oblige themselves and them, within one year from and after the term of entry after mentioned, to erect and build on the said ground hereby disponed buildings which shall be of a substantial description, and built of stone or brick and lime, and covered with slates, sufficient to yield a yearly rent equal to at least double the amount of the said ground-annual hereby created, and the foresaid proportions of feu-duty, augmentations, and others, and to maintain and uphold the said buildings in such good order and repair as will make them yield the said rent in all time thereafter . . . which yearly ground-rent or ground-annual of £106, 5s. 6d., duplication thereof, interest and consequents, and whole conditions, declarations, obligations, and others before written, are hereby created real liens and burdens in favour of the first party and their foresaids, upon and affecting the said portions of ground before disponed, and houses and buildings erected and to be erected thereon, and are hereby appointed to be recorded in the Register of Sasines as part of these presents, or inserted in any notarial instrument to follow hereon, and to be inserted or validly referred to in all future conveyances or investitures of the said portions of ground, or any part thereof, otherwise the same shall, in the option of the first party and their foresaids, be void and null, and the said subjects and others, and whole buildings thereon, shall revert and belong to the first party and their foresaids . . . For which causes, and on the other part, the said John Inglis Bruce and James Walker Bruce hereby bind and oblige themselves, their heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever, and the stock and effects of their said firm, and their assignees, all jointly and severally, and without the necessity of discussing them in their order, to pay to the said James Marshall and Thomas Alexander Marshall, their heirs and assignees whomsoever, the foresaid yearly ground-rent or ground-annual of £106, 5s. 6d. sterling, and duplication thereof, and these at the terms and with interest and penalty all as before written, and also to fulfil and perform all the other obligations incumbent on them and their foresaids under these presents . . ."

By disposition, dated in August 1882, the Messrs Bruce conveyed to John Inglis Bruce, one of themselves, the subjects in question under the burdens, conditions, and others contained in the contract of ground-annual and feu-contracts above mentioned. In September following John Inglis Bruce conveyed the same subjects to the firm of Duncan Macneill & Company and the individual partners thereof,—"always with and under the real liens and burdens, conditions, provisions, and others specified and contained in said contract of ground-annual, dated and recorded as aforesaid."

The estates of James and Thomas Marshall were sequestrated on 14th February 1887, and Mr John Gourlay, C.A., Glasgow, was appointed trustee.

The trustee, on 25th May 1887, brought an action against Duncan Macneill & Company to have them ordained to implement obligations lying on the vassals under the two feu-contracts, and to implement an obligation in the contract of ground-annual to erect upon the two lots of ground above described buildings of the nature, class, and value specified and sufficient to yield double the amount of the ground-annual and other payments therein set forth,—being a yearly sum of £536, 11s. 10d.,—and to maintain and uphold the buildings in such good order and repair as would make them yield the rent in all time thereafter. There was an alternative conclusion for damages.

The pursuer stated that the year within which the second party to the contract of ground-annual was taken bound to erect the buildings stipulated for expired on 15th May 1880, and that the whole structural value of the buildings which had been erected did not amount to more than £75 a-year. He further averred:—"The said two portions of ground are at present in the possession of the said defenders. By the titles condescended on, the said stipulations as to building were made conditions of the right to the subjects, and the defenders are under an effectual personal obligation to implement those stipulations. The defenders have been called upon to complete the obligations to erect buildings contained in said contract of ground-annual and two feu-contracts, but they refuse or at least delay to do so, and the present action has thus been rendered necessary."

The defenders denied that implement had not been made of the obligations contained in the contract of ground-annual,—and further founded on the fact that the feu-contracts contained no obligation to erect buildings. They further explained that the disposition under which they held, although ex facie absolute, was merely in security, being qualified by a back-letter granted by them in favour of Mr John Inglis Bruce, dated 11th September 1882, and recorded 1st June 1887; and that they had further on 27th July 1887 executed a disposition and reconveyance of the subjects in Bruce's favour, and obtained a decree in absence against him on 21st September 1887 ordaining him to accept and record it.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defenders being bound conjunctly and severally to implement and fulfil, in so far as has not already been done, the obligations to erect and maintain buildings imposed upon the second party, and their assignees and disponees, under said contract of ground-annual, and upon the respective second parties, and their assignees and disponees, to said two feu-contracts, in so far as relating to the subjects conveyed by said contract of ground-annual, and the said obligations being conditions of their right to the ground, and being binding on the defenders, decree should be pronounced in terms of the first conclusion of the summons, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The statements of the pursuer are irrelevant, and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) No title to sue, in respect that the pursuer has no title to enforce the conditions contained in the feu-contracts. (3) The defenders are not personally bound by any of the stipulations in the contract of ground-annual.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear), on 29th October 1887, assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the summons.*

---

* "OPINION.—The pursuer avers that, as trustee on the sequestrated estate of Messrs James and Thomas Marshall, he is in right of a ground-annual pay-

No. 139.

June 19, 1888.
Marshall's Trustee v. Macneill & Co.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The first answer that the defenders made was that the obligation to build did not transmit against singular successors like the defenders. It was not now contended that the pursuer had a title to enforce the conditions of the feu-contract—but it was different in regard to the ground-annual. The obligation to build therein contained was of the nature of a personal obligation, which transmitted against singular successors. The case of Gardyne,[1] which had been referred to on the other side, was said to be in point, but that was a case in which it was sought to enforce an obligation to pay money, and, besides, it able out of the lands described in the summons, and of certain obligations to build imposed by the contract of ground-annual upon the owners of the ground; and in the exercise of these rights he brings this action against the defenders, as the present owners of the ground, to have them compelled to perform the various obligations to build contained in the contract of ground-annual, and in certain feu-contracts under which the defenders are said to hold.

---

"The pursuer is no party to the feu-contracts, and has plainly no title to sue upon them, either as trustee in the sequestration or in any other character, and the only question therefore is, whether he is entitled to enforce the obligations of the contract of ground-annual against the defenders.

"But the defenders are not parties to that contract. They are the disponees of one of the parties who was proprietor of the ground when the contract was executed, and it is well settled law, since the judgment of the House of Lords in Gardyne v. The Royal Bank,[1] that the personal obligations contained in a contract of ground-annual do not transmit against singular successors in the land. It is said that although they do not necessarily transmit with the land, they are yet transmissible, like other obligations, by express stipulation; and that the defenders must be held to have undertaken the obligations in question, because they have accepted a conveyance 'with and under the real liens and burdens, conditions, provisions, and others contained in the said contract of ground-annual.' But these words do not import a personal obligation in favour of the creditor in the ground-annual; and it is admitted that there is nothing else in the deed that can be construed into such an obligation. It is unnecessary to inquire whether the condition as to building could be made effectual as a real burden, because a real burden does not carry with it any personal obligations. Again, it is said that the obligation to build is a condition of the tenure. But if it be, the pursuer, who is not the superior, and has no title of any kind to the land, has no concern with the conditions of the tenure.

"The principles on which the question must be determined are very clearly explained in the judgments of the Lord President and Lord Deas in the Marquis of Tweeddale v. Lord Haddington (7 Rettie, 625), and their application to the present case does not appear to me to be doubtful.

"Assuming, therefore, that the defenders were to be treated as proprietors for the purposes of the present case, they could not, in my opinion, be compelled to perform the obligation to build undertaken by their author. But the other ground on which they claim to be assoilzied appears to me to be equally well founded. Although their title is ex facie absolute, they are in reality mere heritable creditors, the disposition in their favour being qualified by a back-letter which they have recorded in the Register of Sasines. It may be that the registration of the back-letter does not operate a complete divestiture of the feudal title. But it is at least a publication of the true nature of their right; and since the record was closed they have executed a reconveyance and obtained a decree in absence against their debtor ordaining him to accept and record it. They have thus taken the step which the majority of the Judges in Gardyne v. The Royal Bank thought would be necessary and sufficient to extinguish the title, the registration of the back-bond being sufficient in the opinion of the minority."

[1] Gardyne v. Royal Bank of Scotland, March 8, 1851, 13 D. 912, rev. H. L. May 13, 1853, 1 Macq. 358.

No. 139.
—
June 19, 1888.
Marshall's Trustee v. Macneill & Co.

involved a de futuro liability. The obligation here was of a different nature; it was an obligation ad factum præstandum, and could only be performed by one who had a right to be upon the land. Further, it could not have been assumed here by a singular successor, as had been held to be an important feature in some previous cases,[1] that the obligation had been performed. It was quite plain to everyone that it had not. The case of Coutts[2] was in point. It dealt with a personal obligation which was held to be binding on the defender, who was a singular successor in the lands. Another condition which had been commented upon as awanting in some of the previous cases was satisfied here—for there was an express clause in the conveyance under which the defenders held transmitting the obligation. Clark's case[3] was also in point. There the obligation, which was held to be good against a singular successor of the original vassal, was a matter of contract rather than a real burden, and it made no difference that it was a case of superior and vassal. (2) Assuming the reclaimer was in the right so far, did it make any difference that the defenders were merely security-holders? It was to be observed that the back-letter had not been recorded until after the raising of the summons, and so ex facie the defenders were owners of the subjects, and the action was rightly directed against them.[4] Besides, the reconveyance, which was the important fact in the consideration of this point, was not made until after the closing of the record. The existence of the back-bond, even though it was recorded, made therefore no difference in the position of the defenders,[5] and could not relieve them of liability. The reconveyance was opposed to the maxim pendente lite nihil innovandum. Besides, it was without consideration, and that being so, it could not be taken into account in a question like the present.[6]

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The case depended upon the construction of the contract of ground-annual. The obligation upon the Bruces, "their heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever, and their assignees," referred to assignees before infeftment, and did not include singular successors. There being no express contract transmitting the obligation against a singular successor, the liability, if enforceable, must depend upon the doctrine of privity of estate. There was that privity between superior and vassal, but not between seller and purchaser.[6] The case was ruled by that of Gardyne.[7] It was sought to distinguish that case on the ground that the obligation there was a pecuniary one, while here it was said to be an obligation ad factum præstandum, and not of a continuous nature. But if there was a distinction the present case seemed to be the less favourable, because the more important part of it,—viz., the building as opposed to the maintenance—fell to be performed at once. Besides, the obligation to build had been

---

[1] Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Begg, Dec. 20, 1883, 11 R. 352.

[2] Tailors of Aberdeen v. Coutts, Dec. 20, 1834, 13 S. 226, H. L. 1 Rob. Apps. 296.

[3] Clark v. City of Glasgow Life Assurance Co., June 20, 1850, 12 D. 1047, rev. H. L. 1 Macq. 668; cf. also Marquis of Tweeddale's Trustees v. Earl of Haddington, Feb. 25, 1880, 7 R. 620.

[4] Cf. Liquidators of City of Glasgow Bank v. Nicholson's Trustees, March 3, 1882, 9 R. 689; Stewart v. Brown, Nov. 22, 1882, 10 R. 192.

[5] Scottish Heritable Security Co. v. Allan, Campbell, & Co., Jan. 14, 1876, 3 R. 333 (Lord President, p. 340).

[6] Gardyne v. Royal Bank, 13 D. 912 (Lords Cockburn, Robertson, and Mackenzie).

[7] Gardyne v. Royal Bank, March 8, 1851, 13 D. 912, rev. H. L. May 13, 1853, 1 Macq. 358.

No. 139.

June 19, 1888.
Marshall's Trustee v. Macneill & Co.

undertaken in 1879; it was prestable in 1880, and ought to have been performed two years before the defenders had to do with the property. Such an obligation was not a condition of the tenure. Gardyne's case had established that, and the cases of Coutts and Lord Tweeddale were not opposed to it. In Coutts' case the Judges held that it was of no consequence whether the personal conclusions were well-founded or not, as there was no insolvency on the part of the estate, and the obligations were pecuniary. If Coutts' case decided that an obligation of the kind could be enforced against singular successors by a personal action, it had been overruled by Gardyne's case. As to Lord Tweeddale's case, the obligations there were continuous and recurring, having a tract of future time, and the case had been always considered, and had been decided, as a case of superior and vassal, so that there was no semblance of authority which could interfere with that of Gardyne's case, and nothing to shew that an obligation ad factum præstandum differed from an ordinary pecuniary obligation. (2) But assuming that the first ground of defence failed, the obligation, if good against singular successors generally, could not affect the defenders, who were mere security-holders. The obligation did not come into force during their possession, and did not specially affect it. It was therefore in the same category as arrears of feu-duty, which could not be recovered after the person liable had parted with the subjects. Perhaps Gardyne's case was an authority to the effect that the mere registration of the back-letter would not have operated a release. But there had also been a reconveyance. The Lord Ordinary's judgment had no doubt been pronounced before the recording of the reconveyance, but this was one of the cases in which quod fieri debet infectum valet. Besides, if the recording took place before judgment was pronounced by the Inner-House, that was sufficient. It was said that pendente lite nihil innovandum, but that did not operate to make intransmissible what was otherwise transmissible. No demand made could alter the character of the obligation.

At advising,—

Lord President.—The reclaimer brings this action in the character of trustee upon the sequestrated estate of two persons named Marshall, and that is his sole title to sue. The Marshalls were in right of two feu-contracts—one of which was granted by Hinshelwood's trustees in 1876, and the other by the Commissioners of Police of Govan in 1879. The Marshalls, being the vassals, entered into a contract with two persons named Bruce, by which they conveyed to them the subjects contained in the two feu-contracts. These gentlemen in turn conveyed them to one of themselves, and he again conveyed them to the defenders. The defenders accordingly are singular successors of the Marshalls in the properties which were originally feued out as I have explained.

One purpose of the action is to enforce certain obligations contained in the original feu-contracts against the defenders as singular successors in the feus. I agree in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary that the pursuer not being a party to the feu-contracts in question, cannot sue as in right of the superior, and so far accordingly has no right to insist in the conclusions of the summons.

But the pursuer also seeks to enforce a certain obligation contained in the contract of ground-annual by which the Bruces acquired the property from the Marshalls; and the question is whether he can enforce the obligation in question against the defenders personally as singular successors in the subjects.

The obligation particularly in question is an obligation to build which is contained in the contract of ground-annual, and is there made a real burden upon the land. But there is no personal obligation to build to be found in the deed; the obligation is merely constituted a real burden. The only personal obligation to be found there is to pay the ground-annual, which is undertaken by the disponees, and "their heirs and assignees whomsoever," by which last expression I understand is meant assignees before infeftment, for according to my reading of the deed it is impossible to understand it in any other sense. I suppose it will not be contended that that personal obligation will transmit against singular successors. Indeed it has been authoritatively decided the other way. The question here is whether an obligation to build can be enforced as if it were a personal obligation. I should think there can be only one answer to that question, and I have heard no argument to convince me that the Lord Ordinary's view is unsound. An obligation to build is one of a peculiar kind, and if the question were to arise whether such an obligation can be made a real burden, I think it would require a good deal of consideration. The obligation in the contract of ground-annual was to erect certain buildings within a year from the date of entry, and I do not think there is any case in which it has been decided that such an obligation can be the subject of a real burden. But it is not necessary to enter upon that question here, because it is not proposed in this action to attach the land. The action is directed against the defenders personally. It is not a case between superior and vassal, nor is there any question either of tenure or of condition of title. It is a question between a seller and purchaser under a contract by which a seller has conveyed to a purchaser. I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary, and I have never been able to see what objections could be stated to the views to which he has given effect in his interlocutor.

Lord Shand.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and think that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

The action in the first and second conclusions seeks a decree, as your Lordship has already pointed out, at the instance of the pursuer, as in right of a ground-annual, to compel payment of feu-duties which are due to the superior; but the pursuer's counsel in opening the case explained that he did not maintain the pursuer's right to enforce any such liability. He did not present any argument in support of these conclusions, and for the reason explained by your Lordship, I am not surprised that the view of the pursuer that he had a right to compel payment of the feu-duties has been abandoned.

Farther, I understand it was not maintained that the pursuer could enforce any demand for payment of the ground-annuals themselves, or that there was any personal obligation existing upon the defenders to pay these ground-annuals. The defenders were no parties to the original contract of ground-annual, but have only been in right of the property for a time under a conveyance in their favour by the disponees under the contract of ground-annual.

But then it is said, nevertheless, that although there is no liability to pay the ground-annuals stipulated, there is a personal liability to fulfil an obligation to build, because that is a condition of the tenures. It strikes me at the outset of this question that it would be a very remarkable result that a person in possession of the ground on a title of property, though under no obligation to pay the ground-annuals themselves, should nevertheless be bound to fulfil an obligation the object of which is to secure payment of the ground-annuals. I should feel very great difficulty in sustaining such a claim, and could certainly not do so unless it were made absolutely clear that such an obligation had been undertaken. But it seems to me on the contrary to be very clear that the question which is now presented for decision has been already expressly decided by the case of Gardyne, which has been the ruling case in regard to obligations for payment of ground-annuals since the decision was pronounced.

No. 139.

June 19, 1888.
Marshall's Trustee v. Macneill & Co.

The argument for the pursuer seems to me to fail, for this reason, that the pursuer's relation to the lands is not such as to give him any right to enforce the erection of buildings on the ground, excepting against the original disponees under the contract of ground-annual and their heirs and representatives. The right to the lands in the person of the trustee on this sequestrated estate, as representing the bankrupts who had parted with the property, is of quite a limited nature. He is a mere security-holder. The bankrupts, no doubt, by the contract of ground-annual, created certain real burdens, and I shall assume that the obligation to build now in question has been made an effectual real burden on the lands. But the right to a real burden only gives the creditor right to use diligence against the land itself, and not a right to sue as upon a personal obligation of the proprietor arising out of his right of ownership. Now I think the result of Gardyne's case is really this, that a security-holder in such a position as the pursuer (or his predecessors, the bankrupts) has no such right in the lands as can enable him either to create or enforce what are called conditions of the tenure. When the Marshalls conveyed the lands to the Messrs Bruce what was left in the Marshalls (besides the personal obligation of the disponees) was simply a security right, and a security right of the nature of a real burden, which came to depend entirely on the infeftment which was taken on the disponees' title. I need not say that any person holding such a security, even though in right of a real burden, is in a totally different position from a superior with a continuing relation towards his vassal. Superior and vassal, changing as their several properties change hands, yet continue in direct relations towards each other; and conditions that are in their titles may be enforced by the superior or by the vassal in consequence of their respective proprietary rights in the lands and the continuing relation between them. Such a case as this, where the pursuer, the holder of the ground-annual, has really parted with his direct proprietary right to the lands and become a security-holder only, is in quite a different category from the case of Tweeddale, which has been much referred to, for that case was treated as a case of superior and vassal, or at least of superior and subvassal. Again, this case differs also from the cases in which questions have arisen between conterminous feuars deriving their rights from a common superior. There the Court has held as to certain conditions inserted in all the titles for the common advantage that one feuar or vassal may in certain circumstances enforce obligations contained in particular deeds to which he is not directly a party. The right there, I think, arises because the parties have each a direct proprietary right in lands, and also a direct interest, it may be, under a feuing-plan, or special arrangements for feuing, which have been embodied as conditions in different feu-contracts. But the right and interest of the parties is very different from that of one having a title as a security-holder only. The case of Coutts v. The Tailors of Aberdeen, it seems to me, in so far as it was decided on the ground of existing personal obligations, was regarded in the same light as a case of superior and vassal, or of conterminous vassals. The Tailors of Aberdeen had given off one of a number of different plots of ground, all under the same conditions for the common advantage of all the disponees as well as the disponers, and the rights maintained were those of the proprietors of part of the ground, who, though they had not the title of superiors as in feu-holdings, had still the same interest as a superior in such circumstances, and a right of property in part of the lands said to be affected with conditions for the common benefit. The same principle was held to apply as in the case of superior and vassal. In all these cases you have a direct proprietary interest in the property in the person seeking to enforce the obligation.

That the view I have stated is borne out by the case of Gardyne, may, I think, be shewn by reading two passages only from the decision. What the Lord Chancellor says is this,—"When Gardyne sold to Duff" (now Gardyne was the original seller and Duff the original purchaser), "what he acquired was a personal right against Duff and against Duff's representatives in all time for payment of the ground-annual; and further, a right against the land into whosesoever hands it might come. But he acquired no personal right against purchasers from Duff. It was not competent to Duff to give him any such right." That seems to me clearly to support the view that even Duff, who was the disponee, was not in a position to give to the holder of the ground-annual the right to enforce the personal obligation against a purchaser from him taking the property under a disposition granted by him. The matter is made still more clear in a subsequent passage in these terms,—"It is hardly necessary to remark that there is here no personal obligation whatever arising from the mere tenure of land independently of contract. In the case of superior and vassal, the vassal for the time being is personally liable for the feu-duties, just as in the case of landlord and tenant the tenant for the time being is personally bound to pay the rent; that is a liability resulting from principles of tenure. In both these cases the personal liability arises by reason of what in this country is called privity of estate. But that doctrine has no application to a case like the present, where there is no such relation subsisting." And so, as I read these passages, the judgment in the case of Gardyne was rested upon this, that a person disponing lands, and simply retaining right to a ground-annual out of the estate, which ground-annual he makes a real burden on the lands, has no such title to the lands as will enable him to enforce a personal obligation such as we have here, and cannot enforce even the personal obligation for payment of the ground-annual. It would, as I have also observed, be a most extraordinary result, that although he cannot enforce payment of the ground-annual he would still have a title to compel the proprietor taking the estate from his disponee to put up buildings to cover the ground-annual. The argument appears to me to be entirely excluded by the grounds of judgment in the case of Gardyne.

It was maintained by the reclaimer that if he could not make his right effectual under the original disposition by the Marshalls to the Bruces against any proprietor for the time, he can do so under the deed which Bruce granted to Messrs Macneill & Company. But the Lord Chancellor says in Gardyne's case that it was not competent to Duff, the disponee, to give the holder of the ground-annual the right claimed against a disponee from him, and, if this was not competent to Duff, so here it was not competent to Bruce to give the pursuer such a right as against his disponees, the defenders. I have read the disposition in the defenders' favour with care, and I do not find any terms in it which on a legitimate construction can be held as imposing or attempting to impose upon the defenders, the disponees, a personal obligation to erect buildings to secure payment of the ground-annuals. If any clause of the deed could be so read, the case of Gardyne is, I think, a clear authority for saying it would be ineffectual. The present pursuer, or the bankrupts whom he represents, was no party to the deed by the Bruces in favour of the defenders, and he can take no benefit from it. It is res inter alios so far as he is concerned, and confers no title by which he can enforce any obligation arising on that transaction and which does not arise under the original contract of ground-annual. And so I agree with your Lordship in holding that the case fails. If the argument were sound it must, as it appears to me, go the length of this, that the present pursuer is entitled to enforce payment of the feu-duties. The obligation to pay these is an inherent condition of the tenure, but the pursuer has no right or title to enforce it.

No. 139.

June 19, 1888.
Marshall's Trustee v. Macneill & Co.

There was a second question discussed, as to whether there can be liability for an obligation to erect buildings against the defenders in any view now that they have reconveyed the lands to the original disponees. Even if this were held to be an inherent condition of the tenure enforceable by the pursuer as in right of the ground-annual, it rather appears to me that the obligation must go with the proprietorship for the time, and cease when the right of proprietorship is transferred to another. Upon that point, however, I give no final opinion, and I have only noticed it because it was the subject of much argument; and upon the whole I agree with your Lordship in thinking that we should adhere to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Adam.—I am also quite satisfied with the Lord Ordinary's judgment, and with the reasons assigned by his Lordship in support of it, and I would only wish to add with reference to the last paragraph of his Lordship's note relating to the effect of the disposition by Macneill & Company to the Bruces executed pendente processu, that I think it raises a very difficult question, upon which I would desire to reserve my opinion. I rest my opinion on the first paragraph of the Lord Ordinary's opinion and on that alone, and I give no opinion on the second paragraph.

Lord President.—We have all abstained, I think, from saying anything about the last paragraph of the Lord Ordinary's note. The first paragraph is what we have adopted as the grounds of our judgment.

Lord Mure was absent.

The Court adhered.

J. & J. Ross, W.S.—Pearson, Robertson, & Finlay, W.S.—Agents.

No. 140.

June 21, 1888.
Watt v. Neilson & Co.

Euphemia Watt and Others, Pursuers (Appellants).—Shaw—G. W. Burnet.

Walter Neilson & Company, Defenders (Respondents).—Murray—Fleming.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Defective machinery.—A workman was fatally injured while engaged along with others in raising a heavy barrel, which was suspended by a moveable block and tackle from an iron bar laid across a hatchway in the roof of the apartment in which he was working. The iron bar was laid upon two wooden stools, the block and tackle being attached to it by a hook, and the accident took place through the slipping of the bar. The deceased had assisted to adjust the block and tackle on the day of the accident, and on various previous occasions on which the same operation had been conducted with safety during the preceding four years. In an action by his widow

No. 140.

June 21, 1888.
Watt v. Neilson & Co.

2d Division.
Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute.
I.

and family against the employer, held that, in the circumstances, neither defect in the machinery nor neglect to provide proper appliances had been proved, and defender assoilzied accordingly.

Euphemia Kiddie or Watt, widow of Robert Watt, storekeeper, Glasgow, and her two children, Robert and William Watt, raised an action against Walter Neilson & Company, ironfounders there, to recover damages for the death of Robert Watt, who died on 1st May 1887 from the consequences of an accident which befell him in the defenders' works on 10th March 1887. The pursuers concluded for £500 as damages at common law, and alternatively for £180 as damages due under the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

The action was raised in the following circumstances:—The deceased had been for more than ten years in the employment of the defenders as a storekeeper. The work of japanning metal was carried on on the first floor of their works. In the course of it the tanks in which the japanning material was kept for the use of the workers had to be refilled at intervals of about six to nine months. These tanks stood about four feet above the level of the floor, and in order to fill them barrels of japan had to be raised to the edges of them. At one time this had been done by rolling the barrels up planks to the top of the tanks, but for about four years before the accident, and at the date of it, the following method was adopted. An opening or hatchway about 3½ feet long by 2½ feet broad was made above the tanks through the roof of the room, which was about nine feet above the floor, and in the room above an iron bar was laid across the opening. From this bar depended a chain, adjusted to the bar by a hook. By means of a block and tackle connected with this chain the barrels were raised to the required height. The bar was not laid directly on the joists of the floor above, but, in order to give a greater length of chain, was laid upon blocks of wood or on stools on the floor. At the date of the accident stools were used, and they were placed on their sides on the floor with the legs towards the opening, in order to make them more steady. That was done by two workmen named Nish and Wilson, Watt remaining below to see whether the adjustment of the bar and tackle appeared to be correct from that position, and whether the other arrangements were in order. The barrels were then raised one by one, and while the third of them was being raised, and the men were pushing somewhat to one side in order to get it emptied into the tank, the iron bar slipped off the stools and fell through the opening. The barrel and tackle fell with it, and the bar struck the head of Watt, causing him the injuries of which he died.

The pursuers averred that the plant used for hoisting the barrel was defective.

They pleaded;—(1) The said deceased Robert Watt having been fatally injured through the defective state of the said iron bar and blocks belonging to the defenders, the defenders are liable to the pursuers in reparation for his injuries and death to the extent of the sum sued for in the first conclusion. (2) The pursuers having suffered loss and damage from the injuries and death of the deceased Robert Watt, to the extent of £180, through the fault and negligence of the defenders in allowing their works, machinery, or plant to be in a defective condition, are entitled under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, to decree therefor.

The defenders denied that the plant was defective.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The deceased not having met his death through the fault or negligence of the defenders, or of anyone for whom they are responsible, the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied.

At the proof the above facts were proved.

No. 140.
—
June 21, 1888.
Watt v. Neilson & Co.

The pursuers examined two consulting engineers, who were of opinion that it was dangerous to leave the iron bar unfixed; and further that as it was necessary in emptying the barrel to press it somewhat to one side, a longer chain ought to have been used; and, therefore, that it ought to have been fixed, not to the floor above but to some higher point. These witnesses admitted that the arrangement, though primitive, was quite sufficient to hoist the barrels in point of strength of materials. One of them admitted that for lifting light weights and for temporary purposes such a system was occasionally used. They thought that in the operation as carried out in the defenders' works jerking of the barrel would be a very likely thing to occur.

The Sheriff-substitute (Cowan) found that the accident was caused by the "fault of the deceased's fellow-workmen, Robert Nish and Thomas Wilson, in not properly placing the supporting bar and bearing stools so that the same should not give way," and found "in law that the defenders are liable under the Employers Liability Act to the pursuer Mrs Euphemia Kiddie or Watt, the widow of the deceased."

On appeal the Sheriff (Moncreiff) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the appeal, and recalls the interlocutor appealed against, . . . Finds that the deceased Robert Watt on 10th March 1887, while in the employment of the defenders, and while engaged in hoisting a barrel in their service, sustained an injury on the head, from which he died on the 1st of May following: Finds that it is not proved that the said injury was caused through the fault of the defenders, or of anyone for whom they are responsible: Finds in law that they are not liable either under the said Act or at common law." *

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—The defenders were liable both at common law and under subsec. 1 of sec. 1 of the Employers Liability Act,† for the use of defective plant. The evidence shewed the plant used

---

* "NOTE.— . . . . . (After stating that in his opinion the pursuers had stated no case under the Act)—In my opinion the only serious question in the case is whether the accident occurred owing to a defect in the plant or machinery for which the defenders are responsible. On this matter I agree with the Sheriff-substitute. The method of raising the barrels was certainly primitive, but then the operation in question, viz., raising a barrel to the height of four feet, was comparatively simple, and did not require much engineering skill. The apparatus was rigged up in the full sight of all the persons engaged, the iron bar itself being only a few feet above the heads of those below. They had all therefore the best means of seeing and judging for themselves whether the operation was a dangerous one or not, and the risk was an ordinary one.

"It does not clearly appear what was the precise cause of the accident. No doubt, if the iron bar had been fixed it would not have happened; but barrels had been raised for three or four years in this way with perfect safety, and, therefore, it would appear that the accident was caused either through some carelessness on the part of Nish or Wilson in placing the bar, or possibly (though I do not favour this view), through the fault of those below, including the deceased himself, in handling the barrel which was being raised incautiously.

"After a careful consideration of the evidence I do not think that it can be said that there was any defect in the plant or machinery. Nish says (proof p. 62),—'It did not appear to me that there was any danger about it. It seemed a simple thing.' This seems to have been the opinion of all concerned, and no accident had ever happened before, and no complaint had ever been made to the defenders."

† The Employers Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 42), provides by sec. 1,—"Where . . . personal injury is caused to a workman, (subsec. 1) by reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant,

No. 140.

June 21, 1888.
Watt v. Neilson & Co.

to be defective, the fault being want of reasonable precaution for the safety of the men engaged in the work. The cause of the accident was neglect of the reasonable precaution of fixing the iron bar. Besides it appeared that the men were left to use blocks of wood, or stools, or anything else they might find convenient, to support the bar. A master's ordinary common law duty required him to make adequate provision for his men having suitable materials for the work they had to do. The duty here was all the greater because the work was seldom required, and not such as fell within the ordinary duty of a storekeeper.[1]

Argued for defenders;—The machinery was simple, but sufficient, and no fault could be traced to it. The deceased, in any view, knew it well, and had helped to get it ready, and those in his right could not now maintain that it was defective.

Lord Young.—This is a narrow case. The Sheriff-substitute is of opinion that the pursuer has no case at common law. In that the Sheriff agrees. The Sheriff-substitute, however, thinks that there is liability under the Employers Liability Act, 1880. The accident is, in his opinion, attributable to the fault of Nish, a fellow-workman, to whose orders he thinks the deceased man was bound to conform. On that point the Sheriff differs from the Sheriff-substitute. He says that that ground of liability is not set forth on record, and that the pursuer, at the debate on the appeal, admitted that it had not been argued to the Sheriff-substitute, and declined when he (the Sheriff) offered him leave to do so to amend his record in order to raise it. I agree with the Sheriff that the pursuer has no such case on record, and has not in truth such a case as the Sheriff-substitute has sustained. So far I have no doubt. I think the doubtful part of the case is the question which arises at common law. Were the means provided by the employer for raising the barrels such as he was bound to provide in the discharge of his duty to his servants? On that question the authorities and the facts of the case leave my mind not quite free from doubt. There was some danger. The system had been pursued for years, and the accident then occurred. But, on the best consideration I can give to the case, I am not disposed to differ from both the Sheriffs on this question of common law liability. It is pointed out by them both that this is not a proper case of defective machinery, that the case is not one, such as we often have, of failure to supply proper appliances for the performance of the work with safety. Occasionally—once in about nine months—these barrels require to be hoisted. The deceased had, along with Nish, been at the raising of them for about ten years. For about four years the barrels had been raised in the way which was followed here. The appliance was rigged up in sight of the men. The master was never applied to for any additional appliances. It was a simple operation, not requiring, as the Sheriff points out, any particular machinery or engineering skill. It connected with or used in the business of the employer . . . the workman, or in case the injury results in death, the legal personal representatives of the workman, and any persons entitled in case of death, shall have the same right of compensation and remedies against the employer as if the workman had not been a workman of nor in the service of the employer, nor engaged in his work."

---

[1] Pollock v. Cassidy, Feb. 26, 1870, 8 Macph. 615, 42 Scot. Jur. 303; Robertson v. Brown, May 17, 1876, 3 R. 652; Grant v. Drysdale, July 12, 1883, 10 R. 1159; Bowie v. Rankin, June 15, 1886, 13 R. 981; M'Inally v. King's Trustees, Oct. 27, 1886, 14 R. 8; Heske v. Samuelson, Nov. 20, 1883, L. R., 12 Q. B. D. 30.

No. 140.
June 21, 1888.
Watt v. Neilson & Co.

had been attended to by the workmen for years without any suspicion of danger or suggestion that any other means ought to be taken. In these circumstances, although it has been shewn that by a side strain the bar was pulled off and the accident happened, I cannot predicate of the master that he was in fault and was not doing his duty. I am not prepared to differ from the Sheriffs and to impute this fault to him. The case, I repeat, is very near to some of those in which we have held that there was liability. But none of them is so near it as to cause us to decide against the defenders here.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark concurred.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I also concur in the result, though I think the case a doubtful one.

Lord Craighill was absent.

This interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords . . . find in fact that it is not proved that the injury sustained by Robert Watt, mentioned in the record, was caused through the fault of the defenders, or of anyone for whom they are responsible; and find in law that they are not liable, either under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, or at common law, for said injury: Therefore dismiss the appeal, affirm the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against, and assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decern."

Thomas Carmichael, S.S.C.—Drummond & Reid, W.S.—Agents.

No. 141.
June 22, 1888.
Quin v. Gardner & Sons, Limited.

Mrs Agnes Donaldson or Quin (Quin's Executrix), Pursuer.—C. S. Dickson—Harvey.
James Gardner & Sons, Limited, Defenders.—D.-F. Mackintosh—J. C. Lorimer.

Process—Proof—Remit to man of skill—Consent.—In an action brought for recovery of an alleged balance of the price of certain contract railway work, the question relating to the construction and scope of a written agreement, the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) made a remit to a man of skill to report "whether the railway as executed is covered by the contract . . . or whether it differs from the work contemplated . . . in whole or in part, and that to such extent and degree that the schedule prices cannot be fairly applied to the work as executed." The defenders reclaimed and asked for a proof. The Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and allowed a proof,—holding that as the remit involved questions of law as well as fact, it was inexpedient, if not incompetent, to make it without the consent of parties.

Observations upon the practice of the Court in making remits to men of skill.

Process—Leave to reclaim—Allowance of proof—Remit to man of skill—Court of Session Act, 1878 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 28, and Act of Sederunt, 10*th March* 1870, sec. 2.—In a case where a remit was made by the Lord Ordinary to a man of skill the Court held that as the interlocutor was one which virtually settled the mode of proof of at least a part of the case, it was of the class of interlocutors which might be reclaimed against without leave within six days of its date.

1st Division.
Lord M'Laren.
M.

On 17th December 1885 Peter Quin, contractor, made an offer to Messrs James Gardner & Sons, Limited, Meiklehill Collieries, Kirkintilloch, "to execute the work required to make a line of railway and sidings from the Campsie branch of the North British Railway . . . to your No. 2 pit at Meiklehill, in conformity with the plans and specification signed by me as relative hereto, for the slump sum mentioned below, or, in your

No. 141.

June 22, 1888.
Quin v. Gardner & Sons, Limited.

option, at the several prices named in the annexed schedule, and you shall be at liberty to accept the whole of my offer, or only such other parts thereof as you may decide upon. The whole of the operations undertaken by me shall be carried on and completed with the utmost expedition, and to your entire satisfaction. Should you agree to accept my offer for the whole work detailed in specification, I hereby bind myself to finish the same, so as to permit the working of your traffic thereon, within three months from date of your acceptance, &c. . . ." On 26th December following Messrs Gardner accepted the offer, subject to certain stipulations. These, as stated by them, were, inter alia;—"We shall have power, during the progress of these operations, to make such changes in the plan and extent of the work detailed in specification as we may deem necessary. . . . The whole quantities of work done shall be measured on the completion of the contract, and paid for at the rates entered in schedule of prices which accompanies your offer, with the exception of the fencing, the rate for which, as verbally arranged, shall be 2s. 2d. per lineal yard. . . ." Thereafter on 23d January 1886 Quin wrote stating "that the work shall be carried on as directed."

The work was begun in January 1886, but it was not till July following that a plan relative to the specification and schedule was furnished.

Quin having died on 1st August 1886, his wife, as his sole trustee and executrix, now sued the Messrs Gardner for payment of £1924, 15s. 1d., being the balance remaining unpaid of the total cost of the work, which, according to measurements made by the pursuer's engineer, was alleged to amount to £3374, 15s. 1d. The defenders admitted a balance due to the pursuer of £338, 10s. 6d., but repudiated both the quantities and the rates stated by the pursuer,—the rates not being the schedule rates and the quantities not being in conformity with those stated in the final measurement certified by their engineers.

The pursuer alleged that after the contract work was begun "the defenders entirely altered the line and levels of the railway in question, so that the work actually done is of an entirely different nature and extent from what was originally contemplated, or covered by, or included in the original contract." She further alleged that the "new scheme involved far more work and labour, and a much longer time for its completion, than had been originally contemplated; in particular, it involved a much greater proportion of deep excavation than the original scheme, through material very different, and very much more difficult to work"; that "prior to Mr Quin's death his foreman and clerk had from time to time pointed out to the defenders that there had been a complete substitution of one scheme for another, and that the schedule rates originally contemplated were no longer applicable"; and that, after Quin's death, it had been intimated that the pursuer would only proceed with the substituted scheme on the footing of being paid fair and reasonable prices therefor.

The defenders answered that the alleged alteration on the contract had been suggested by and arranged with Quin himself; that they had wished to delay the final arrangements until certain necessary consents from persons interested were obtained, but that Quin was very anxious to begin work and had urged the acceptance of his offer, and that the defenders should guard themselves by taking power to alter the extent and plan of the work; and that in consequence the acceptance of 26th December 1886 (quoted above), containing a general power to alter, had been completed. They denied that Quin or his foreman had repudiated the contract rates, and stated that the last receipt signed by Quin prior to his death had borne:—"Received . . . to account of contract price of railway . . . as per prefixed certificate"; and that he had never intimated that the

No. 141.
—
June 22, 1888.
Quin v. Gardner & Sons, Limited.

contract rates were insufficient or inapplicable, or that he was not working under the contract.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defenders having as condescended on abandoned the work originally contemplated and concluded in the contract, and required other and more expensive work to be done, they are bound to pay therefor quantum meruit.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The alterations in the gradient of the line, and consequent thereon, being within the terms of the contract, the work falls to be paid for according to contract rates. (3) The said alterations being within the knowledge and contemplation of the contractor when he concluded the agreement, the work falls under the contract.

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren), on 17th May 1888, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Remits to George Miller Cunningham, Esq., C.E., to inspect the private railway in question, and to call for documents and explanations, and to report his opinion on the question whether the railway, as executed, is covered by the contract contained in the missives dated 17th and 26th December 1885 and 23d January 1886 and relative schedule and specification, or whether the railway, as executed, differs from the work contemplated in the missives, schedule, and specification, in whole or in part, and that to such extent and degree that the schedule prices cannot be fairly applied to the work as executed, and quoad ultra continues the cause." *

The defenders moved the Lord Ordinary for leave to reclaim, which was refused, but a reclaiming note having been presented to the First Division, the Court held it to be competent, on the ground that the interlocutor virtually settled the mode of proof of at least a part of the case, and might therefore be reclaimed against without leave within six days.†

---

* "NOTE.—If the referee should find that there is any question of facts on which it is necessary that witnesses should be examined on oath, he may apply to the Lord Ordinary for further powers. After counsel have been heard on the subject of the present remit it will be open to the Lord Ordinary to make a second remit to the same or a different 'referee' to report as to the sum payable by the defenders to the pursuer."

† In a note appended to an interlocutor on a subsequent branch of the case, the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) took occasion to remark that it appeared that the Inner-House had set aside his refusal to grant leave to reclaim at a former stage, and had notwithstanding entertained a reclaiming note. His Lordship added, —"I must therefore conclude that the Court is of opinion that leave to reclaim is a mere ceremony, and that the Lord Ordinary has no discretion to give or withhold it."

The case having again come under review of the Inner-House, the Lord President said in reference to the note above quoted,—"My attention has been called to the note to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 14th July, from which it appears that his Lordship has proceeded upon a great misapprehension. His Lordship's interlocutor of 17th May directed an inquiry, which really amounted to a proof, regarding certain of the statements upon record, and postponed procedure in regard to others. That was a six days' interlocutor which may be reclaimed against without leave. It falls within the provisions of the 2d section of the Act of Sederunt of 1870, and of the 28th section of the Court of Session Act of 1868, and under these sections it may be reclaimed against as matter of right within six days. The discretion which is given to the Lord Ordinary by the 54th section of the Court of Session Act, 1868, is an absolute and unqualified discretion. The Lord Ordinary is final upon that matter. I feel it necessary to make this explanation, because it appears that Lord M'Laren has been totally misinformed in regard to the nature of our former judgment."

No. 141.
—
June 22, 1888.
Quin v. Gardner & Sons, Limited.

Argued for the reclaimers;—This was a question of mixed law and fact; and the remit, if not incompetent, was extremely inexpedient. At anyrate, this was not a case for a remit unless parties consented.[1] The question whether the contract covered the work done was a legal question. On the language of the contract the case was excluded, because it covered any alterations or changes that might be thought necessary. In order to decide the legal question it was right and proper that the actings of the parties to it should be ascertained. It was unexampled to make a remit in a case like the present unless with the consent of parties. A proof ought to be allowed, restricted, if need be, as the Court might see fit.

Argued for the pursuer;—The question was whether the work done fell within the agreement. The communings and actings of parties could not affect the matter. A remit was therefore the best way of bringing the matter to a point, and it was a course which had been taken in previous cases,[2] without consent of parties.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is always in some sense a question of discretion whether this mode of inquiry by way of remit should be adopted or not. But there is also a question of right involved upon both sides. Prima facie the pursuer's right is to be allowed to prove his averments, and the defender may maintain that he is not bound to submit to any but the ordinary mode of proof, unless the case is unadapted for that procedure. The remit here is of a fragment of the case only, and the result of the remit, if it be favourable to the pursuer, would not exhaust the case, because the defenders have also made averments on record which would bring their case to a successful issue even assuming that the result of the remit is favourable to the pursuer. If the averments made by the defenders are well founded, it is impossible to hold that the pursuer is entitled to treat the work performed as anything but contract work.

The question which the Lord Ordinary has remitted is one of very doubtful competency as the subject of a remit, because it involves the construction of a contract, the question being "whether the railway, as executed, is covered by the contract, or whether it differs from the work contemplated in whole or in part." The question what was contemplated by the contract is a question of law for the consideration of the Court. No doubt it may be necessary in answering the question to ascertain the facts; but the ascertainment of these facts must result in and involve the consideration of matters of law. The case can of course never be satisfactorily disposed of until the facts upon both sides have been cleared up; for they will have a material bearing upon the ultimate issue whether the contract covers the railway or not.

The present remit goes beyond anything we have ever sustained, and I am not for forcing remits upon unwilling parties to an extent beyond what has been sanctioned by the Court in previous cases.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion as your Lordship, and think that proof of some kind and to some extent is necessary in this case. But while I so think in this case, I also hold that there are cases, more or less numerous, in

---

[1] Clerk v. Shotts Iron Co., Feb. 24, 1888, H. L., Weekly Notes.

[2] Lord Blantyre v. Glasgow, Paisley, and Greenock Railway Co., Feb. 1, 1851, 13 D. 570; Smith Brothers & Co. v. Scott, March 17, 1875, 2 R. 601 (L. J.-C. Moncreiff, p. 608); Nisbet v. Mitchell-Innes, Feb. 20, 1880, 7 R. 575.

No. 141.

June 22, 1888.
Quin v. Gardner & Sons, Limited.

which the Court would be right in making a remit to a man of skill, even where there is no consent of parties. The most familiar case of that kind is that of fixtures, where there is a question whether they belong to the heir or executor, and where it is impossible that the Court should see the articles in dispute. Accordingly, the Court is in use to put itself in possession of the facts by making a remit, and thereby, by getting the full description of the articles, their position, and the extent of their attachment to the soil, and the reporter's views generally, is enabled to settle the rights of parties. In such cases it would be out of the question to have a proof. So, too, for example, in a question where the Court is asked to determine whether machinery is conform to contract or not, a remit may often be properly made to save expensive procedure. I am disposed to hold that if the Court should think a remit the best mode of ascertaining the facts in such cases, it has the power to make it, and it is expedient that it should do so, without requiring the consent of parties. But in the present case, I think, a remit is not desirable, because it appears to me that a great deal of light may be obtained from the actings of parties at the time of the execution of the contract, and afterwards, which will be of use in deciding the questions in dispute.

Lord Adam.—I do not see how the reporter could answer the questions of fact in this case without at the same time making up his mind upon the questions of law. That is sufficient to shew me that the remit is an improper one. Besides, it will be very important that the Court should know something of the actings of the parties before we are called upon to determine the questions in dispute.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—" . . . . Recall the said interlocutor: Remit to the Lord Ordinary to allow parties a proof of their averments on record, but excluding from the proof in the meantime all questions of detailed measurement, and all questions as to the rate of remuneration to which the pursuer will be entitled if it be found that the work was not executed under the contract. . . . ."

R. Menzies, S.S.C.—Clark & Macdonald, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 142.

June 26, 1888.
Thom v. Andrew.

James Wallace Thom, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Party.
Francis Andrew, Defender (Respondent).—Rhind.

Expenses—Caution—Bankrupt.—Held (rev. judgment of Lord Lee) that an undischarged bankrupt who had brought an action against his landlord for damages on account of the landlord unwarrantably breaking into the premises let and removing furniture and stock therein belonging to the pursuer, was entitled to insist in the action without finding caution for expenses, although the trustee in the sequestration had declined to sist himself as a party to the action.

2d Division.
Lord Lee.
M.

On 4th February 1888 James Wallace Thom, confectioner and medicated lozenge manufacturer, carrying on business in Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Paisley, brought an action against Francis Andrew, auctioneer, Broad Street, Aberdeen, concluding for £1000 in name of damages.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 2) "By missive of lease, dated 31st December 1887, the defender let to the pursuer the shop 47 Broad Street, Aberdeen, at a weekly rent of £2, for a period not to exceed three months, unless otherwise agreed upon between the parties; entry to be given on 31st December 1887. . . ." (Cond. 3) "The pursuer duly entered into possession of said shop . . . The pursuer's business was conducted therein in a prosperous manner up till the evening of Tuesday 31st January 1888." (Cond. 5) "On the evening of said 31st January 1888, the said shop was closed and secured in the customary way, and the key taken possession of by the pursuer. . . . The defender sometime between midnight of 31st January and six o'clock the following morning, 1st February 1888, went to the said shop along with joiners and other men, and without giving the pursuer any intimation or warning, forcibly and illegally broke into and entered the said shop, breaking open a wooden partition at the back thereof, or otherwise. . . ." (Cond. 6) "After the defender and those acting on his instructions had effected a forcible entrance into the said shop as aforesaid, he and they illegally, and without any warrant or authority whatever, lifted and carried out into the street the whole contents thereof, embracing shop-fittings, iron safe, manufacturing machinery and plant, drawings, &c. The shelving which had been fitted up by the pursuer in said shop was also torn down and removed. After the whole contents of the shop had been taken out in the street by the order and instructions of the defender, they were placed upon three lorries, which had been brought there by him, and were carried away by the defender, who illegally and unwarrantably retains possession thereof, and refuses or delays to return the same to said shop, although he has been requested to do so by the pursuer." (Cond. 9) "By the said illegal and unwarrantable action of the defender in forcibly breaking open the pursuer's said shop and illegally carrying away and detaining the whole contents thereof as aforesaid, the pursuer has not only sustained loss and damage to the amount of the value of said contents, but he has suffered in his feelings and has been subjected to much anxiety and inconvenience; his trade has been suddenly put a stop to and his credit and reputation have been seriously injured. . . ."

The pursuer pleaded;—The defender having illegally, unwarrantably, and forcibly broken open the pursuer's said shop, taken possession of and carried away the whole contents thereof belonging to the pursuer, and paralysed his business, is liable in damages therefor, and decree should be granted as concluded for, with expenses.

In answer to articles 5 and 6 the defender stated,—(Ans. 5 and 6) "Admitted that on 1st February 1888 the defender removed from the premises which had been let by him to the pursuer the pursuer's effects therein, and deposited them with Mr M'Adam, carting contractor, North Charlotte Street, Aberdeen, for safe custody. This he, on the same day, intimated to the pursuer. Quoad ultra denied, and reference is made to the defender's statement."

In his statement of facts the defender further averred that the agreement between him and the pursuer was for a monthly tenancy of the shop (which the pursuer denied); that on 9th January 1888 he had given the pursuer written warning to remove at 31st January following (which warning the pursuer stated he had never received); and that on 1st February he had written to the pursuer in these terms:—"Sir,—As you did not remove from the front part of my shop, No. 47 Broad Street, at the end of your month, I was obliged this morning to remove your effects. They now lie at Mr M'Adam's, carting contractor, North Charlotte Street, who will no doubt deliver them to you on application."

The defender stated that the pursuer was an undischarged bankrupt.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer being an undischarged bankrupt, should, ante omnia, be ordained to find caution.

On 6th March the Lord Ordinary (Lee) pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect it is stated that the pursuer is an undischarged bankrupt, appoints intimation of the dependence of this process to the trustee on

No. 142.

June 26, 1888.
Thom v. Andrew.

his sequestrated estate, in order that he may, if so advised, sist himself as a party to the action within ten days."

The trustee declined to sist himself, and on 13th March the Lord Ordinary ordained the pursuer to find caution for expenses by the first box-day in the ensuing vacation.

On 29th May the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect the pursuer has failed to find caution for expenses, assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses," &c.

The pursuer reclaimed.[1]

LORD YOUNG.—In this case, which is an action of damages on account of the alleged actings of the defender in breaking into the pursuer's shop in Aberdeen on the morning of 31st January last, the Lord Ordinary, upon the 6th of March, pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary, in respect it is stated that the pursuer is an undischarged bankrupt, appoints intimation of the dependence of this process to the trustee on his sequestrated estate, in order that he may, if so advised, sist himself as a party to the action within ten days." That intimation was given to the trustee, but he declined to sist himself. The Lord Ordinary then, on 13th March, ordained the pursuer to find caution for expenses by the first box-day in vacation. No satisfactory caution was found, and in consequence, upon 29th May, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the interlocutor which is the subject of this reclaiming note, by which he assoilzied the defender from the conclusion of the summons, in respect that the pursuer had failed to find caution. The question therefore for our consideration is whether caution for expenses ought to have been ordered as a condition of allowing the pursuer to proceed with his action.

This matter of ordaining a party to an action to find caution for expenses is always a question for the discretion of the Court, and the Court may in its discretion ordain either the pursuer or the defender to find caution, but the Court will not exercise its discretion in the way of ordaining the party to find caution unless the interests of justice appear to require it. It is a general rule that a bankrupt who has been divested of his whole estate by the operation of the Bankruptcy Acts, or who has divested himself by a voluntary deed, shall not be permitted to sue any action relative to that estate of which he has been divested unless he either finds caution or obtains the concurrence of his trustee. That is not on the ground that he is poor and will not be able to pay the expenses should he lose the action and have decree for expenses pronounced against him. That is true of a great many litigants, who, although they may be entirely without funds, are not on that account ordained to find caution. A very familiar example is that of persons on the poor's-roll. It is always true of them that they are not good for the expenses, and yet they are not only permitted to sue without finding caution—they are even provided, through the liberality of the professions, with counsel and agents to conduct the litigation on their behalf. But a man who is divested of his whole estate is in a different position, and in regard to him, as I have said, the general rule is that he shall find caution. The Court, however, has recognised an exception to this general rule in the case of certain actions of a personal character—not an absolute exception, for the Court retains its discretion to require a bankrupt to find caution as a condition of suing even such actions. But a bankrupt is not to be grossly slandered or assaulted and yet have no remedy unless he can either find caution or get his trustee to sist himself as a party to the action, which I should think a trustee, desirous of doing his duty honestly by the estate and the creditors, may in many cases very well refuse to do. Actions of damages for slander or for assault, therefore, are exceptions to the general rule, though, as I have said, not absolute exceptions, as we see from the case of Clarke (11 R. 418) which was cited to us, where the other Division refused to allow the bankrupt pursuer of an action of damages for slander to proceed with his action unless he found caution.

---

[1] Defender's Authority.—Clarke v. Muller, Jan. 16, 1884, 11 R. 418.

Now, considering the present case as I best can from the statements before us, if there is any truth in what the pursuer says, and it does not seem to be seriously denied, I think that the conduct of the defender was really outrageous. Upon a notice of removing of a very few days—a notice which indeed the pursuer says he never received—in the course of the night—it was about three in a January morning—the defender proceeded with a number of men to the shop in which the pursuer carried on his business, and broke open the door, and entering the shop carried off its whole contents. That appears to me a most lawless proceeding on the part of the defender, and no explanation is given on the record, or was stated to us from the bar, which can be regarded as suggesting any sort of justification of it. I think it is a wrong to which the pursuer is not bound to submit merely because he is a bankrupt who can neither find caution nor get his trustee to take up the litigation. I doubt whether the trustee would be warranted in appearing and conducting such a litigation, but I do not think that the bankrupt is on that account bound to submit to this outrage without redress. I am of opinion, therefore, that in the exercise of our discretion we should recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ordaining the pursuer to find caution, and remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed. Of course the recall is merely in hoc statu, for the application to have the pursuer ordained to find caution may be renewed at any stage of the proceedings, should circumstances appear to warrant it.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—This is so very peculiar a case that I am disposed to agree in the conclusion at which Lord Young has arrived.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I have come to the same conclusion as Lord Young. The general rule is that a bankrupt will not be allowed to sue an action without finding caution. This general rule the Court enforces with some stringency, but in actions which are personal to the bankrupt, the Court has from time to time permitted the rule to be relaxed, and I must say that this invasion of the premises of the pursuer appears to me to present rather a strong case for relaxing the rule.

Lord Craighill was absent.

The Court recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the case.

Sturrock & Graham, W.S.—Wm. Officer, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 143.

June 26, 1888.

Crichton v. North British Railway Co.

MISS CATHERINE CRICHTON AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—C. N. Johnston.
THE NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Respondents.—J. C. Thomson.

Process—Arbitration—Diligence for citing havers.—Where one of the parties to an arbitration presented a petition to the Court for warrant to cite witnesses to appear before a commissioner and produce documents conform to specification annexed, the Court refused the petition, holding that the approval of the arbiters to the specification ought first to have been obtained.

2D DIVISION.
M.

IN a submission under the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, between Miss Catherine Crichton and others, proprietors of certain heritable subjects in Burntisland, and the North British Railway Company, as to the value of these subjects, which had been taken over by the company, the arbiters, on 29th March 1888, allowed a proof, and thereafter, on 31st May, pronounced an order fixing the time and place of the proof, and recommending the Court, and the Sheriffs of the Lothians and Peebles, and of the county of Fife, to grant warrant for citing witnesses and havers.

On 23d June Miss Crichton and the other proprietors of the subjects, presented a petition to the Court praying for warrant for the citation of havers to produce before a commissioner the documents called for in a specification annexed.

The railway company opposed the application.

THE COURT refused the petition, being of opinion that, as they had no knowledge of the facts of the case, the proper course was first to have had the specification approved of by the arbiters, and then, if necessary, to have applied to the Court.

ANDREW WALLACE, Solicitor—MILLAR, ROBSON, & INNES, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 144.

June 27, 1888.

Campbell v. Maquay.

JOHN CAMPBELL, First Party.—D.-F. Mackintosh—Murray.
MRS R. E. MACLAINE OR MAQUAY, Second Party.—Jameson—Patten.

Minor and Pupil—Tutor—Mother's second marriage—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (Act 49 and 50 Vict. c. 27).—The 2d section of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, provides that, "on the death of the father of an infant, and in case the father shall have died prior to the passing of this Act, then from and after the passing of this Act, the mother, if surviving, shall be the guardian of such infant, either alone, when no guardian has been appointed by the father, or jointly with any guardian appointed by the father."

Held that the fact of a mother entering into a second marriage does not affect her right under the statute to be guardian to her children by the first marriage.

1ST DIVISION.
M.

(VIDE Maquay v. Campbell, March 17, 1888, ante, p. 606.)

Miss Rosa Elizabeth Maclaine was married to William Macbean Rankine of Dudhope on 8th July 1874. Mr Rankine died on 31st October 1879. There were three children of the marriage—(1) Violet Campbell Rankine, born 28th April 1876; (2) Walter Lorne Campbell Rankine, born 4th July 1877; and (3) Muriel Campbell Rankine, born 25th September 1878.

By antenuptial marriage-contract between Mr and Mrs Rankine, John Campbell of Kilberry—Mr Rankine's elder brother—and three others were appointed trustees, and they were also nominated tutors and curators to the children of the marriage. Two of the trustees never accepted office nor acted as tutors, and the third having died Mr Campbell was then the only surviving and acting tutor.

On 5th July 1884 Mrs Rankine married Mr William Maquay, a banker, resident in Florence, Italy, and not a domiciled Scotsman, and she afterwards resided there with him.

Mrs Maquay's children by her first marriage for some time resided with their uncle in Argyllshire, but on 17th March 1888, in a petition at Mrs Maquay's instance to have them delivered over to her, the Court, having regard to the provisions of the 5th section of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, 49 and 50 Vict. c. 27, granted the prayer of her petition (ante, p. 606).

This was a special case between Mr Campbell as first party and Mrs Maquay as second party, in which the following question was put to the Court:—" Is the party of the second part entitled, jointly with the first party, to the office of tutor to the pupil children of the marriage between her and the deceased William Macbean Rankine, and to perform the duties of the said office?"

It was stated in the case,—" A question has arisen as to the right of the party of the second part to act as tutor to her pupil children, and to be consulted regarding acts of administration affecting their estate. The party of the first part maintains that by the law of Scotland the second party, being a married woman, is not now entitled to act as tutor aforesaid, notwithstanding the provisions of the statute above referred to. The second party maintains that under the provisions of the said statute she is entitled to act as tutor aforesaid, and that she is not disqualified by her second marriage or otherwise from so acting." *

Argued for the first party;—By the law of Scotland a widow, by entering into a second marriage, was absolutely disqualified from acting as tutor to the children by her first marriage. A married woman could not act as tutor, and even if she had been nominated by her deceased husband to act notwithstanding a second marriage, the Court had been in the habit of enforcing the disqualification.[1] That disqualification must be read into

---

* The Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, sec. 2, provided,—" On the death of the father of an infant, and in case the father shall have died prior to the passing of this Act, then from and after the passing of this Act, the mother, if surviving, shall be the guardian of such infant, either alone, when no guardian has been appointed by the father, or jointly with any guardian appointed by the father. When no guardian has been appointed by the father, or if the guardian or guardians appointed by the father is or are dead, or refuses or refuse to act, the Court may, if it shall think fit, from time to time appoint a guardian or guardians to act jointly with the mother."

The 6th section provided,—" . . . In Scotland either Division of the Court of Session may, in their discretion, on being satisfied that it is for the welfare of the infant, remove from his office any testamentary guardian, or any guardian appointed or acting by virtue of this Act, and may also, if they shall deem it to be for the welfare of the infant, appoint another guardian in place of the guardian so removed."

The 8th section provided, that " in the application of this Act to Scotland the word guardian shall mean tutor, and the word infant shall mean pupil."

The 13th section provided,—" Nothing in this Act contained shall restrict or affect the jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice in England, and of the High Court of Justice in Ireland, or of any Division of the said Courts, and of the Court of Session in Scotland, to appoint or remove guardians or (in the case of Scotland) tutors or factors loco tutoris, or otherwise in respect of infants."

[1] Fraser on Parent and Child, 171, 309; Code de Leg., Tut. v. 35, 2; Craig, ii. 20, 14; Stair, i. 6, 24; Bankton, i. 7, 30; Kerbechil, 1586, M. 9585; Stuart v. Henderson, 1636, M. 9585.

No. 144.
—
June 27, 1888.
Campbell v. Maquay.

the provisions of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886. Section 2 of that Act no doubt enacted that a widow should be guardian to her children, even where she was not so nominated by their father, but that must be subject to the common law condition that she did not marry again. A second marriage was an emerging ground of removal under the 6th section. The law had always been jealous of persons who were under curatory acting as tutors,—a jealousy which was based on a perfectly intelligible fear of the baneful influence which might be exerted by the stepfather. The further fact that the second party had married a husband who was not a domiciled Scotsman was very important.

Argued for the second party;—(1) It was quite true that by the old law of Scotland a married woman was disqualified from acting as tutor to her children by a former marriage. The principle of that disqualification was that under the civil law a woman lost her persona by marriage, and became in potestate viri,[1] and the old Scottish decisions had followed the civil law. It was noticeable that there was no direct authority to that effect later than the middle of the last century, and the first Lord Meadowbank in the case of Stoddart[2] had expressed strong doubts whether the dictum of Erskine on the subject (i. 7, 12), would have been given effect to at that time. In the previous case (ante, p. 607), Lord Adam had declined to express an opinion upon the point. Further, in other respects the strictness and rigour of the old law had been relaxed. It had long been the law that a married woman might be a trustee,[3] and that a second marriage did not disqualify a mother from having the custody of her children. Besides the Conjugal Rights Act, 1861, and the Married Women's Property Act, 1877, were in the same direction. So that the Court ought not now to give effect to the old law upon the subject. But (2) apart from that, the provisions of the 2d section of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, were explicit. There was no restriction or condition to be found there; and none was to be presumed. It was important to notice that by the Act very large powers of discretion were given to the Court, the principal object they were to keep in view being "the welfare of the infant." Besides, the power of removal conferred under the 6th section was by petition to the Court, a remedy which it was open to the first party to obtain upon cause shewn. Further, it was no disqualification that a tutor resided out of the jurisdiction. No such disqualification was to be found either in the statutes, or in the institutional writers, or in the decisions of the Court.[4]

Lord President.—This case is presented with regard to the guardianship of the children of William Macbean Rankine and his spouse, now Mrs Maquay. The marriage took place in 1874, and Mr Rankine died in 1879, being a domiciled Scotsman at his death. The marriage-contract between the parties contained a nomination of tutors and curators to children of the marriage, but the only surviving and acting tutor is Mr Campbell of Kilberry. He is the first party to the present case,—Mrs Maquay, who is the wife of a gentleman who is not a domiciled Scotsman, and resides at Florence, being the second party. Mrs

---

[1] Langshaw v. Muir, 1629, M. 16,252; Gordon v. Corsan, 1632, M. 16,259.

[2] Stoddart, June 30, 1812, F. C.

[3] Stoddart, June 30, 1812, F. C.; Darling v. Watson, Jan. 14, 1823, 2 S. 607, affd. 1 W. & S. 188; Bell's Principles, 2083; Morton v. Gillon, March 7, 1835, 13 S. 640; M'Callum v. M'Donald, March 10, 1853, 15 D. 535.

[4] Rob v. Rob, Dec. 22, 1814, 18 F. C. 117; Bell v. Henderson, 1784, M. 16,374; Macdonald v. His Next of Kin, June 11, 1864, 2 Macph. 1194, 36 Scot. Jur. 600.

Maquay as the mother of the children maintains that she is in right to be one of the two guardians of her pupil children in virtue of the provisions of sec. 2 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886. Mr Campbell, on the other hand, maintains that he is entitled to be the sole guardian, and that Mrs Maquay is disqualified by law.

The only question of law raised by the case is with regard to this supposed disqualification. Mr Campbell contends that "by the law of Scotland the second party, being a married woman, is not now entitled to act as tutor aforesaid, notwithstanding the provisions of the statute above referred to," while Mrs Maquay contends that "under the provisions of the said statute she is entitled to act as tutor aforesaid, and that she is not disqualified by her second marriage or otherwise from so acting." That raises a pure question of law. There is not, and there could not be under this case, any appeal to the equitable jurisdiction of the Court, and we cannot give any effect to grounds under which tutors may be removed under secs. 6 and 13 of the Act. We are tied down to the question whether Mrs Maquay is disqualified from acting as guardian to these children by the fact of her second marriage.

The words of the section founded on are,—"On the death of the father of an infant, and in case the father shall have died prior to the passing of this Act, then from and after the passing of this Act, the mother, if surviving, shall be the guardian of such infant, either alone, when no guardian has been appointed by the father, or jointly with any guardian appointed by the father." Those words are very strong. The mother "shall be" the guardian. No one is entitled to use any discretion in the matter. I should almost go the length of saying that the widow herself is not left in a position to decline to act, for the words are imperative, the only condition being "if surviving." If she is the widow of the father of the children, she becomes guardian to them either alone or jointly with any guardian or guardians appointed by the father.

Now, it is said that that section must be read under reference to the common law, which makes it a disqualification for a mother to act as her child's guardian if she marries a second time. The rule so decided is quite distinctly laid down in decisions pronounced in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and it may truly be said that nothing has ever been done in later times to shake these authorities. But one cannot help seeing that those judgments were founded not on the principles of common law or equity, but entirely on the authority of the Roman law. The earliest of the decisions to which we were referred—the case of Kerbechil—is particularly remarkable as illustrating that fact. It is argued that we should disregard these cases, as the spirit which inspired them is irreconcilable with the spirit of modern legal opinion. That is a somewhat dangerous doctrine to adopt, and I am not disposed to rest my judgment on that ground. It is, however, very clear that the Act of 1886 does not take cognisance of any principle of the common law which might be opposed to the intention of the Legislature. We know that there is a great difference between the law of England and the law of Scotland (how the law of Ireland stands I do not know) in questions regarding the guardianship of children, the status of married women, and the relations of parent and child, and of tutor and pupil. But section 2 of the Guardianship of Infants Act applies to the whole United Kingdom, and, therefore, instead of attempting to reconcile the different rules of the common law in the different countries, the Legislature has made a rule which passes by and takes no cognisance of the common law, and says "the mother shall be the guardian," no matter what the common law is. The other sections illustrate this in some degree, but it is not necessary to go over them to enable us to arrive at the result I have indicated.

The 6th section makes it competent to apply for removal of a testamentary guardian, or one appointed or acting by virtue of the Act, but the ground of that section is that the removal must be "for the welfare of the infant." That is the only ground for removal;—there is no question of a disqualification existing at the time of the father's death, or supervening. The Act simply says,—here is the guardian, there is the power of removal, and the only thing to be considered is whether it is for the welfare of the infant that the guardian should be removed.

The 13th section saves the jurisdiction of the Court to appoint or remove guardians, and it would be very unfortunate if it could be supposed that the passing of this Act interfered in any way with the jurisdiction of the Court in such matters. There are many cases in which the Court exercises a large discretion in regard to the appointment or removal of guardians, but its jurisdiction in that respect is left untouched.

On the whole matter, I have no hesitation in saying that there is no disqualification to prevent Mrs Maquay from acting as guardian along with Mr Campbell.

Lord Mure.—The only question we have to deal with is whether Mrs Maquay is disqualified from acting as guardian to her children. I am unable to get over the express provisions of section 2 of the statute. The Legislature intended to make a change in the law, and it therefore enacts that if the mother be surviving at the time of the father's death, she shall be guardian to the children of the marriage. That assumes that the mother is to continue throughout as their guardian, either alone or in conjunction with any guardian appointed by the father. That being so, I agree that we are bound to answer the question submitted to us in the affirmative.

I do not go into the question whether there may be under the statute machinery to enable any person to ask the Court to remove a guardian from his or her office, for that is not now before us, and I give no opinion what would be a sufficient ground to entitle us to grant such a motion.

Lord Adam.—I cannot say that I have entertained any doubt upon this question ever since the case was opened. By the 2d section of the Act it is clearly provided that on the death of the father the mother shall, if surviving, be the guardian of the children of the marriage. Plainer language could not in my opinion have been used. It is said in this case that the mother has married again, but she does not because of that cease to be the mother of her children by the first marriage. It is obvious that the Legislature must have had in view a person in the position of the second party to this case,—namely, a widow, the mother of children, and married again, because as I said during the argument, there must be hundreds and thousands of widows in the same position, and I think that if it had been intended to exclude all those persons from the operation of this section, it would have been expressly so provided. There is, however, no such provision here, and I have therefore no hesitation in concurring.

Lord Shand was absent on Circuit.

The Court answered the question in the affirmative.

Pearson, Robertson, & Finlay, W.S.—F. J. Martin, W.S.—Agents.

No. 145.

June 27, 1888.
Mulligan v.
M'Alpine.

PATRICK MULLIGAN, Pursuer (Appellant).—J. C. Thomson—A. S. D. Thomson.
ROBERT M'ALPINE, Defender (Respondent).—Murray—C. S. Dickson.

Reparation—Personal injury—Blasting rock—Defective system of working. —In an action by a workman, who had been employed in blasting rock with gunpowder, against his employer for damages on account of personal injury sustained in the course of the employment through the alleged defective system on which the defender carried on the work, the pursuer averred that the gunpowder was stored in a magazine, about five minutes' distance from the work, in small barrels containing about twenty-five pounds of gunpowder each; that when it was desired to fill a charge a barrel of the powder was taken from the store and opened at the work and the required powder taken from it; that while the pursuer was engaged in firing a charge a gust of wind carried a portion of the fuse to the barrel from which the powder had been taken and caused the powder in it to explode, thereby injuring the pursuer; that the system was bad and unnecessarily dangerous; that the usual system was to take the gunpowder from the store in small flasks with narrow orifices, which practically obviated all danger; and that complaints had been made by the workmen to the defender's foreman of the danger of using barrels, which complaints had been unattended to. The Court (diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) dismissed the action as irrelevant.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

PATRICK MULLIGAN, labourer, brought this action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Robert M'Alpine, contractor, for damages for personal injury, at common law or under the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

The pursuer averred:—(Cond. 1) "The pursuer at the date of the accident after mentioned, and for some time previously, was in the employment of the defender in the formation and construction of the Barmill and Kilwinning branch of the Lanarkshire and Aryshire Railway, for which the defender is the contractor." (Cond. 2) "The duties of the pursuer in his said employment were to bore holes in rock for blasting purposes, and to fill the holes so made with powder, and, having done this, to fire the charge." (Cond. 3) "On or about 22d November 1887 the pursuer was engaged in these duties at a cutting in or near Rae Street, Saltcoats. He was engaged in firing the charge, when a gust of wind carried a portion of the fuse or fire to a keg or small barrel of gunpowder, which had been brought from the magazine or store to the working place, and caused it to explode. . . . . ." (Cond. 4) "The effect of the explosion was to injure the pursuer very severely. . . . . ." (Cond. 5) "The said accident, and the pursuer's injuries, were due to the fault of the defender, and of those for whom he is responsible. In particular, the system under which the defender carried on his work was a bad and unnecessarily dangerous one. The powder was kept in a magazine or store, about five minutes' distance from the work, and was carried therefrom to the work in small barrels holding about twenty-five pounds of powder, and averaging in height 14 inches, and in diameter 10 inches. The practice was to remove the cover or top of the barrel with a pick to get the powder out. The said system is unnecessarily dangerous, and is not the usual system. Usually powder flasks, with narrow orifices, are supplied, the use of which practically obviates all risk. The defender could have, and ought to have, supplied flasks, and ought not to have allowed the use of barrels. It was the explosion of the powder in one of these barrels that caused the said accident, which was thus a direct consequence of the defender's fault. . . . Denied that the pursuer kept the key of said store or box, or that it was his duty to take the barrel from the store, and to replace it after the shot had been fired,

No. 145.

June 27, 1888.
Mulligan v. M'Alpine.

or to remove it to a distance before firing the shot." (Cond. 6) "Before the said accident complaints had been made by some of the defender's workmen of this system, and requests for flasks made to their superiors in the defender's employment, and his foremen and managers were well aware of the danger of his system, and of the condition of his works, machinery, and plant, which, as above stated, were defective and unsuitable for their purpose. It is believed and averred that these complaints and requests, as well as the said system of working, and the condition of the said works, machinery, and plant, were well known to the defender personally. At all events, Keegan, the gaffer, and William M'Alpine, the manager of the defender over the said works, were aware of all this, and when complained to, as above stated, promised from time to time to have the system altered and suitable flasks supplied. This, however, was never done till the day after the accident, when flasks were at length furnished. The defender was thus at fault, and is liable at common law to the pursuer, or, at all events, he is liable, under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, to the pursuer for the consequences of the fault of his said gaffer and manager in not providing for a supply of suitable flasks, and allowing the pursuer and the other workmen to work as above set forth."

The pursuer pleaded;—1. The pursuer having received injuries in his person through the defender's fault (1) in conducting his work under a defective and dangerous system, (2) in exposing his workmen, including the pursuer, to unnecessary risks, (3) in employing defective and unsuitable works, machinery, and plant, is entitled to compensation and to decree in terms of the prayer of the petition.

The defender pleaded;—(1) There being no relevant case stated by the pursuer, the defender should be assoilzied from the action as laid. (4) The injury sustained by the pursuer being the result of a pure accident, or being caused, or materially contributed to by the pursuer's own carelessness, the defender is not bound to compensate the pursuer as craved. (5) The pursuer, being in the knowledge of any risks incident to his employment, or the method of working adopted by the defender, and having worked in the face of any such risks, must be held to have accepted the same, and is barred from insisting on the present action.

On 12th April 1888 the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) pronounced an interlocutor sustaining the first plea in law for the defender, dismissing the action as irrelevant, and finding the pursuer liable in expenses.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—(1) It was averred that the system in operation was defective, and had been complained of. The apparatus provided by the employer might be sound in itself; that was not enough; if the apparatus was unsuitable for the purpose for which it was provided, it was plant in "a defective condition," and the employer was liable.[1] (2) The rule volenti non fit injuria did not apply—or rather the pursuer must have been sciens not merely volens, and the question whether he had been aware of his danger had usually been decided after a proof. Only a very clear admission of knowledge would entitle the Court to throw the case out on relevancy.[2] The record here presented no such case.

---

[1] Heske v. Samuelson, Nov. 20, 1883, L. R., 12 Q. B. D. 30; Cripps v. Judge, Aug. 4, 1884, L. R., 13 Q. B. D. 583; Welsh v. Moir, Feb. 4, 1885, 12 R. 590.

[2] Grant v. Drysdale, July 12, 1883, 10 R. 1159; Murdoch v. Mackinnon, March 7, 1885, 12 R. 810; Yarmouth v. France, Aug. 11, 1887, L. R., 19 Q. B. D. 647.

Argued for the defender;—(1) It was no part of the system here provided by the defender, that his workmen should leave the powder barrel close to the blast with the powder exposed. If, to save themselves trouble, they chose to do so instead of taking it back, or covering the powder, that was their doing, not his; and if an accident happened in consequence, he was not in fault. (2) The record disclosed a clear case of working in face of an obvious danger, and as such was irrelevant.[1] A workman employed in blasting operations could not be heard to plead that he was ignorant of the danger of an open barrel of gunpowder close to a lighted match.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case I have come to be of opinion, although not without some difficulty, that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute should be affirmed, but on this ground simply—that there is no ground for imputing fault to the employer disclosed by the pursuer on record. The fault, which the pursuer desires to prove against the defender, is of this nature,—he says that the squad of men to which he belonged received instructions from the defender as to the method of carrying on the operations on which they were engaged, that this method was incompatible with the safety of the operations, but that nevertheless the men had no alternative but to carry them out. I think that the mere statement of such a kind of fault shews its insecurity as a ground of action.

The general conditions under which the work was carried on appear to have been of this nature. The gunpowder which was used in the blasting operations on which the pursuer and his companions were engaged was kept in barrels in a store at some little distance from the scene of the operations. When it was desired to prepare a charge, one of the barrels was taken out of the store and brought to the place of working, and the necessary powder was taken from it. It was, I think, conceded that there was nothing to prevent the men from returning the barrel to the store after they had taken the charge from it, and had they done so there would have been no danger in the operation. I rather gather that the men generally saw no reason why they should return the barrel to the store before firing the charge; on the present occasion unfortunately a gust of wind appears to have carried a spark from the lighted match in the direction of the powder in the barrel which was lying open. It in consequence exploded, and the pursuer received the serious injuries of which he complains. It does not appear to me that this method of carrying on the work was part of the arrangements made by the defender, or that these arrangements, as they are explained by the pursuer on record, were insufficient or defective. If the accident was not due to the foolhardiness of the workmen themselves, it was, I think, a mere misadventure, for which the defender cannot be held responsible. I do not think it necessary to go into the more intricate questions which have been raised. What I have stated appears to me to be a sufficient ground of judgment. I think the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute ought to be affirmed.

LORD YOUNG.—That is my opinion also, and I only desire to explain that where an accident is attributed to the defective arrangements of the employer's establishment or of the machinery which he supplied, I should be slow to decide

---

[1] M'Gee v. Eglinton Iron Co., June 7, 1883, 10 R. 955; Daly v. Arrol Brothers, Dec. 2, 1886, 14 R. 154; M'Ghie v. North British Railway Co., Feb. 26, 1887, 14 R. 499; Fraser v. Hood, Dec. 16, 1887, 15 R. 178.

No. 145.
June 27, 1888.
Mulligan v. M'Alpine.

the case without inquiry into the facts, but here I think that the whole matter is of a very ordinary and intelligible character.

The pursuer had been engaged by a man who had contracted to do certain blasting operations to perform these operations, and he was provided by his employer with tools to bore the holes, with gunpowder to form the charge, and, I suppose, with matches also to set the charge alight. The gunpowder was kept in a store at some distance from the work, and was made up in small barrels—very portable barrels, as they were only ten inches in diameter—which were carried to the work when it was desired to prepare a charge. Now, I should think it clear that a man who undertakes to blast a rock with gunpowder has an intelligent enough regard for his own safety to see that he does not strike his match so near an open barrel of gunpowder as to run the risk of being blown up. I should attribute at least such an amount of intelligence to him as would lead him to remove the powder barrel to a safe distance before striking the match. Here the barrel was lifted from the store to the hole, the needful quantity of powder was taken from it and poured into the hole, and the barrel, with the powder in it exposed, was then put down so near that a spark from the match was blown on to the powder, which exploded and injured the pursuer. He says that he had not intelligence enough to foresee his danger. I cannot take that off his hands. If he would not take the trouble to return the barrel to the store before lighting the charge, I should have thought that he might at least have put a slate or something of that kind on it, so that a spark could not get at the powder. But this intelligent individual did not take that very simple precaution—he left the barrel open, and then, when the explosion occurred, says that his master is to blame for it, because he did not provide a flask to carry the gunpowder from the store to the hole. I cannot so regard the case. I cannot find in this record any such allegation of fault on the part of the master as will infer his liability in damages to his servants. I think the accident was due to the failure of intelligent men to take ordinary and obvious precautions for their own safety. I therefore entirely agree with your Lordship. I do not think that any relevant ground for inquiry is set forth on this record.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am disposed to think that there should be inquiry here. I do not like to say, without inquiry, that the pursuer has no case. I rather think that his record does disclose a relevant case for inquiry.

The pursuer says that an improper system was in operation at this work, and that that system had been frequently complained of to the defender. It appears to me to be the only safe course to allow an inquiry into that allegation.

Then it is said that the pursuer exposed himself knowingly to an obvious danger. I do not think that the record will sustain that plea. It may very well turn out to be a good plea after the facts have been inquired into, but I do not think the pursuer's record discloses a foundation for it.

LORD CRAIGHILL was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

A. C. D. VERT, S.S.C.—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—Agents.

ROBERT CHRISTIE, Petitioner (Reclaimer).—Sir Charles Pearson—Cosens. No. 146.

June 27, 1888.
Christie.

Entail—Power to feu—Consent subject to conditions—Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36), sec. 4.—An heir of entail in possession presented a petition under section 4 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1848,* in which he prayed the Court to grant warrant to him to feu the entailed estate (with certain exceptions), " at such times, in such portions, and for payment of such feu-duties as the petitioner may think fit," subject to the condition contained in a deed of consent by the next heir (whose consent was alone requisite to enable the petitioner to disentail), that no feu-charter or long lease should be granted during the lifetime of the consenter without his consent to the terms thereof. The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) granted the prayer of the petition.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Trayner.
B.

IN October 1886 Robert Christie of Durie, Fifeshire, presented a petition under section 4 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1848 (the Rutherfurd Act), praying the Court, inter alia, " (Fifth) to grant warrant and authority to the petitioner to feu the said entailed lands and estate of Durie, so far as not already feued, or such portions thereof as he may think proper, but excepting therefrom the mansion-house, offices, and policies of the same, and that at such times, in such portions, and for payment of such feu-duties as the petitioner may think fit, all in terms of the said Act 11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36, sec. 4, before specified; to approve of a form of feu-charter for said general feuing purposes as the form to be made use of therefor from time to time as the successive feus shall be granted by the petitioner; to authorise and empower the petitioner to grant said feus in the form or forms so approved of from time to time as he shall think proper, subject to any conditions or stipulations which your Lordships may think proper; or otherwise to authorise the petitioner to grant feus of the parts of the said entailed lands and estate of Durie specified in the petition as delineated and enclosed within a red border on the plan of said estate produced herewith, and that at such times and in such portions as he may think fit; to fix and determine the minimum rate or rates of feu-duty at which the said lands may be feued, and for such partial feuing to approve of the form or forms of feu-charter or feu-contract to be lodged in process, subject to any alteration and to any conditions or stipulations which your Lordships may deem necessary, as the form or forms to be made use of for partial feuing under the present application from time to time as the successive partial feus respectively shall be granted; and to authorise the petitioner to grant the said partial feus in the form or forms so approved of from time to time as he shall think proper, all in terms of the provisions of the before-recited Acts."

The petitioner was born on 24th July 1818, and held the estate under an entail dated prior to 1st August 1848.

The petitioner produced a deed of consent granted by Robert Maitland Christie,—the petitioner's eldest surviving son,—who was the only heir whose consent would be required to the disentail of the lands in terms of the Entail Acts.

---

* 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36, sec. 4, enacts " That it shall be lawful for any heir of entail, being of full age, and in possession of an entailed estate in Scotland, with such and the like consents as by this Act would enable him to disentail such estate, to sell, alienate, dispone, charge with debts or incumbrances, lease and feu such estate, in whole or in part, and that unconditionally, or subject to conditions, restrictions, and limitations, according to the tenor of such consents, the authority of the Court of Session being always obtained thereto in the form and manner hereinafter provided; and such heir of entail shall be entitled to make and execute, at the sight of the Court, all such deeds of conveyance and other deeds as may be necessary for giving effect to the sales, dispositions, charges, leases, or feus so made and granted."

No. 146.

June 27, 1888.
Christie.

The deed of consent contained this clause,—"And further I do hereby, subject to the conditions after expressed, consent to the said Robert Christie granting feus of the said entailed lands and estate, so far as not already feued, or of such portions thereof as he may think proper, but excepting therefrom the mansion-house, offices, and policies of the same, and that at such times, in such portions, and for payment of such feu-duties as he may think fit, all without any further procedure; and particularly, without the feu-charters, feu-contracts, or other deeds of conveyance as shall be necessary for giving effect to the said feus so made and granted being executed at the sight of the said Court, and without the said Court approving of a form of feu-charter for said feuing, as the form to be made use of therefor from time to time as the successive feus shall be granted by the said Robert Christie, and without his being authorised and empowered by said Court to grant said feus in the form or forms so approved of from time to time as he should think proper, or without the same being subject to any conditions or stipulations which the Court might think proper, and to the said Court pronouncing an interlocutor dispensing with such procedure; but declaring, as it is hereby specially provided and declared and stipulated, as an express condition of this consent being granted by me, that the said Robert Christie shall not grant any such feus, neither shall he enter into any ninety-nine years' or other building leases of any part of the said entailed lands and estate, excepting as after mentioned; nor shall he execute and deliver any feu-charter or lease, or other deed requisite and necessary, to any feuar or lessee during my lifetime, unless I shall have first signified my consent to the terms of the feu or lease; which consent shall be sufficiently given and proved by a letter of consent under my hand, without my executing such feu-charters, leases, or other deeds themselves; declaring that the above condition shall not apply, nor shall my consent be necessary to feus or long leases" of certain portions of the estate.

In August 1887 the Junior Lord Ordinary (Trayner) remitted to Mr Henry Cook, W.S., to report.

The passage in the reporter's report with reference to the 5th head of the prayer above quoted is fully given in the Lord President's opinion.

On 23d May 1888 the Lord Ordinary granted the prayer of the petition with the exception of the 5th head, which he refused.

The petitioner reclaimed, and argued;—Under the 4th section the imposition of conditions in the deed of consent was authorised. The Court could not examine into the conditions, they only had to see that whatever conditions were adjected were given effect to. The Act contemplated that when once the consents necessary to a disentail were obtained under the 4th section the heir in possession could go on feuing any part of the estate, always, however, under the conditions therein expressed. The heir was in fact in the position of fee-simple proprietor of the estate, and his powers were only limited by the conditions imposed by the consenter.

At advising, and after consultation with the Lord Ordinary,— Lord President.—In this petition the Lord Ordinary grants the prayer with an exception, that exception being under the fifth head of the prayer. The petition is founded on sec. 4 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1848, and it appears to me that the Lord Ordinary and the reporter, and perhaps the petitioner himself, have failed to understand what are the rights of the petitioner under that section. The reporter, in dealing with this matter, says that the deed of consent "contains a provision which is novel to the reporter, and to which he therefore calls your Lordship's attention, as it is desired that effect shall be given to it in the interlocutor your Lordship is now asked to pronounce. This provision is to the effect that the granter consents to your Lordship giving the petitioner power to grant feus from time to time as he may think fit, and that without any application to the Court, or any model charter being previously authorised, the only proviso being that during the lifetime of the consenter his special approval and consent shall be first obtained to any such transaction.

"The first remark that occurs upon this provision is that if this power is granted, and the present consenter thereafter predeceases the petitioner, the latter will be left free to grant feus of the entailed estate without any consent of the then heir-apparent or other heir next entitled to succeed. Assuming therefore that the present consenter does predecease the petitioner, any feu granted by the latter thereafter would seem to the reporter open to challenge, upon the ground that it was a feu granted by an heir of entail in a way not sanctioned by the Entail Acts, by which alone he can feu out the entailed estate. For by these Acts an entailed proprietor must, generally speaking (1) either get the sanction of the Court to each bargain of feu; or (2) have previously obtained the approval of the Court to the drafts of the special feu-charters proposed to be granted, or to a model form of charter. The present deed of consent is practically providing a third method for obtaining the right to feu, which your reporter cannot see his way to regard as legitimate, and he therefore reports the point for your Lordship's decision."

The Lord Ordinary seems to adopt that view, and to hold that the petitioner is not entitled to obtain under the 4th section of the Act the power he asks, because the effect would be to enable him after the death of the consenter to grant feu-rights without further consent being obtained. The question is,—Is not that just the meaning of the 4th section, that he shall be entitled to go on granting feus unconditionally, except under the conditions expressed in the deed of consent?

The deed of consent here expresses the mind of the consenter thus,—"And further I do hereby, subject to the conditions after expressed, consent to the said Robert Christie granting feus of the said entailed lands and estate, so far as not already feued, or of such portions thereof as he may think proper, but excepting therefrom the mansion-house, offices, and policies of the same, and that at such times, in such portions, and for payment of such feu-duties as he may think fit, all without any further procedure; and particularly without the feu-charters, feu-contracts, or other deeds of conveyance as shall be necessary for giving effect to the said feus so made and granted being executed at the sight of the said Court, and without the said Court approving of a form of feu-charter for said feuing, as the form to be made use of therefor from time to time as the successive feus shall be granted by the said Robert Christie, and without his being authorised and empowered by said Court to grant said feus in the form or forms so approved of from time to time as he should think proper, or without the same being subject to any conditions or stipulations which the Court might think proper, and to the said Court pronouncing an interlocutor dispensing with such procedure." Now, so far the consenter does not express any condition, but merely what he considers to be the legal result of his consent, but he goes on, "but declaring, as it is hereby specially provided and declared and stipulated, as an express condition of this consent being granted by me, that the said Robert Christie shall not grant any such feus, neither shall he enter into any ninety-nine years' or other building leases of any part of the said entailed lands and estate, excepting as after mentioned; nor shall he execute and deliver any feu-charter or lease, or other deed requisite and necessary, to any feuar or lessee during my lifetime, unless I shall have first signified my consent to the terms of the feu or lease; which consent shall be sufficiently given and proved by a letter of consent under my hand, without my executing such feu-charters, leases, or other deeds themselves; declaring that the above condition shall not apply nor shall my consent be necessary to feus or long leases" on a certain part of the estate.

Now, turning from these deeds to the clause of the statute, we have this very wide and full power conferred. The Act 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36, sec. 4, enacts,—"That it shall be lawful for any heir of entail, being of full age and in possession of an entailed estate in Scotland, with such and the like consents as by this Act would enable him to disentail such estate, to sell, alienate, dispone, charge with debts or incumbrances, lease and feu such estate, in whole or in part, and that unconditionally, or subject to conditions, restrictions, and limitations, according to the tenor of such consents, the authority of the Court of Session being always obtained thereto in the form and manner hereinafter provided; and such heir of entail shall be entitled to make and execute, at the sight of the Court, all such deeds of conveyance and other deeds as may be necessary for giving effect to the sales, dispositions, charges, leases, or feus so made and granted."

That is a very wide power, and the present petitioner answering as he does to the description in the statute of an heir of entail in possession who has obtained such consents as would entitle him to disentail, is entitled under the section to sell the estate unconditionally, if no conditions are imposed by the consenter. He does it under the authority of the Court in the usual way, and executes the deeds at the sight of the Court, but his position is just this, that he has a right to deal with the estate with regard to this matter either unconditionally or under conditions if they are imposed by the consenter, exactly as if it were his in fee-simple. No one is entitled to interfere with regard to the price he gets for the estate—he may charge it with any amount of incumbrances he pleases, or he may lease or feu the whole of it.

In the present case the only condition imposed is that so long as the consenter survives, if he predecease his father, or during his father's whole life, if he survive him, he shall be consulted about the granting of feus or leases, and that he shall not be bound by them unless he is consulted and approves of what is done; subject to that condition, the heir in possession is just in the position of a fee-simple proprietor.

Now, the part of the prayer which the Lord Ordinary has refused is,—"(Fifth) to grant warrant and authority to the petitioner to feu the said entailed lands and estate of Durie, so far as not already feued, or such portions thereof as he may think proper, but excepting therefrom the mansion-house, offices, and policies of the same, and that at such times, in such portions, and for payment of such feu-duties as the petitioner may think fit, all in terms of the said Act 11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36, sec. 4, before specified." That is precisely in terms of the 4th section of the statute, and it seems to me that the petitioner is just as much entitled to choose his time for feuing, and the portions he will feu, and to fix the feu-duties, as if he were fee-simple proprietor of the estate. I am therefore for granting that part of the fifth head of the prayer. But the prayer then goes on,—"To approve of a form of feu-charter for said general feuing purposes as the form to be made use of therefor from time to time as the successive feus shall be granted by the petitioner; to authorise and empower the petitioner to grant said feus in the form or forms so approved of from time to time as he shall think proper, subject to any conditions or stipulations which your Lordships may think proper." There I think the petitioner imposes a burden on himself which there is no occasion for him to bear. There is nothing like that part of the prayer in the 4th section. The petitioner is not bound to have the form of the feu-charter adjusted, and he is not bound to conform to any form of charter. Therefore I think that the proper course would be to grant that portion of the fifth head which I have specified. It will, however, be necessary that our interlocutor should bear that it is granted subject to the conditions specified in the deed of consent.

No. 146.
June 27, 1888.
Christie.

LORD MURE and LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD SHAND was absent.

The petitioner then, under direction of the Court, amended the fifth head of the prayer by striking out from the words "to approve of a form of feu-charter" down to the end, and by substituting therefor the following words,—"But subject always to the conditions contained in the deed of consent by the said Robert Maitland Christie, No. 26 of process, namely, that the petitioner shall not grant any feus, neither shall he enter into any ninety-nine years' or other building leases of any part of the said entailed lands and estate, excepting as after mentioned; nor shall he execute and deliver any feu-charter or lease, or other deed requisite and necessary, to any feuar or lessee during the lifetime of the said Robert Maitland Christie, unless he the said Robert Maitland Christie shall have first signified his consent to the terms of the feu or lease; which consent shall be sufficiently given and proved by a letter of consent under his hand, without his executing such feu-charters, leases, or other deeds themselves; declaring that the above condition shall not apply, nor shall said consent be necessary to feus or long leases of any part of the ground bounded on the east," &c.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Allow the prayer of the petition to be amended as regards the fifth head thereof, and this having been done at the bar, recall the said interlocutor in so far as it refuses the prayer of the petition: Quoad ultra adhere to the same: Further grant warrant and authority to the petitioner in terms of the fifth head of the prayer of the petition as amended, and decern."

MACRAE, FLETT, & RENNIE, W.S., Agents.

HONOURABLE ATHOLL MONSON FORBES, Petitioner (Respondent).—H. J. Moncreiff—Low.

JAMES BURNESS (Curator ad litem to Ivan Courtenay Forbes), Compearer (Reclaimer).—Mackay—Begg.

No. 147.
June 29, 1888.
Forbes v. Burness.

Entail—Disentail—" Heir-apparent "—Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36), secs. 2 and 52.—An heir of entail in possession presented a petition for authority, under the Rutherfurd Act, 1848, and subsequent Acts, to disentail the entailed estate on obtaining the consent of his eldest son as his "heir-apparent." The deed of entail provided that the heir in possession should for himself and his "heir-apparent" forfeit all right to the estate in the event of his succeeding to a certain peerage, to which at the date of the petition the former was heir-presumptive.

The second and third heirs maintained that the petitioner's eldest son was not, in respect of the contingency to which his right of succession to the estate was exposed, his "heir-apparent" or, in the words of the 52d section of the

No. 147. Rutherfurd Act defining that term, "the heir next in succession to the heir in possession, and whose right of succession, if he survive, must take effect." Held that the petitioner's eldest son was his heir-apparent in the sense of the statute, and that the petitioner was accordingly entitled to disentail on obtaining his consent, the Court being of opinion that the contingency in question was not a suspensive but a resolutive condition, and that the term "heir-apparent" as defined by the Act was to be taken as descriptive of a class of heirs to be ascertained as at the date of the petition, Lord Adam also holding that the "right of succession" referred to in the definition clause was to "the heir in possession" and not to the estate which he might happen to hold.

June 29, 1888.
Forbes v. Burness.

1st Division.
Lord Trayner.
M.

THE HONOURABLE ATHOLL MONSON FORBES was heir of entail in possession of the entailed estate of Brux, Aberdeenshire, under a deed of entail dated 15th July 1799 and executed by the deceased Jonathan Forbes of Brux. He brought this petition for authority to disentail the estate with the sole consent of Atholl Laurence Cunyngham Forbes, his eldest son, born in 1882, or otherwise, with the consent of the three next heirs of entail, who were his two sons and his half-brother, the Honourable Walter Robert Drummond Forbes.

The petition was brought under the Rutherfurd Act, 1848, and the Acts amending that Act, viz., the Acts 38 and 39 Vict. cap. 61, sec. 5, and 45 and 46 Vict. cap. 53, secs. 12 and 13.*

The deed of entail provided, inter alia, "And whereas it is my wish and intention that the succession to my said lands and estate of Brux and others before disponed should be for ever kept separate and distinct from the succession to the family honours and dignity of the peerage of Forbes while there shall be any of the issue male of the said James Lord Forbes existing besides the person possessing the said dignity for the time and his heir-apparent, and failing the said James Lord Forbes and his issue male, while there shall be any issue male existing of the family or families entitled to succeed to the said dignity and peerage of Forbes, besides the person actually enjoying the said dignity and peerage for the time and his heir-apparent, it is hereby expressly provided that in case any of the heirs of taillie above mentioned descendent of the body of the said James Lord Forbes shall succeed to the honours and dignity of the peerage of Forbes, while there is any other heir or heirs of taillie existing descendent of the body of the said James Lord Forbes besides the person succeeding to the peerage and his heir-apparent, the person so succeeding to the said peerage shall, for himself and his heir-apparent in the said peerage, forfeit, amit, and lose all right, title, and interest which he may have to my said lands and estate, and shall be holden and obliged instantly to denude himself of my said lands and estate, and to convey and dispone the same habili modo to the next heir called to the succession of my said lands and estate by these presents, and it shall be competent to the heir next in succession to my said lands and estate to establish his right thereto by declarator, service, or any other method competent by law."

---

* The Rutherfurd Act, 1848, sec. 2, provided that any heir of entail born before 1st August 1848, being of full age, and in possession of such entailed estate under an entail dated prior to that date, might disentail the estate "with the consent (and not otherwise) of the heir next in succession, being heir-apparent under the entail of the heir in possession, he being born on or after the said 1st day of August 1848, and being of the age of twenty-five years complete at the time of granting such consent, and not subject to any legal incapacity."

Sec. 3 of that Act provided that such heir of entail in possession should be entitled to disentail, "Provided always that such heir of entail in possession shall be the only heir of entail in existence for the time, and unmarried, or otherwise shall have obtained the consents of the whole heirs of entail, if there be less than three in being at the date of such consents, and at the date of presenting such application, or otherwise, shall have obtained the consents of the three nearest heirs who at the said dates are for the time entitled to succeed to such estate in their order successively immediately after such heir in possession, or otherwise, shall have obtained the consents of the heir-apparent under the entail, and of the heir or heirs, in number not less than two, including such heir-apparent who in order successively would be heir-apparent."

Sec. 52 (the definition clause) of that Act provided that the words "heir-apparent" were to be construed as meaning "the heir who is next in succession to the heir in possession, and whose right of succession, if he survive, must take effect."

The Acts 38 and 39 Vict. cap. 61, sec. 5, and 45 and 46 Vict. cap. 53, secs. 12 and 13, provided that consents might be given in the course of the application by the heirs themselves or their curators ad litem, and when not given their interests might be valued by the Court and their consents dispensed with.

There was this further provision in the deed,—" But it is hereby expressly provided and declared that if, in consequence of the above provisions of devolution, my said estate should at any time devolve to one who is not the nearest heir in possibility, but the nearest in existence for the time, and a nearer heir should afterwards exist (not being possessor or heir-apparent of the dignity of Lord Forbes), the person upon whom the estate has so devolved or the heirs succeeding to him and in possession in virtue of the devolution at the time of the existence of the said nearer heir shall upon existence of such nearer heir eo ipso be deprived of his right to the said estate, which shall vest in and devolve to such nearer heir, and the heir in possession then become remoter shall be obliged instantly to denude himself of my said lands and estate, and to convey and dispone the same habili modo to the said nearer heir."

Curators ad litem were appointed to the petitioner's two sons, Atholl L. C. Forbes and Ivan Courtenay Forbes, who were in pupillarity.

No answers were lodged for the three next heirs, but it was maintained by the curator for the second heir and by the third heir in succession that the first heir, the petitioner's eldest son, was not in the position that if he survived his father his right of succession " must take effect." This contention was founded upon the fact that at the date of the petition, Lord Forbes, who had succeeded to the title in 1868, was fifty-eight years of age, and unmarried, and that the petitioner (who was Lord Forbes' younger brother) was his heir-presumptive.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 14th March 1888, found that the petitioner was entitled to disentail the lands in question on obtaining the consent of his eldest son.*

---

* " OPINION.—The petitioner, who was born in 1841, is the heir of entail in possession of the lands of Brux under an entail dated in 1799, and he asks under the present application authority to disentail the said lands with the consent of his eldest son, who was born in 1882. In these circumstances the petitioner is undoubtedly entitled, under the provisions of the 2d section of the Rutherfurd Act, to disentail the lands in question, provided his son, whose consent is to be given, falls within the definition of 'heir-apparent' as defined in that Act. That definition is,—' Heir-apparent shall be construed to mean the heir who is next in succession to the heir in possession, and whose right of succession, if he survive, must take effect.' It is not disputed that the petitioner's eldest son is the heir next in succession under the entail to the petitioner, but it is maintained by the heirs second and third in succession that the petitioner's eldest son is not in the position that if he survive his father his succession 'must take effect.'

" It appears that under the entail it is provided that if the heir in possession of the lands of Brux should at any time succeed to the 'family honours and dignity of the peerage of Forbes,' he must, for himself and his heir-apparent, denude of the lands of Brux, which then descend to the heir next in succession

No. 147.

June 29, 1888.
Forbes v. Burness.

The curator ad litem to the petitioner's second son reclaimed, with leave of the Lord Ordinary, and argued;—If the petitioner succeeded to the peerage of Forbes, then his son would cease to be his heir-apparent in the estate of Brux, and both father and son would no longer have any rights in connection with that estate, for the deed of entail provided that the forfeiture should apply to both. So that the son did not satisfy the meaning of the term "heir-apparent," as defined in the 52d section of the Rutherfurd Act. His "right of succession" was not such as "must take effect." So far from that, it really depended upon many other contingencies besides the survivance of his father (of which those referred to by the Lord Ordinary in his note were some). One object of the Rutherfurd Act, and of the Entail Acts which followed, was to cut off remoter heirs, but to preserve so far the rights of the heir-apparent by allowing him full satisfaction in the event of a disentail.[1] It was thus necessary to give the words "heir-apparent" the strictest interpretation in a petition for disentail, and in such a case as the present, where the to such heir-apparent. The present Lord Forbes, who succeeded in 1868, is now fifty-eight years of age and unmarried, and the petitioner (a younger brother of the present peer) is his heir-presumptive. If, therefore, Lord Forbes predeceases the petitioner without issue, and the petitioner succeeds to the title, he will be bound to denude of the lands of Brux, which would then pass (other circumstances being the same as at present) to the respondent Ivan Courtenay Forbes, the petitioner's second son. It is upon the possibility or probability of this taking place that the respondents maintain that the petitioner's eldest son is not an heir whose succession, if he survive the petitioner, 'must take effect.' The respondent's opposition is based entirely on probabilities and speculations as to what may happen. If Lord Forbes should predecease the petitioner, if he should not marry, and if married he should have no issue, or, having issue, if that issue should also predecease the petitioner, then the petitioner would succeed to the peerage, and in that event the petitioner's eldest son would not be the heir entitled to succeed to Brux. On the other hand, if Lord Forbes survives the petitioner, if he marries and leaves issue, the petitioner and his eldest son may disentail the lands of Brux.

---

"If all possible contingencies were taken into account (and I have only noticed some of those which might arise in the present case) it would be almost impossible to give effect to the provisions of the Rutherfurd Act. In the present case, a quite possible contingency would (as I am told) carry away from the respondents their character of second and third heirs in succession to Brux. It appears to me that the only reasonable way of dealing with the Rutherfurd Act is to give effect to its provisions in the circumstances existing at the time when these are appealed to. That I take to be the principle on which the Court proceeded in deciding the case of Preston Bruce (1 Rettie, 740). In that case there was a clause of devolution somewhat similar to what we have here, and regarding it the Lord President observed that while it might operate as a resolutive condition, it was not suspensive.

"The case of Gordon Duff (Duncan's Manual, p. 227), which was referred to, does not bear upon the present question. In that case the lands of A were held under an entail which provided that those lands and the lands of B should never be held by the same person. The heir in possession of A sought to disentail with consent of the three next heirs, and one of these three heirs was then heir in possession of B. Obviously, therefore (so long as he held B), he could not be an heir of entail of A, but as it was possible he might become so (by renouncing his right to B), it was thought proper, ob majorem cautelam, to call the fourth heir entitled to succeed to A. By doing so, it was made certain that the three heirs next in succession to the estate of A were called and consented. But that case decided nothing bearing upon the present question."

[1] Act 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 94, secs. 20 and 21; Act 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 84, sec. 6; Act 45 and 46 Vict. cap. 53, secs. 12 and 13.

No. 147.

June 29, 1888.
Forbes v. Burness.

facts raised the presumption that the consenting heir would never succeed to the estate which it was sought to disentail, this argument ought to receive full effect. The term "heir-apparent" meant an heir with an indefeasible right.[1] The cases of Preston Bruce and Lord Kinnoull's Trustees[2] did not apply. They were clearly distinguished from such a case as the present by Lord Shand in his opinion in the former of them (1 R. 745).

Argued for the petitioner;—The present case was ruled by the principles laid down in the case of Preston Bruce.[2] In the present case as in that the condition contained in the deed of entail was a resolutive and not a suspensive condition, and the circumstances were to be judged of as they existed at the date of the presenting of the disentail petition. The term "heir-apparent" was not a nomen juris in Scottish legal phraseology, but was a convenient term as inserted in the Rutherfurd Act, and as defined there meant the heir whose succession was certain if he lived. In fact the term was there used as in contrast to the term "heir-presumptive." If the reclaimer's contention was right the right of disentail given by the Act to the heir in possession would be defeated.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The petitioner is heir of entail in possession under a deed of entail dated in 1799, and he proposes to disentail the lands of Brux, with the consent of his eldest son, as his heir-apparent. This eldest son was born in 1882, and he is accordingly still in pupillarity—but although the 2d section of the Rutherfurd Act requires the heir-apparent who consents to the disentail to be twenty-five years of age and not subject to any legal incapacity, that is altered by subsequent statutes, and the consent of an heir-apparent may be given by a curator ad litem.

The question in the present case which requires serious consideration is whether under the provisions of the entail the eldest son is an heir-apparent within the meaning of the Rutherfurd Act. He is undoubtedly an heir-apparent in this sense, that he is the eldest son of his father, and if he survives his father, he must succeed to him according to the common law of succession.

The term "heir-apparent" is not known to the common law of Scotland. It was introduced by the Rutherfurd Act, but, at the same time, it was not a term with which a Scottish lawyer was entirely unacquainted. The peerage law of the country recognised it, and used it as meaning the same thing as it is interpreted to mean in this Act of Parliament. We have no corresponding term in our ordinary legal phraseology. The expression "apparent heir" has a very different meaning from the expression "heir-apparent." The former means the person to whom the succession has actually opened, but who has not yet completed his title to his predecessor's estate. But here I think the statute defines the meaning of the words "heir-apparent" by the interpretation clause, so as to make it obvious that the words are to be understood as having the same meaning which they have in peerage law,—that is, the same as they have in the law of England. By the law of England an heir-apparent is defined as being "he whose right of inheritance is indefeasible, provided he outlive the ancestor, as the eldest son, who must by the course of the common law be heir to his father on his death." That definition I take from Wharton's Law Lexicon, and it is stated on very good authority. Now, this being the meaning of the term in the peerage law and in the law of England, I think there can be no doubt about what was intended to be its meaning in the Rutherfurd Act. The form of expression which is used is "whose right of succession, if he survived, must take effect." The words "must take effect" are equivalent to the word "indefeasible" in the English definition. Accordingly the heir-apparent is the person who must succeed if he survives his father, i.e., as his heir.

---

[1] Duff on Entails, p. 17; Bell's Principles, 1677; Erskine's Inst. iii. 8, 54.

[2] Preston Bruce, March 6, 1874, 1 R. 740; Lord Kinnoull's Trustees v. Drummond, Feb. 26, 1869, 7 Macph. 576.

The difficulty which is suggested in this case is that in a certain event the petitioner will not be able to hold the estate of Brux, which he now possesses, and which he proposes to disentail, but will lose that estate both for himself and for his heir-apparent. He will have to give it up if he succeeds to the peerage of Forbes. That is the intention of the deed of entail, for it provides,—"And whereas it is my wish and intention that the succession to my said lands and estate of Brux and others before disponed, should be for ever kept separate and distinct from the succession to the family honours and dignity of the peerage of Forbes while there shall be any of the issue male of the said James Lord Forbes existing besides the person possessing the said dignity for the time and his heir-apparent, and failing the said James Lord Forbes and his issue male, while there shall be any issue male existing of the family or families entitled to succeed to the said dignity and peerage of Forbes besides the person actually enjoying the said dignity and peerage for the time and his heir-apparent, it is hereby expressly provided, that in case any of the heirs of taillie above mentioned descendent of the body of the said James Lord Forbes shall succeed to the honours and dignity of the peerage of Forbes, while there is any other heir or heirs of taillie existing descendent of the body of the said James Lord Forbes besides the person succeeding to the peerage and his heir-apparent, the person so succeeding to the said peerage shall for himself and his heir-apparent in the said peerage forfeit, amit, and lose all right, title, and interest which he may have to my said lands and estate." The present Lord Forbes has no family, and he is somewhat advanced in life, and there is accordingly a possibility—perhaps even a probability—that the petitioner may, upon the death of the present Lord Forbes without issue, succeed to the peerage. If so, he will lose the estate of Brux both for himself and for his heir-apparent, and it is said that in consequence of this contingency the so-called heir-apparent is not heir-apparent within the meaning of the statute, because it is not certain "that he must succeed" in the event of his surviving his father.

Now, I think there is a rule established in the case of Preston Bruce which applies to this case. The rule is that a condition of this kind is not suspensive but resolutive, and that where there is really a resolutive condition it does not affect such a question as we are here dealing with, because we are bound to take the facts as they stand at the time when the petition for disentail is presented. What we find here is that the petitioner is heir of entail in possession, and that his eldest son and heir-apparent must succeed, if he survives the petitioner. That seems to me to demonstrate that the so-called heir-apparent is really heir-apparent with reference to his father's succession, not only generally but in regard to this estate. I think we shall be doing no violence to the definition of an heir-apparent in the statute in holding with the Lord Ordinary that we must take the facts as they stand. The resolution of the right may never occur. The present Lord Forbes may marry and have issue; the petitioner may predecease Lord Forbes; and many other events may happen to prevent the resolutive condition from taking effect. So the condition in the deed of entail, as it may never apply to the case before us, is necessarily not suspensive of any right. I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD MURE.—This case raises a nice and important question. But upon consideration of the cases of Lord Kinnoull's Trustees (7 Macph. 576), and of Preston Bruce (1 R. 740), I am of opinion that the difficulty may be got over. In these cases the Court held that what they had mainly to look to was whether the heir who had exercised a power given to heirs in possession, or who had applied for authority to do so, was himself at the time in the position of an heir authorised by the Act to exercise the power. In the case of Lord Kinnoull's Trustees it was held that an heir of entail might grant bonds of provision in favour of his wife and children over the entailed estate under the Aberdeen Act, notwithstanding that he held the estate subject to a clause of devolution in the event of his having a second son, in whose favour he required to denude,—and had in fact denuded, in that case,—on the son attaining a certain age. It was, however, there held that the bonds must receive effect, in a question with the successor in whose favour the heir who had granted them had been obliged to denude. In the case of Preston Bruce, Mr Bruce was the heir in possession of the entailed estate, which he asked power from the Court to disentail; and it was held that the fact that his right was liable to be extinguished by the emergence of a nearer heir did not afford a good ground for refusing him the powers he applied for.

In the present case there is no doubt of the fact that the petitioner's son is now the next in succession to his father in the estate of Brux. He is his father's eldest son, and according to ordinary language he is his father's heir-apparent. But in the interpretation clause of the Rutherfurd Act we find that the words "heir-apparent" are to be construed, when that construction is not repugnant to the nature of the provision, "to mean the heir who is next in succession to the heir in possession, and whose right of succession, if he survive, must take effect"; and it is said that, because the present petitioner may, in certain events, succeed to the peerage of Forbes, in which case he would have to forfeit the estate of Brux for himself and his family, his eldest son is not necessarily in the position of a party whose succession, if he survive his father, "must take effect." But I think the Lord Ordinary is right in holding that the possibility of some such devolution taking place cannot prevent the petitioner from now taking benefit from the disentailing provisions of the statute. There may be many cases in which similar questions may occur. There are many deeds of entail under the provisions of which heirs of entail who commit an irritancy may forfeit for themselves and their children. So that in all such cases there never could be a disentail, if the reclaimer's contention were to receive effect; and in that way many of the leading provisions of a remedial statute would become altogether inoperative. I do not think this could ever have been the intention of the Legislature, or that this interpretation clause is so worded as to oblige us to give effect to any such construction. I am accordingly of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to.

LORD SHAND.—An heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate is entitled

No. 147.

June 29, 1888.
Forbes v. Burness.

under the Rutherfurd Act to disentail, provided he has the consent of the heir-apparent; and the definition of heir-apparent given in the statute is "the heir who is next in succession to the heir in possession, and whose right of succession, if he survive, must receive effect." It appears to me that this definition or description of an heir-apparent is ambiguous, and may mean either of two things.

In the first place, it may mean an heir whose right cannot be defeated by any possible contingency that may happen, provided only he survive the heir in possession. The argument for the reclaimer is, that if he can shew that there are any contingencies which might defeat the right of succession of the petitioner's eldest son to the estate of Brux even if he should survive the petitioner, then he is not an heir-apparent within the meaning of the statute. And the contingency to which the reclaimer specially refers is the probable or possible succession of the petitioner to the title of Lord Forbes, in which case all right to the estate would cease both for him and his son. The words of the clause admit, I think, of the reading contended for. If it can be shewn, as I think it can be, that, even if the petitioner's eldest son survive his father, his succession need not necessarily receive effect, then I think it may be predicated of him that his right of succession is not one which, "if he survive, must receive effect."

In the second place, there is another reading, viz., that the words are merely descriptive of a class of heirs. The heir, according to the statute, must be the next heir. But next heirs are of two kinds. First, they are those who must succeed in this sense, that, assuming they survive the heir in possession, their rights cannot be defeated by any nearer heirs; and, second, they are those whose rights may be defeated by a nearer heir coming into existence. The argument for the respondent here is, that, in the words of the statute, we have simply a description of that class of heirs whose rights cannot be cut off by the contingency of the appearance of nearer heirs who may come into existence.

We have to decide which is the more reasonable of these two readings. Do the words refer to the contingency of a nearer heir coming into existence, or do they embrace such wider contingencies such as the possibility of the estate passing out of the hands of the heir of entail in possession and his eldest son becoming disqualified to succeed? I am of opinion that the more reasonable view is that for which the respondent contends.

I cannot say that the case of Preston Bruce has in my view any application to the present. There the petitioner was heir in possession. The statute provided that the heir in possession for the time should have power to disentail, and the question raised was, whether, because at a future time he might be required to denude of the estate, this should deprive him of the power to disentail; it was held that it did not. But the petitioner was undoubtedly the "heir in possession." Here the whole question is, whether the petitioner's eldest son has the character of heir-apparent. In the case of Preston Bruce the question was, admitting that the petitioner was heir in possession, had he the right to disentail. The contention here is that the eldest son is not heir-apparent, because he is not a person "whose right of succession, if he survive, must take effect."

But other considerations leave me in no doubt as to the point at issue. We must look at the inconvenient and serious consequences which would follow if we gave effect to the reclaimer's argument as to the meaning of the Act. It is conceded that if the argument presented by the reclaimer is to prevail there are many other similar contingencies which might have to be taken into account in questions of the kind which would prevent even a man's eldest son being regarded as his heir-apparent under the Act. For example, if a deed of entail contains a provision that the heirs shall forfeit all right to the estate which is the subject of the entail in the event of their succession to another property. So, too, as Lord Mure has pointed out, with the case of an entail where in the event of a contravention the heir incurs a forfeiture for himself and all his descendants. In these instances, if the reclaimer's interpretation of the words in question were to be given effect to, the heir in possession could have no heir-apparent. And that interpretation would, in point of fact, range over and include so large an area of cases that it leads me to the conclusion that it is not reasonable.

Accordingly I prefer the respondent's reading of the clause. In one branch of the statute, it is provided that the heir in possession may disentail with the consent of the three next heirs, and in another with the consent of the "heir-apparent," being "the heir who is next in succession to the heir in possession," &c. Of course that expression excludes the strict meaning of the term "apparent heir" according to the law of Scotland, by which is understood a person to whom the succession has actually opened, but who has not completed his title, and who is merely an unentered heir—an heir in apparency. But, again, an heir though next in succession may be an heir-presumptive only, who is thus defined in Wharton's Law Lexicon, p. 379,—"He who, if the ancestor should die immediately, would be his heir, but whose right of inheritance may be defeated by the contingency of some nearer heir being born." It appears to me that the full and fair meaning of the clause was simply to describe one class of heirs as distinguished from another, to exclude the heir-presumptive and to include the heir-apparent whose relationship is such that his right cannot be interfered with by a nearer heir coming into existence, and upon these grounds I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD ADAM.—This is a petition for authority to disentail, and the heir of entail in possession has obtained the consent of his eldest son. In one sense he is his heir-apparent; but it is said that this is not so in the sense of the Rutherfurd Act, because his right of succession is not an indefeasible right. Accordingly it is said that the requisite consents to the disentail have not been given.

My opinion upon the point may be very shortly expressed, and it is founded upon what, I think, is the only proper construction to be applied to the definition of the words "heir-apparent" which we find in the interpretation clause of the Rutherfurd Act. The words are, "heir-apparent shall be construed to mean the heir who is next in succession to the heir in possession, and whose right of succession, if he survive, must take effect." His "right of succession" to whom? Surely to "the heir in possession." If that is the meaning no one can deny that that at once affords an answer to this difficulty. For if he survives, this heir-apparent must succeed to his father. I do not think it is a proper use of language to say that the succession is to an estate or a thing; the heir succeeds to the person last in possession of the estate and so acquires right to the estate, but he succeeds to a person only, and that is in my view the only correct construction of the language. If a person be the next heir for the time being to the heir in possession, then he is heir-apparent.

It is said that the definition which I have read requires that the succession

No. 147.

June 29, 1888.

Forbes v. Burness.

to the entailed estate "must take effect." If that be so, I think the principles which were laid down by the Court in the cases of Preston Bruce and Lord Kinnoull's Trustees would have been applicable. Upon these grounds I think the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be adhered to.

THE COURT adhered.

SKENE, EDWARDS, & BILTON, W.S.—W. & J. BURNESS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 148.

June 29, 1888.*

Thomson v. Stewart.

HUGH THOMSON, Pursuer (Appellant).—Gloag—G. W. Burnet.
MRS ANNE STEWART, Defender (Respondent).—Murray.

Master and Servant—Wrongous dismissal—Disobedience to orders—Coachman.—Held that a mistress was entitled to dismiss her coachman for having, against her orders, carried friends of his own in her carriage.

2D DIVISION.

Sheriff of Elgin and Nairn.

I.

IN June 1887 Hugh Thomson, coachman, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Elgin against Mrs Stewart of Logie House, his former mistress, for £71, 14s., being the amount of his wages for one year, with certain other sums alleged to be due to him.

The pursuer stated that he was a yearly servant, and pleaded;—(1) The defender having illegally and unjustifiably dismissed the pursuer, he is entitled to wages, and to the price or value of his other emoluments, as concluded for, with expenses. (2) The pursuer having been engaged by the defender, and illegally and unjustifiably dismissed, the defender is liable in damages; and the damages claimed being fair and reasonable, the pursuer is entitled to decree as craved, with expenses.

The defender stated that the pursuer had been engaged by the month, and further that she had ordered him not to use her carriages for the conveyance of friends of his own, which order he had disobeyed.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having disobeyed the defender's lawful instructions was legally and justifiably dismissed by the defender, and she is therefore entitled to be assoilzied, with expenses. (2) Separatim, The pursuer not being a yearly servant, either by convention or by presumption of law, the defender was entitled to dismiss him on a month's notice without cause stated, and ought therefore to be assoilzied, with expenses.

A proof was allowed. The evidence shewed that the pursuer had been in the defender's service for over twenty years. His wages were £57 a-year, paid half-yearly, with certain other emoluments. There was a conflict of evidence as to what, if any, was the express agreement as to the period of service. The evidence as to the order alleged by the defender was not very distinct, but, as both the Sheriff-substitute and the Court were of opinion that orders had been given by the defender that her carriage should not be used for the pursuer's friends, it is unnecessary to refer to the evidence on that point. The pursuer admitted that he had carried his friends in the defender's dog-cart. The defender dismissed the pursuer on 14th May 1887 on a month's notice. He remained in her service for the month, at the end of which she offered him a month's wages and emoluments, which he declined.

The Sheriff-substitute (Rampini), on 17th December 1887, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer got express orders from the defender not to drive any person or persons in her carriages without her express permission: Finds that, on the 14th of May last, after driving the defender from Logie House to Forres, he was returning to Logie driving

---

* Decided June 7, 1888.

No. 148.

June 29, 1888.
Thomson v. Stewart.

the defender's landau, and that he then gave a drive therein to two men: Finds that this was an express and wilful act of disobedience, and that the defender was entitled to dismiss him for the same: Finds that, on this ground, she, on the 16th of May, dismissed him: Finds in law that the said dismissal was justifiable: Therefore assoilzies the defender: Finds the defender entitled to her expenses," &c.*

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The defender had failed to prove that the express order alleged had been given. It had not been given in such a way as entitled the defender to dismiss the pursuer for what was at the most a trifling affair. There had been no wilful disobedience of a distinct order. That being so, the pursuer was entitled to the whole sum sued for. The presumption of law was that he was a yearly servant, and no agreement to the contrary had been proved.

Argued for the defender;—The order alleged had been proved. But even if it had not, at most the pursuer was entitled only to a month's wages, with emoluments, he being by express agreement, if not by presumption, a monthly servant. Most servants were now engaged by the month, whatever the practice might at one time have been, and the presumption (assuming it to have been at one time in favour of coachmen being yearly servants) being merely a presumption of fact, must be held to have altered with the altered practice.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case is narrow in some of its aspects, but I have no hesitation in coming to the same conclusion as the Sheriff-substitute. I do not enter into the question whether a coachman has his engagement for twelve months or not. I think the question has been doubted, and I am not sure that it has been absolutely settled. Most of the domestic servants in towns are certainly hired from term to term. Farm servants, on the other hand, are

---

* "NOTE.—In his pleas in law the ground on which the pursuer bases his claim to wages and damages is his alleged illegal and unjustifiable dismissal by the defender, and, as the Sheriff-substitute has arrived at a conclusion adverse to the pursuer upon this point, it seems only necessary for him to indicate the grounds on which this conclusion is founded, without burdening this note with any detailed analysis of the terms of the contract which subsisted between the servant and his mistress. It matters little what the nature of that contract was, if the defender was in law entitled to put an end to it by the dismissal of the pursuer. At the same time, the Sheriff-substitute may observe that, in his opinion, the pursuer has failed to prove a yearly contract, while the defender's evidence goes far to establish a contract of a very different character. That the defender actually did dismiss the pursuer is not disputed; the question is whether that dismissal was justifiable. . . . The pursuer will, no doubt, think that Mrs Stewart has acted very inconsiderately, not to say harshly, by him, in dismissing him because he gave a couple of friends a lift in one of his mistress's carriages on the 14th of May. No one can prevent the servant thinking so, if he pleases, but the law will not sanction any such opinion. If the mistress's order was a lawful one—as undoubtedly it was here—the servant was bound to obey it whatever might have been his own views as to its reasonableness or unreasonableness. Moreover, whether it was or was not the first occasion on which he had offended in this way, there can be no doubt that the servant had been previously warned that such conduct would not be permitted. This added greatly to the offence. It aggravated the wilful character of the disobedience, and, to quote the words of Lord Fraser in his work on Master and Servant, 'where a servant deliberately violates his master's orders, or refuses to obey them when given, he is clearly guilty of the grossest breach of contract.' That is what, in the opinion of the Sheriff-substitute, the servant has done here, and it is for this that he assoilzies the defender from the conclusion of this petition."

No. 148. — June 29, 1888. Thomson v. Stewart.

understood to be engaged for a year. But I do not enter into that question here. My opinion is that the act, the immediate act, that prompted the dismissal of the appellant was a sufficient ground of itself; and I do not think it necessary to go further than that. That ground was that the coachman had, contrary to orders, used his mistress's carriage for the conveyance of other people. I do not say that that might not in certain circumstances be regarded as a venial offence. No master however is bound to submit to it, and any master is entitled to dismiss a servant that does it. On the other hand, there are circumstances that might induce a master to be good-natured; but I can only say I think the thing itself is quite a sufficient reason for dismissing the coachman who does it. I think the admitted fact that the coachman took up certain wayfarers and allowed them the use of his mistress's carriage was in itself an indecorum and impropriety, and that his mistress was quite entitled, if she saw fit and ample reasons to her own mind for so doing, to treat it as disrespect to orders, which it was, and to dismiss him. That is the general view I take of this matter. I think that the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor is right.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

LORD YOUNG and LORD CRAIGHILL were absent.

> THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact that the pursuer before his dismissal by the defender had repeatedly used her carriage for the conveyance of other people than herself or members of her family, notwithstanding repeated orders to the contrary: Therefore dismiss the appeal, and affirm the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute," with expenses.

ROBERT STEWART, S.S.C.—STUART & STUART, W.S.—Agents.

No. 149. — July 3, 1888. Craig v. North British Railway Co.

ROBERT HUNTER CRAIG, Pursuer.—Ure.
NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders.—Murray.

Proof—Diligence—Action of damages for personal injuries—Defender's right to recover pursuer's business books and income-tax receipts.—In an action of damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained through the defenders' fault, in which the pursuer alleged that his business had suffered from his inability to attend to it owing to the injuries, the defenders moved for a diligence to recover the pursuer's business books for the preceding four years, and his income-tax receipts for the same period. The Court refused the motion.

2D DIVISION. I.

ROBERT HUNTER CRAIG, merchant in Glasgow, brought an action against the North British Railway Company for £2000 as damages on account of personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by him in a collision on their line.

The pursuer averred that owing to the shock he had sustained he had been "obliged to abstain entirely from business for several weeks, and for several weeks thereafter was able to attend only partially to business"; and further, that "in consequence of the injury he sustained he had been put to considerable expense, and owing to his inability to attend to business he had further sustained serious loss and damage therein."

Notice of trial having been given for the Summer Sittings, the defenders moved the Court for a diligence for the recovery of "all the business books, cash books, ledgers, balance-sheets, statements of profit, accounts, receipts for payment of income-tax, and all other books and documents kept by or for the pursuer, or by or for any firm of which he has been or is a partner during the last four years, in order that excerpts may be taken therefrom of all entries shewing or tending to shew the pursuer's income from his business during these years."

The pursuer's counsel opposed the motion, and argued;—The pursuer only averred that he had been incapacitated from business for several weeks after the accident; it was unreasonable, therefore, to force him to disclose the state of his business for so long a period as four years. The defenders were quite entitled to see his books with reference to all his transactions during the period named in his record, and that was their only right.

The defenders replied;—The diligence craved was the usual one in such cases. The matter was of vital importance to companies like the defenders. The pursuer sued for a lump sum of £2000, but a large part of that would no doubt be put down to business loss. It was not possible to ascertain the profits of the business, and consequently the existence and the amount of the alleged loss, unless the defenders were allowed access to his books. The books for the few weeks of his absence would give no means of comparison, but the books for the last four years would enable an average to be struck, and so would give a basis of fact on which to cross-examine.

LORD YOUNG.—I think this motion is altogether unreasonable. I think the pursuer may very fairly be asked to name the sum which he puts on the loss his business has sustained through his absence for several weeks. But this is a motion for a diligence calling on him to produce his books for the last four years. That is, I repeat, an altogether unreasonable demand, and I am therefore for refusing the whole diligence.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think the pursuer puts his business affairs in issue here, for he says that his business has suffered loss through the injuries he has sustained. I think, therefore, that he puts his books in issue on the demand of the defenders. Whether they are entitled to see the books extending over so long a period as four years is another question. I am not so clear about that. But that they should see his books is a right which I think the defenders plainly possess, for if they do not get the information their interests may suffer. With respect to the income-tax receipts, I confess I have considerable doubt. I do not know what the practice of the Court has been with regard to them. For my own part, I should prefer to limit the diligence to the business books, which I daresay will sufficiently serve the defenders' purpose.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am not for granting this application as it stands. I do not say that an application very much restricted might not be entertained. I give no opinion on that. I think this proposal is a great deal too wide. It is oppressive in its nature, and has no foundation, as far as I can discover, in the allegations which the pursuer makes.

LORD CRAIGHILL was absent.

THE COURT refused the motion.

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—MILLAR, ROBSON, & INNES, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 150. William James Semple, Petitioner (Reclaimer).—Balfour—W. Campbell.
Thomas Tennent, Respondent.—J. C. Thomson—Strachan.

July 3, 1888.
Semple v. Tennent.

Curator bonis—Minor—Special powers—Liability for unauthorised expenditure—Building new mansion-house.—A curator bonis to a minor, without applying to the Court for special powers, entered into contracts for rebuilding the mansion-house on his ward's estate. When the operations were partially completed, the ward, in an action of choosing of curators, nominated a curator, and thereafter presented a petition for recall of the appointment of the curator bonis. In the proceedings following thereon, held that the curator bonis had acted illegally in rebuilding the house without having obtained special powers from the Court, and that, therefore, he was liable for the entire sums expended in the building operations by himself and by the curator in implement of the contracts, but reserving to him any claim he might be able to establish in respect of any benefit accruing to the ward's estate in consequence of the said expenditure.

1st Division.
Lord Trayner.
B.

On 9th July 1885, William James Semple, of East Overton, Strathaven, Lanarkshire, with consent of John Baird, his curator, presented a petition, in which he prayed the Court to recall the appointment of Thomas Tennent, banker, Strathaven, as curator bonis to the petitioner, and to remit Mr Tennent's accounts to the Accountant of Court, and thereafter to exoner and discharge him of his actings as curator bonis foresaid.

The petitioner averred;—"That the petitioner is the only son of the late James Semple, of East Overton, Strathaven, aforesaid. The said James Semple died intestate on or about 9th July 1873. At the time at which the said appointment was made (on 15th May 1883) it was intended by the petitioner that he should choose a curator by action in the ordinary form, but through some misunderstanding the aforesaid petition for a curator bonis was presented. The petitioner having now chosen a curator in the ordinary way, the office of curator bonis to him has been rendered unnecessary and superfluous, and entails needless expense on his estate."

On 16th March 1887 the Lord Ordinary (Trayner), in respect of a report by the Accountant of Court, exonered and discharged Mr Tennent, and further decerned against the petitioner for £142, 5s. 4½d., "being the balance reported by the Accountant of Court . . . to be due by him to the said Thomas Tennent as curator bonis at 18th July 1885."

The petitioner reclaimed to the First Division, and stated objections to certain items of Mr Tennent's accounts being allowed.

On 9th July 1887 the Court remitted to Mr Molleson, C.A., to inquire into the whole circumstances of the case, and to report. To enable him to do so power was given to him to examine witnesses.

In Mr Molleson's report several objections were set forth as having been taken to the curator's account, but only the second, which was as follows, requires to be noticed,—"Second, Objection is taken to the outlays in connection with the building of a new dwelling-house upon the property, the cost of which has been partly entered through Mr Tennent's accounts, and partly through those of his successor in office (Mr John Baird), and altogether amounts to £3698, 7s. 6d."*

From the report it appeared that the heritable estate belonging to the petitioner yielded a gross annual rental of £800. The public burdens, &c., amounted to about £200, leaving a nett income of about £600. At

---

* Throughout the case it was taken that the sum expended on the mansion-house amounted to £3500, certain small sums having been disallowed on various grounds.

No. 150.

July 3, 1888.
Semple v. Tennent.

the time when the building of the house was commenced there was a deposit of £1630 in bank belonging to the petitioner.

The petitioner's mother, Mrs Dougal, who was aged forty-two, had, under her marriage-contract with the late Mr Semple, an annuity provided to her of £300, and also the liferent of the mansion-house and garden of Overton. That house contained two public rooms, two bedrooms, and a closet, and was infested with rats, and badly drained.

The new house was well and substantially built, and at a moderate cost. It was admitted that Mr Tennent did not apply to the Court for special powers before entering on the contracts for the new house.

Mr Tennent, in his evidence before the reporter, with regard to the building of the house, stated that Dr and Mrs Dougal complained that the house was unhealthy and infested by rats, that witness had got plans for repairing the house, but that this would have cost £1900, and would have been useless expenditure. "I never approved of the (new) house at any time. I objected to it from first to last. I objected to it on the ground that William James Semple had land that needed improvement, and houses that were not in good order, and I thought that when he became of age he would be a better judge of what was needed. That was my opinion. (Q.) You did ultimately give your approval? (A.) I signed the contracts. (Q.) How did you come to do that? (A.) Mr Turnbull, the architect, brought them to my own house, and I did it. (Q.) Why did you agree to them? (A.) I do not know; it was a very stupid thing. (Q.) Was it on account of the pressure brought to bear on you? (A.) It was just that. (Q.) By Dr Dougal? (A.) And his wife. (Q.) Who entered into the contracts? (A.) Mr Turnbull entirely. (Q.) Did he consult you about them? (A.) I think he might consult me when he shewed me the plans, but he never consulted me on a single movement in the matter. I signed the contracts with the builder and the joiner. I think that was all I signed. (Q.) You were not consulted in any way about the house? (A.) No. I might have a conversation with Mr Turnbull, but very rarely. (Q.) Did you ever interfere in any way with the operations? (A.) Never. (Q.) Did you know that Dr Dougal and his wife did? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Did they consult you about what was wanted? (A.) No. (Q.) Anything they wanted was done at their own hands? (A.) At their own hands. They gave all the instructions to Mr Turnbull without consulting me. Everybody knows that I disapproved of it in toto."

Argued for the reclaimer;—He had suffered lesion owing to the building of this new house. The cost of it largely cut down his income, and there was little prospect of his being benefited[1] by getting a better house, the liferentrix being still young. Besides, in the profession he intended to adopt (that of a doctor) a house of that magnitude would only be a burden to him. The curator ought to have come to the Court for special powers before incurring an outlay on such a subject,[2] and as he admitted that he never approved of the building of the new house, powers would never have been granted to him. That was enough for the decision of the case, but if it came to a question how far the reclaimer had benefited by the building, in the first place, there were no materials for deciding the question in this process, and second, the onus of shewing any benefit at all lay on the respondent. The only proper course for the Court was to disallow the whole sum expended on the house, whether by Mr Tennent personally, or by his successor in office, under contracts entered into by him.

Argued for the respondent;—The ward was benefited by the build-

---

[1] Maitland, July 11, 1863, 1 Macph. 1104, 35 Scot. Jur. 632.

[2] Graham v. Earl of Hopetoun, 1798, M. 5599.

No. 150.

July 3, 1888.
Semple v.
Tennent.

ing of the house, which was absolutely necessary, and was erected at a moderate cost. The liferentrix might have repaired the old house at a larger cost, and at the termination of the liferent her heirs would have had a claim against the fiar for all that was laid out.[1] The question came to be one between the liferentrix and the fiar, the contracts having been entered into at the express wish of the liferentrix.

Lord President.—The ward in this case on the death of his father succeeded to a heritable estate of which the gross rental is £800, and the nett rental, after deducting public burdens, &c., £600. He had also £1630 in bank on deposit-receipt. Now, if the ward had been proprietor of that estate without its being burdened with a liferent, and had been of full age, I should not have been prepared to say that the expenditure of £3000 on rebuilding the mansion-house would have been imprudent. The sum expended does not in itself seem excessive. But the position of matters here is very different. The mother had under a marriage-contract an annuity of £300 settled on her, and she had also the liferent of the house. The effect of this, as Mr Molleson says in his report, was,—"The clear £600 per annum of revenue in the curatory exhibited on the preceding page must, however, suffer diminution from the £300 of an annuity secured to Mrs Dougal during her lifetime. It does not seem good management for one in the possession of a surplus income of but £300 to reduce same by the interest on money to be borrowed in order to erect a house manifestly in excess of the needs of one whose income so further reduced could not much exceed £200. It may also be noticed that the ward has entered upon his studies for the profession he has chosen, which is the same as that of his step-father Dr Dougal, and that his future career renders it uncertain as to what need he may have for a mansion-house."

In such circumstances, I think nothing could be more imprudent than that the ward's guardian should have consented to proceed with the building of this house. The effect of his doing so was that the money deposited in bank was all expended, and in addition a sum sufficient to make up the whole cost of the house, on which of course the ward has to pay interest. The result of the building of the house is therefore to create a very great prejudice to the ward, without even a prospective advantage. The liferentrix is only about forty years old, and the boy has his income reduced by this proceeding to £200 a-year, and that is his sole provision so long as the widow is alive.

It is not necessary to go into the circumstances of the case, for nothing could be more candid than Mr Tennent's own account of what happened. He says that he disapproved highly of the house being built, and thought it a very stupid thing to do. Being asked why he consented, he said he was just over-persuaded. He, in short, surrendered his judgment to the widow and others, and in obedience to their order entered into contracts for the building of the house.

That being so, I cannot see what defence can be made to this objection. Everything that could be said has been said about Mr Tennent's good faith and good intentions, but we cannot listen to that in the face of his own confession. His position was that of a curator bonis appointed by this Court, and his duty before dealing thus with the estate was to come to the Court for special powers, and without obtaining such powers what he did was utterly illegal. It

---

[1] Scott v. Forbes, 1755, M. 8278; Haliday v. Gardine, 1705, M. 13,419.

No. 150.

July 3, 1888.
Semple v.
Tennent.

is perfectly plain that if he had come to the Court with a petition, and stated his honest opinion as to the proposed building of a new mansion-house, the petition would at once have been refused. He could not honestly have said that what he asked would be for the benefit of the ward, and without his asserting that, the petition would not have been granted.

That being so, the question comes to be, whether this illegal expenditure is to be allowed as an item of his account. There is no answer but one to be given. The expenditure was illegal, and consequently it must be disallowed.

I have listened carefully to the grounds on which it is proposed to make a reduction from the amount for which the curator is thus liable, viz., that the ward has to some extent been benefited by the expenditure in that he will get a better house when the liferentrix dies than he would otherwise have had. Now, if the curator can make out a claim by way of recompense I am far from anxious to shut him out from making it, but I more than doubt whether that matter can be taken up in this process; but if it were competent, we have not the material to decide it. If we were asked what is the extent of the reduction which ought to be allowed,—that is, to what extent has the ward benefited,—I can see nothing to enable us to deal with the question. I am, however, disposed to acquiesce in the proposal that any claim for recompense be reserved, and if the curator thinks he has any claim for recompense against the ward's estate, it will be open to him to make it hereafter. I am therefore for disallowing this expenditure.

As regards the other objections, I am not for sustaining them.

Lord Mure.—I should be glad if I saw my way to come to any other conclusion than that stated by your Lordship, but I cannot read the evidence without seeing that the position of Mr Tennent is that he has in this matter done what he had no title to do, having been induced to do so by the relatives of the ward. Before entering on these contracts he ought to have come to the Court for special powers, but not having done so, what he did was clearly illegal. That being so, the question is, how is the matter to be put right? I listened with great interest to the suggestion of another course than that of disallowing the expenditure, and at first I was inclined to think that the curator should be debited with the interest of the money which the ward has lost, and that the matter should so be left till the death of the liferentrix. But as your Lordship has said we have no materials here to enable us to judge as to that proposal, and therefore all we can do is to adopt the course taken in Lord Hopetoun's case, that is, to disallow the expenditure, under reservation, however, of the claims your Lordship alluded to.

Lord Adam.—The question here is, are certain items of expenditure in the curator's accounts to be disallowed? I have no hesitation in concurring with your Lordship with regard to the expenditure on the mansion-house. No one disputes that the curator had no power to expend this sum of money on rebuilding the house without coming to the Court for special powers. The result of his not having done so is that the expenditure is prima facie illegal. It is true that the Court does not always disallow extraordinary expenditure made by a curator without first having obtained special powers, but here I cannot help feeling that had the curator come to the Court for powers which would have enabled him to build this house the Court would never have granted them.

No. 150. I think therefore we have no alternative but to disallow this item. I am equally clear that that is the only matter before us. It is said that there may be a claim against the ward by the curator in respect that the former has been benefited by the expenditure, but that question is not before us, and if it were we have no material on which to decide it.

July 3, 1888. Semple v. Tennent.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor dated 16th March 1887: Find that the respondent, Thomas Tennent, as curator bonis, acted illegally in entering into contracts which involved the expenditure of the ward's funds to the amount of £3500 in rebuilding the mansion-house of the estate of East Overton: To that extent and effect sustain the second and third of the objections, No. 46 of process, for the reclaimers to the accounts lodged by the said Thomas Tennent, and to the reports, Nos. 37, 39, 40, and 45 of process, of the Accountant of Court: Repel the other objections, and remit to Mr Molleson to reconsider the curator's accounts in accordance with the above finding: Reserving to the curator any claim which he may be able to establish in respect of any benefit accruing to the ward's estate in consequence of the said expenditure, and to all other parties their answers as accords: Reserving also all questions of expenses."

GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—JOHN WALLS, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 151. JOSEPH JOHN ARMISTEAD, Pursuer (Respondent).—Jameson—R. L. Orr.
JAMES BOWERMAN, Defender (Reclaimer).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Salvesen.

July 3, 1888. Armistead v. Bowerman.

Reparation—Nuisance—Neighbourhood.—The purchaser of a quantity of fallen timber in a plantation in the course of removing the timber dragged it across a stream which flowed through the plantation and fed a salmon-hatchery below. The result was that the stream became fouled, and that the ova in the hatchery were destroyed. In an action of damages by the proprietor of the hatchery against the purchaser of the timber, it was proved that the latter had continued his operations after he became aware of their probable consequences to the ova, but was willing to take any reasonable precautions which did not materially impede the removal of the timber, he being under contract with the proprietor of the plantation to remove the timber within a limited time. Held (rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren) that the pursuer was not entitled to damages, the defender having followed the ordinary method of carrying out an ordinary and legitimate operation.

2D DIVISION. Lord M'Laren. I.

ON 9th February 1881, Mr J. J. Armistead, a pisciculturist, obtained from Lord Herries a lease for fifteen years of about five acres of ground at Kinharvie, in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright. The lease provided, inter alia,—"First, the said ground is let to the said Joseph John Armistead for the sole purpose of breeding fish, with liberty to use the land not so employed as garden, orchard, or for growing crops, and for this purpose he shall be at liberty to excavate the ground for the formation of ponds to the satisfaction of and under the superintendence of the proprietor's factor, or a person to be appointed by him. Second, the tenant shall have right, so far as the proprietor can give him such right, to divert water from the Newabbey and Tannox Burns where they pass through or adjoin the ground hereby let, for the purpose of supplying the ponds to be constructed as aforesaid; and he shall construct to the satisfaction of the proprietor an outlet for the water so diverted after passing through the said ponds. . . . Ninth, the proprietor reserves the right to remove through the land hereby let the timber cut on the lands adjoining without being liable to the said Joseph John Armistead in any damage caused by the removal of such timber."

Armistead established a fish hatchery on the ground thus let, including among other apparatus ponds for the hatching of the ova. These ponds were supplied with water from the Tannox Burn, and also from another burn which came to be called the Hatchery Burn. Both burns before reaching the hatchery passed through a large timber plantation.

In 1883 a large part of the timber in this plantation was blown down. The fallen timber was sold by Lord Herries, and the purchaser resold it to James Bowerman. The contract of sale with Lord Herries provided,—"1. The wood to be removed by 31st of December 1886, and if any is left it shall be in Lord Herries' option to remove the same at the buyer's expense, or to dispose of it as he may think fit without payment or compensation . . . 4. The buyer shall remove the wood by such roads or tracks as may be pointed out by the forester across the lands occupied by Lord Herries or his tenants, without liability for surface damage, but shall be bound to repair all gaps made in the fences in removing the wood."

In carrying out the removal, Bowerman dragged a good deal of the timber across the Tannox Burn, and also across the Hatchery Burn. The result was that the filters of the ova portion of the hatchery became fouled with pieces of fallen timber to such an extent that they ceased to act, and the unfiltered and fouled water came over the top and destroyed the ova.

Armistead in consequence brought an action of damages against Bowerman.

The pursuer, inter alia, averred;—"During the last week in December 1886 the defender commenced removing the wood lying to the south-west of the hatchery, and notwithstanding the warnings given to him by the pursuer, and his promise to take proper precautions, the defender, or those for whom he is responsible, wrongfully, recklessly, and in total disregard of pursuer's interests, dragged the timber by means of horses and otherwise through the stream, which at that time fed the hatchery, and fouled it to a very serious extent. . . . The defender was aware of the nature of the pursuer's operations, and that he required a supply of pure water therefor, and for the supply of his household, and it was the defender's duty to take all precautions proper and reasonable in the circumstances, by the use of log-bridges and otherwise, to prevent the pollution of said streams, and consequent loss and damage to the pursuer. In spite, however, of repeated warnings by the pursuer, and promises by the defender or his representatives to adopt precautions which are usual and reasonable in the circumstances, and to put a stop to said pollution, the defender neglected to take any steps (except by using a log-bridge for a day or two about 9th March 1887), to prevent said pollution, and persisted in carrying on his operations in a wrongful, negligent, and reckless manner, so as to cause a nuisance and serious damage to pursuer. The defender, or those for whom he is responsible, by said operations, carried on and persisted in as above described, have maliciously, or at all events wrongfully, recklessly, and unnecessarily damaged the pursuer's property and business, and put himself and his household to great inconvenience, loss, and expense as above described. In consequence of the defender's said operations and whole actings as condescended on, the pursuer has suffered loss, injury, and damage to the extent of at least the sum sued for."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender, or those for whom he is responsible, having polluted the streams which feed the pursuer's works and supply his house, to the nuisance of the pursuer, and having thereby caused him loss, injury, and damage, the pursuer is entitled to reparation as concluded for, with expenses. (2) The defender, or those for whom he is responsible, having maliciously or, at least, wrongfully, recklessly, and unnecessarily damaged the pursuer's property and business, the pursuer is entitled to reparation as concluded for, with expenses.

No. 151.

July 3, 1888.
Armistead v. Bowerman.

The defender pleaded;—(3) The defender having acted within his rights in the removal of the said timber through the streams in question, is entitled to be assoilzied, with expenses.

The general nature of the proof sufficiently appears from the Lord Ordinary's opinion, infra.

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren), on 6th March 1888, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer had right as tenant to a supply of pure water for his fish hatchery from the streams flowing through Lord Herries' plantation: Finds that the defender had right to remove the fallen timber in said plantation, and that it was his duty in doing so to take reasonable precautions against fouling the streams supplying said hatchery: Finds that the defender was negligent in the performance of this duty, and that through such negligence the pursuer has lost the greater part of the fry or young fish hatched in the season of 1887, and has sustained damage to the extent of £300: Decerns in favour of the pursuer for this sum, and quoad ultra assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.*

---

* "OPINION.—The pursuer, Mr Armistead, is lessee of a house and land, with certain water rights, which he rents from Lord Herries, for the purpose of carrying on the business of fish-hatching and fish-culture. According to the evidence, this comparatively new branch of industry has already attained a considerable development in Great Britain. One of the essentials of its successful prosecution is the supply of a constant flow of perfectly pure water, and the right to such a supply was the subject of special stipulation in the lease which Mr Armistead obtained. At the same time, Lord Herries stipulated for the right to remove fallen timber through the land which was given in lease to Mr Armistead. Since the commencement of the lease a large number of trees on Lord Herries' property were blown down by a gale of wind, and as Mr Armistead's enclosure is situated at the foot of the slope of the plantation, and was the most convenient access to the plantation, it became necessary that Lord Herries should exercise his reserved right under the lease. Instead of employing his own foresters or workmen to remove the fallen timber, Lord Herries sold the timber in 1884 to an English firm, who resold it to the defender Mr Bowerman, with the right of removing it, which Lord Herries had reserved. In removing the timber the defender on various occasions fouled the water which supplies the pursuer's fish-hatchery and breeding-ponds. The young fry in the hatchery were completely destroyed as the natural and inevitable result of the pollution of the water; and there was also a considerable destruction of the fish in the breeding-ponds, which the pursuer attributes to the same cause. For this loss the pursuer claims compensation from the defender.

"I may here observe that the removal of the timber on the occasions complained of was subsequent in point of time to the period within which the defender was bound by his contract to complete the clearance of the fallen timber. On this circumstance the pursuer has founded a separate argument, to the effect that the defender must be regarded as a trespasser, or as a person interfering without a title. In considering the case I have not felt at liberty to give any weight to this contention, because I conceive that the circumstance of the defender having exceeded the limits in time within which he was to complete the removal of the timber only raised a question between him and Lord Herries. Lord Herries might have granted an extension of time without consulting the

No. 151.
July 3, 1888.
Armistead v. Bowerman.

